Congress Opens With Rule Fights

By Gene Zack

The 87th Congress convened on Jan. 3 amid procedural maneuvers on both sides of Capitol Hill aimed at removing barricades which could slow the rate of progress of Pres.-elect Kennedy's "New Frontiers" proposals.

The Senate plunged immediately into a battle over curbing filibusters—the talkathons used by southern Democrats to block or modify civil rights legislation. Liberals submitted two bipartisan proposals to amend Senate rules and reduce the number of votes needed to cut off debate.

In the House, where another rules fight had been threatened, Democrats engaged instead in behind-the-scenes efforts to end right-wing control of the powerful Rules Committee which has been used to kill or water down liberal economic measures.

Aside from the procedural disputes, the new Congress organized quickly. Senate Democrats unanimously chose Sen. Mike Mansfield (Mont.) to succeed Vice Pres.-elect Lyndon B. Johnson as majority leader, and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) to succeed Mansfield as assistant leader, or whip. At the same time Mansfield announced he had asked Johnson to con-

Problems of Aged to Get Full Airing

The White House Conference on Aging will open a three-and-a-half day stand Jan. 9 in the nation's capital to seek remedies for the complex social and economic problems now plaguing the nation's older citizens.

Medical bills, low income, inadequate housing and other problems of the aged will be tackled by the conference delegates. The issue of financing health care for the aged is expected to receive major attention at the parley.

Of the 2,800 delegates from states and national organizations, approximately 150 will be from organized labor.

Listed among the delegates are 257 physicians and dentists, making up almost 10 percent of the total group.

The American Medical Association, according to a report to its annual convention last month, deliberately sought "to get as many

TOP "DOMESTIC PRIORITY" for aid to depressed areas is pledged by Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy after receiving broad program of remedial action from special task force headed by Sen. Paul H. Eisenhower, was scheduled to move swiftly to push similar measure through Congress. (See story on Page 6.)

Arbitrator Hits Open Shop:

300 Sears Clerks Win Back Pay, Jobs

The Retail Clerks have hailed an arbitrator's decision awarding more than $100,000 in back pay to 300 employes of two Sears, Roebuck & Co. San Francisco stores as a "turning point for victory" in their campaign against hostile policies of the giant retail chain.

The sweeping decision, which found that the labor dispute at the stores resulted from an open-shop policy "rigidly laid down for its retail chain by the top management of the company at its headquarters in Chicago," was filed in San Francisco Jan. 3.

The final and binding awards were granted to employes of the stores, represented by two RCIA locals, who had been discharged or demoted when they respected picket lines of the Machinists last May.

The company was ordered to submit the cases to arbitration last July by U.S. District Judge George Harris in San Francisco. Arthur C. Miller was agreed upon by both sides as the arbitrator. In summary form, Miller held:

1. That the company engaged in a "lockout in violation of its agreement" with the union and also was guilty of "provocations in violating a whole series of its contractual commitments."

2. That the company penalized employes for exercising their contractual and legal right to respect another union's picket lines and that this action amounted to discrimination against these employes for legitimate trade union activities.

3. That all discharged or demoted employes must be restored to their former jobs and status with unimpaired seniority rights.

4. That the company must give full back pay to all reinstated or demoted employes except those "who actively participated in boycott activities" against the stores.

5. That severance pay amounting to $37,000 paid to some of the discharged employes must

Fast Action on Jobs Urged by Council

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on the incoming Kennedy Administration and the 87th Congress to give swift approval to "vigorous counter-measures" to stem "the gathering economic storm" brewed by the third—"and potentially the most severe"—recession in seven years.

Meeting in the nation's capital two weeks before the inauguration of John F. Kennedy, the council also urged prompt action on a wide range of long-stalled progressive legislation. These measures, the council said, "have already been subjected to exhaustive hearings and thorough debates; what they need now is enactment, not further investigation."

The Executive Council, expressing labor's "faith" in the leadership prepared to take over the reins of government, laid before the incoming Administration and Congress a 20-point program covering both emergency action to arrest the economic deterioration and proposals to help solve "problems that have too long been neglected."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the program is based on the actions of AFL-CIO conventions. No priorities have been assigned, he declared, although the items dealing with depressed areas, housing, aid to education, minimum wage and health care for the aged have given labor the "most concern" in the past year.

He stressed that in the 20-point programs all the items were "important" and that there is no intention of emphasizing one point and thus detracting from the importance of others.

The program has not been "cleared" with Pres.-elect Kennedy, Meany told a reporter in reply to a query, adding it is "our program." He noted that Kennedy had supported many of the points while in the Senate and that some parts of the program would probably be included in the incoming Administration's legislative goals.

The program ranged broadly from a temporary tax reduction if unemployment should exceed 7 percent of the work force to action in the civil rights and national defense fields.

Meany said that a very rough estimate of the temporary tax reduction program, based on $10 a week reduction for 10 weeks for 50 million taxpayers, would come to about $5 billion for the period.

The tax-cut program, he stressed, would not go into operation until the rate of unemployment reached 7 percent and the President could make the cut effective unless it was disapproved by Congress. The temporary tax reduction "would make money available for everybody in the country" to fight the recession, the AFL-CIO president said.

In the area of short-range actions designed to restore vigor to the economy, the council called for temporary extension of unemployment benefits to those exhausting their rights without finding new jobs; aid to depressed areas; housing and urban renewal; aid to education; public works; and a raise in minimum wages along with broadened coverage.

The deepening recession, the council declared in its statement, challenges the Kennedy Administration "even before it takes office." It spelled out these ominous signs:

- November unemployment was 6.4 percent, with hours of work lost because of partial unemployment raising it to an equivalent rate in excess of 7.5 percent. If the economy limps along at this rate, the nation will have 5 million unemployed in January, "with a rise to 6 million quite possible."
- Inventories are "alarmingly high;" the automobile industry, alone, has a stockpile of more than 1 million cars.

Labor, Civic Groups Rush Assistance To Evicted Tennessee Sharecroppers

Somerville, Tenn.—Organized labor has joined forces with citizens' groups from across the nation to give emergency assistance to 75 Negro sharecroppers evicted from their homes, allegedly for voting in the November election.

Giving impetus to the drive for aid, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced in Washington, D.C., that the Executive Council had voted a $2,000 contribution to the Tennessee State AFL-CIO to help buy food and clothing for the evicted sharecroppers.

At the same time the council directed the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee to conduct a campaign to assist the families involved.

The 75 Negroes, many of them small children, are huddled together in a tent city which they have proudly named Freedom Village.

They are the vanguard of some 700 sharecroppers from Fayette and Haywood Counties facing the threat of loss of homes and jobs in a mass reprisal for a two-year campaign to register and vote.

The Justice Dept. has charged landowners in the two counties with engaging in an organized conspiracy in a case regarded as the first major test of the federal government's powers under the Voting Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

In Cincinnati, O., the U.S. Court of Appeals issued a narrowly framed injunction barring evictions in repraisal for voting but permitting landowners to evict tenants for "legitimate" reasons. Since the Tennessee farm operators contend the sharecroppers' jobs are being eliminated because of automation,

OFFICERS AND STAFF MEMBERS of Molders launch "back-to-school" program with week-long industrial engineering training course at University of Wisconsin's School for Workers. Course, conducted jointly by university and AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, is part of Molders' long-range time study and job evaluation program that will provide six weeks of training over a three-year period.

Staff Training Program Launched by Molders

Madison, Wis.—Selected officers and staff members of the Molders attended a week-long industrial engineering school at the University of Wisconsin's School for Workers here, as the prelude to a three-year training program worked out by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The program, established by Molders Pres. William A. Lazzerini and the union's executive board, will provide key personnel with at least six full weeks of training over the next three years in time study, predetermined motion time systems, wage incentives, job evaluation and other aspects of wage determination.

The "back-to-school" program was launched by the union, an article in the current issue of the union's Journal declared, because job evaluation systems "were being foisted upon our members by many unscrupulous employers."

The union's first step to counteract what it said were management "gimmicks" was the establishment of an Industrial Engineering Committee to study the problems and develop a program to train officers and staff members.

The committee enlisted the aid of Bertram Gottlieb, industrial engineer in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, who laid out the long-range training program, part of which will be linked to the 1961 Industrial Engineering Institutes which the federation will conduct at the School for Workers.

Working with Gottlieb in presenting the first of the time study institutes here was Norris Tibbetts of the School for Workers faculty.

Molders officers taking part in the intensive training program were Vice Presidents Mario Belmessieri, Bernard Butsavage, Thomas Shea, Carl Studenroth and Anton J. Trizna, and Asst. Sec. Reginald C. Bigsby.

Auto Negotiations Top Bargaining Schedule

Negotiations between the Auto Workers and the automobile industry's "Big Three"—General Motors, Ford and Chrysler—will highlight the nation's collective bargaining picture during 1961.

The automobile industry contracts, covering more than 600,000 UAW members, expire in August. Also up for negotiations late in the year will be the Auto Workers' pacts with the smaller companies in the automobile field and the union's agreements with the agricultural implement industry. An additional 200,000 unionists will be affected by these negotiations.

All told, 1961 will see contract negotiations covering more than 2 million workers. In addition, according to Labor Dept. estimates, some 3 million workers will receive deferred wage increases this year as the result of contracts negotiated in 1959 and 1960.

Not included in any compilations—but still of major importance because of their total effect on the collective bargaining picture—are thousands of contracts which will be negotiated in 1961 by building trades unions, other crafts and industrial unions at the local or regional level.

In addition to the automobile and farm implement contracts, 1961's negotiations will center on the Rubber Workers' pacts with Firestone, Goodyear and U.S. Rubber—involving nearly 70,000 workers — which expire in April and May; the contract of 35,000 Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers members with the electrical division of General Motors; Packinghouse Workers and Meat Cutters contracts with Armour, Swift and Wilson, covering 25,000 workers; the pacts between the Ladies' Garment Workers and the dress manufacturers' associations, involving 84,000 unionists; and the Maritime Union's agreements with Atlantic and Gulf Coast shippers, affecting 37,000 seamen.

Wage Reopeners Possible

The 1961 collective bargaining picture could also include negotiations in the aircraft, telephone and railroad industries, where contracts permit wage reopeners during the year. Another 1 million workers potentially could be involved in any reopener talks.

The automatic wage increases which take effect in a number of key industries this year range from 14.3 cents an hour in the construction industry downward to 6.4 cents an hour in the clothing industry.

AFL-CIO Dept. of Research Reports:

Survey Shows Major Gains In Pension Plan Negotiations

The amounts payable under union-negotiated pension plans have been increased in recent years to make up for rises in the cost of living and to boost retirement income closer to pre-retirement earnings, the AFL-CIO declared.

The current issue of Collective Bargaining Report, published monthly by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, also pointed out that the trend at the bargaining table has been to win improvements in pensions to permit early retirement, to provide for disability pensions and to ease eligibility requirements.

"The general inadequacy" of social security benefits has been recognized by both employers and unions, the Report said, and this recognition "has led to the widespread union negotiation of private pension plans to supplement the income available to retiring workers from the government program."

Originally, the publication noted, many of the negotiated pension plans "tied their benefit formula directly to the social security benefits," by providing that pension plans would merely make up the difference between social security amounts and a specified pension level.

Benefit Set Independently

"This is no longer true," the Report went on, pointing out that "plans now ordinarily calculate their benefits independently of amounts provided by social security," with the result that any increases in social security benefits voted by Congress "will be received fully by the retiring workers rather than going to reduce" management's liability under negotiated plans.

Collective Bargaining Report based its study of pension plans on a recently completed Labor Dept. survey of 300 major plans in effect in 1959. The plans surveyed covered approximately 4.7 million workers—approximately half of all workers under collectively bargained pension plans in the U.S.

The Labor Dept. study showed that while amounts payable under negotiated pension plans range widely, the great majority now provide workers retiring at age 65 after 30 years' service a monthly pension ranging from $70 to more than $100 a month.

When added to primary social security benefits, this would mean retirement income of $180 to $220 monthly. Such retirement benefits average from 40 to 55 percent of gross earnings while employed.

Early Retirement Option Common

The figures compiled by the Labor Dept. showed that provisions permitting "early" retirement, usually at age 55 or 60, on a reduced pension, have now become "typical practice," the AFL-CIO publication reported. Some 75 percent of the 300 pension plans surveyed now include such provisions for both men and women, and another 4 percent include this practice for women only.

"By contrast," the Report said, "a similar survey seven years ago found only 55 percent of the plans had early retirement provisions."

Although early retirement benefits under most plans are less than those available at age 65, a new feature added in recent years through negotiation in the auto and rubber industries provides for a special, higher benefit to workers "whom management chooses to retire early or who are retired on the basis of a joint decision," the publication continued.

Benefits payable under such compulsory or negotiated systems are substantially higher—generally from two to four times—than the normal early retirement benefit. The special benefit continues until normal retirement age or the time the worker becomes eligible for social security benefits, at which time the plan's normal benefits become applicable, the Report said.

S. M. Levitas Dies, Edited New Leader

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has expressed labor's deep regret at the death of Samuel M. Levitas, 66, executive editor of The New Leader.

Levitas, who edited the liberal weekly magazine for 30 years, died in New York City after a brief illness.

In a telegram to Myron Kolatch, assistant managing editor of The New Leader, Meany described Levitas as "a staunch liberal, a true believer in democracy and an unrelenting foe of communism."

Meany added that "his editorial pen, which labor will sorely miss, always reflected his liberalism and his humane ideals."

Ontario Labor to Call Unemployment Parley

Toronto, Ont.—The Ontario Federation of Labor, representing nearly half of the 1.1 million members of the Canadian Labor Congress, has announced plans for a public conference on unemployment.

The meeting, the date of which is to be announced soon, is expected to attract economists, welfare experts and community spokesmen who will undertake to map long-range and short-range plans for creating badly-needed jobs.

In announcing the parley, the federation executive board asserted that current discussions about joblessness, including government and press discussions, are to some extent "too negative."

"These discussions reach a climax during the time of the year (winter) when the jobless problem is acute," the board said, "and are buried when the problem lessens."

But, it continued, with unemployment levels at about 5 percent of the labor force throughout the year, the problem has become a chronic one which requires basic solutions.

Separate Unions Rejected

The federation at its recent convention rejected proposals to form separate unions of the unemployed. Instead it called for a stepped-up program of public works, low-rental housing and other public enterprises; stimulation of exports; the 40-hour week; elimination of the time limit on unemployment compensation benefit payments, and adoption of the principles of democratic planning for the nation's economic development.

The Steelworkers, with 60,000 members in its Canadian Dist. 6, and the Auto Workers in the Toronto area have announced plans for local unemployment committees.

USWA Dist. Dir. Larry Sefton said the local committees will work at national, provincial and local levels to promote increased public works, a shorter workweek and the widest use of the federal program for retraining jobless workers. The union "does not intend to abdicate its responsibility" to unemployed members, he stressed, and has no intention of segregating them in separate organizations.

Reg. Dir. Dennis McDermott said the UAW will set up facilities to help the jobless with problems involving unemployment insurance and welfare and legal matters.

Economy 'Static'

Announcement of the parley on unemployment came shortly after the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported that the economy had remained static during the third quarter of 1960 and that the gross national product declined for the second quarter in a row and was only fractionally higher than a year earlier.

Unemployment, the bureau reported, was running at an average of 7 percent of the labor force for the first nine months of 1960 compared with 6.3 percent in the same period of 1959.

Finance Minister Donald M. Fleming said a number of developments, "most of them originating abroad," combined to slow down the Canadian economy. They included a decline in world prices of raw materials and "temporary" capacity to produce above the demand, especially in North America.

Another factor of significance has been a sharp drop in housing starts. DBS figures showed starts on 69,637 units in the first 11 months of 1960, compared with 98,988 starts in the same period of 1959.

Leftist Group Faces Ouster In Venezuela

Democratic forces in the central committee of the Venezuelan Federation of Labor (CTV) took the offensive against a leftist coalition at a meeting in Caracas and filed charges of violation of trade union discipline against five members, according to word received in Washington.

The democratic bloc supports the administration of Pres. Romulo Betancourt and has been under heavy fire from a left wing group composed of Communists and members of the Movement of Revolutionary Left (MIR).

Martin Ramirez, Eloy Rorres and Rodolfo Quintero, Communists, and Americo Chacon and Jose Marcano of the MIR were specifically accused of trying to call general strikes in violation of CTC policy, during October and November for the purpose of overthrowing the Betancourt government.

The central committee called a special convention of the CTV to act on the findings of the trial board and to elect new leadership if the anticipated expulsion is carried through.

The committee also abrogated the agreement on solidarity and mutual aid signed in 1959 with the Confederation of Cuban Workers (CTC), specifying that it will be reinstated when civil rights and trade union freedom are re-established in Cuba.

Under Landrum-Griffin Act:

NLRB Bars Union's Information Pickets

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that a union conducting informational picketing asking the public not to buy the products of a struck mattress company in Birmingham, Ala., was guilty of violating the secondary boycott sections of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act.

The union, Local 261 of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, is expected to appeal the ruling to the courts in defense of its constitutional right to free speech. For 14 days last March union pickets, one at a time, carried signs in front of customer entrances of retail furniture stores in Birmingham. The signs asked the public not to buy products of the Perfection Mattress and Spring Co., of the same city.

That was illegal, the NLRB ruled. In forbidding such picketing, the board ruled that the picketing "coerced" employers to cease doing business with the manufacturer and also sought to induce employes of neutral employers to strike or quit work.

The board decision held that the picketing, even though conducted during hours when employes of secondary firms were not going to work or leaving at the end of the day, was inducement of the secondary employes to strike. The picketing does not have to result in an actual work stoppage to be a violation, the board ruled.

The decision was signed by Chairman Boyd Leedom and Members Philip Ray Rogers and Joseph A. Jenkins. John H. Fanning concurred in the finding that the consumer picketing constituted restraint of the retail furniture dealers. He dissented from the majority decision that the picketing was directed to employes.

The decision marked the second time the board has ruled against the local in its dispute with Perfection Mattress. The earlier case was decided under provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act before the 1959 amendments. Fanning also dissented in that case. The union won a temporary victory when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia refused to issue an order enforcing the NLRB's decision.

The latest board ruling means if upheld, observers pointed out, that a union in a dispute with a primary employer may not under any circumstances place pickets in front of a retail store to urge customers not to buy products of the primary employer.

Consumer picketing in such cases is not, the board ruled, protected by the law's "publicity" section, which says: "Nothing contained in this paragraph shall be construed to prohibit publicity, other than picketing, for the purpose of advising the public . . . as long as such publicity does not have the effect of inducing any individual employed by any person other than the primary employer . . . to refuse to pick up, deliver, or transport any goods, or not to perform any services, at the establishment of the employer engaged in such distribution."

As a background of Local 261's dispute with Perfection Mattress, the union won an NLRB election on July 25, 1958. Members rejected a "meager offer" of a 5-cent an hour wage increase and struck Oct. 14, 1958. On Nov. 23, 1958, the Alabama RWDSU Council called for a boycott by members.

Picketing was halted after the NLRB ruled against the union on the Taft-Hartley case but was resumed last March. The employers again carried their fight to the NLRB.

Savings Bond Plan Marks 20th Year

The Liberty Bell on the steps of the U.S. Treasury Dept. building in Washington was rung loudly and clearly to mark the 20th anniversary year of the United States Savings Bond program.

Present for the ceremonies were guests representing the principal groups which have given sustained support to the program which was launched as the nation's defense preparation moved into high gear, less than a year before America's entrance into World War II.

The AFL-CIO, represented by Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, was one of the organizations invited to take part in the anniversary program. Participants included both outgoing Treasury Sec. Robert B. Anderson and the incoming Sec.-designate C. Douglas Dillon, currently Undersecretary of State.

Both Anderson and Dillon joined in ringing the bell, a replica of the original Liberty Bell in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, which in 1776 "proclaimed liberty through the land."

Rails, Mines Represented

Labor representatives at the ceremony included Vice Pres. W. D. Johnson of the Railway Conductors and Vice Pres. Elwood Moffett of the Mine Workers. William H. Neal, national director of the bond program, introduced the guests and the Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, chaplain of the Senate, gave the invocation.

Anderson, the only speaker, said the combination of payroll savings plans and individual purchases has brought ownership of Series E and H bonds to a record level of $43 billion.

Reinstate 300 Clerks, Arbitrator Orders Sears

not be deducted from the backpay awards because it amounted to a bonus for prior service; and that all other benefits, including vacation credits, profit sharing credits and medical benefits shall accrue to the employes as though they had continued working.

6. That employes demoted or transferred must be put back on jobs where their earnings will be no less than in the 52 weeks prior to the lockout and that part-time employes must be guaranteed as much work and income as they received in the same prior period.

7. That if the company delays payment of the awards for any reason, it shall be required to pay the employes 7 percent interest on the amounts due from Dec. 31, 1960.

8. That employes hired by the company as replacements during the lockout shall not have status superseding reinstated employes, or be permitted to dilute or diminish earnings of the latter.

The arbitrator's ban on back pay to employes who actively participated in the boycott against the stores was based on a finding that while they were locked out they were required to rely on the arbitration clause of the labor-management contract rather than seek more active retaliation against their employer, even though the picketing was wholly lawful.

With the exception of this one provision, the arbitrator's decision fully upheld the contentions of RCIA Locals 110 and 410 which were represented in the proceedings by their counsel, Roland C. Davis.

Suffridge Sees Victory

Commenting on the decision, Retail Clerks Pres. James A. Suffridge said:

"It fully confirms our complaints against the anti-union policies of Sears, Roebuck. Undoubtedly, it will become the turning point for victory in our determined campaign to secure justice for employes of all Sears, Roebuck stores."

Labor's nationwide boycott of Sears originally voted by the San Francisco Labor Council and later given the unanimous support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council will continue, the union said.

Insurance Study Shows Aged Lack Health Care

Less than half the nation's elderly persons have any form of health care insurance, according to a report published by the U.S. Public Health Service.

The report estimated that 46 percent of all persons over 65 have hospital insurance, 37 percent have surgical insurance, and only 10 percent have insurance covering doctor bills for non-surgical care.

The statistics are expected to bolster the position of the incoming Kennedy Administration when it sends to Congress a proposal for health care for the aged operated and financed through the social security system.

Pres.-elect Kennedy and Democratic congressional leaders recently placed enactment of such legislation on the list of five immediate goals for the new Administration after it takes office Jan. 20. Kennedy sponsored legislation aimed at putting health care for the aged under social security in the 86th Congress.

The social security approach, backed by the AFL-CIO was shelved by a conservative coalition with the backing of Pres. Eisenhower, and Congress instead enacted a program of federal grants to state public assistance plans to help defray some health costs for the medically indigent.

Only 5 States in Program

The Wall Street Journal reported recently that only five states—Michigan, Oklahoma, Massachusetts, West Virginia and Kentucky—have set up medical assistance plans under this program, with benefits and eligibility requirements varying sharply between the several states.

The business publication called this a "narrower, slower beginning" than the Eisenhower Administration had hoped for, with only a "trickle" of federal funds going out to the state programs.

Some states—including New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Arizona, Maine and Texas—have decided against participating in the federal-state plan, geared to means tests, the Journal declared. New York's Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller has denounced the present approach as "inadequate" and has repeatedly supported the social security approach.

Distillery Workers' Monitorship Removed

The Distillery Workers Union has been removed from AFL-CIO monitorship effective Jan. 1, 1961, by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

In a letter to Distillery Workers Pres. Mort Brandenburg, Meany wrote that on the basis of a report from Peter M. McGavin, who served as monitor for the union, the monitorship was being terminated.

Earl R. Kinley of Rail Clerks Dies

Cincinnati—Earl R. Kinley, Sr., a vice president of the Railway Clerks, died here on New Year's Day after a short illness. He was 68.

A longtime associate of union Pres. George M. Harrison, Kinley joined the BRC in 1919 and helped organize the first local on the Milwaukee Road. Named by union members as general chairman on the line in 1920, he served in that post until 1940, when he came here to assist Harrison in handling BRC disputes with management. He was elected a vice president in 1955 and re-elected in 1959.

He is survived by his wife, Ruth, two sons and a daughter.

Oil Industry Accepts OCAW 14c Pattern

Denver, Colo.—General wage increases of 14 cents an hour are spreading through the oil industry as a result of negotiations by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Following a pattern-setting nationwide contract with the Sinclair Oil Corp. last month, OCAW locals have won similar agreements at major plants of Humble, Texaco, Gulf, Pure Oil, Cities Service, Quaker State, Mobil Oil and Shell Oil companies.

Some plants of these companies are still offering a substitute plan of a 5 percent raise which, while it would average about 14 cents an hour, runs counter to the across-the-board policy established by the OCAW's national bargaining policy committee.

At a meeting Jan. 3, the policy committee unanimously voted not to approve percentage wage increases but to insist that every member in the oil industry must receive an increase of at least 14 cents. Any further adjustment of wages, the committee said, should be handled on the basis of adjustment of inequities.

OCAW spokesmen predicted that by the end of January nearly all of the union's 96,000 oil workers will have secured the raise and that it will have spread to nearly 500,000 other oil industry employes, including supervisors, technicians and unorganized groups of workers.

All new contracts being signed permit reopening for wages on 60 days notice—a major breakthrough from the industry's original demand that the pay increase be tied to a two-year contract.

Union Entertainers Give Show at Prison

San Francisco—Union entertainers here have once again donated New Year's Day to bringing a touch of cheer to several thousand inmates of the California State Prison at San Quentin.

The 46th annual Show of Stars, produced by William Van Ornum, enlisted the voluntary services and cooperation of members and officers of the Variety Artists, Musicians, Theatrical Stage Employes in a six-hour variety show.

Hope For the Aged

THE WHITE HOUSE Conference on Aging in Washington will focus long overdue national attention on a problem that an indifferent nation has been sweeping under the rug.

The passage of the Social Security Act in 1935 removed the poorhouse from the American landscape and created a system of social insurance with provisions for old age pensions. In the intervening years retirement benefits have been increased and other improvements written into the law. On the industrial and business front, unions scored notable victories in securing pensions and other benefits for older people.

But the experience of the past decade is that the retired worker is living out his years at a subsistence level, if that. And the fact of the new decade is that more and more of the population will be in the older person classification.

Organized labor is participating in the White House conference in terms of the general welfare of the nation, not as a special interest group. Retired workers do not pay dues to unions; there is no "labor angle" to the programs offered by the AFL-CIO.

It is important that the conference in the widest possible sense dedicate itself to the problems of the aged rather than to the special interests of any one group participating in the discussions.

The job of providing a decent standard of living for older Americans who have made their contribution to the nation's progress is a job for all elements in our society. The problems of the aging are a national concern and require a national solution.

If the White House Conference on Aging pricks the conscience of America and makes the problems of the aging a national concern it will have succeeded.

A Time to Move Again

THERE ARE two dominating factors bearing directly on the new 87th Congress and the interaction of these factors may well determine the record of the 1961-62 legislative session.

The older factor—one that has been present for more than two decades—is the continuing strength of the conservative Republican-Dixiecrat coalition. This coalition has dominated congressional decisions since midway through the second Roosevelt Administration. Its basic strength stems from essentially a rotten-borough condition of congressional districting.

The new factor is that for the first time in the past six years both Congress and the White House will be in the hands of the same party. The last three Congresses operated in a framework of divided government—the Democratic Party in control of Congress, the Republican Party in control of the White House.

Because of this division the power of the coalition was heightened to the point where liberal social and economic programs were stymied.

The hope of the 87th Congress is that the liberal Republicans, no longer under the lash of conservative White House discipline, and moderate Democrats, imbued with a new feeling of cohesive direction from a Democratic President in the White House, will join with the liberal Democratic bloc to assure passage of a national program capable of meeting and solving the serious problems of our times.

This hope can be realized if the nearly 69 million Americans who cast ballots in November, the majority of them for a liberal solution to our ills, will make it clear to the 87th Congress their strong belief that America must "move forward again."

AFL-CIO on Aging:

Economic, Health, Social Needs Put Damper on Golden Years

FIFTEEN MILLION PEOPLE over 65 face serious problems in our rapidly changing society.

The higher levels of living made possible by a greatly expanded national output are not being enjoyed by the majority of these citizens.

The changing American scene with its shift from rural to city life and the devastating effects of two world wars and the depression has left many of them physically separated from families, jobs and familiar settings.

Many older people are living in slums. Many cannot buy the food needed for continued good health. Many lack the extra cash essential for hobbies, social and recreational activities, or travel to visit friends and relatives. At a time of life when medical costs are higher than normal, no satisfactory method of insuring against the cost of health care is available for most of the aged.

Anxiety over possible financial disaster resulting from severe illness adds to the fear of illness itself. Good nursing homes are scarce; conditions in many are shockingly bad.

OUR LABOR UNIONS have traditionally made efforts to preserve the health and dignity of older people. The longer years of life experienced today result in no small part from union accomplishments in promoting decent working conditions, shorter hours and safety precautions that conserve strength and health. Through raising levels of earnings, collective bargaining is enabling people to obtain good pensions, to save money for their old age, to buy homes, to have some life insurance.

Substantial progress in providing income as a matter of right for older persons has been made through social insurance legislation and through private pension plans which have resulted largely from the determined efforts of union members expressed in collective bargaining session and in political and legislative action. But these programs, and the public assistance programs available on the basis of need, are inadequate.

Further accomplishments through collective bargaining are hampered by anti-labor laws and anti-union tactics which keep many low-income people from achieving the protection of union membership.

OUR ORGANIZATIONS PARTICIPATE in community activities for older citizens. Many local unions have committees dealing with problems of retired members, help provide social centers for the aged, include older people in their regular education activities, and support counselling programs before and after retirement.

In the last two years increased attention to the urgent health needs of the aged has resulted from the Forand bill for federal health benefits, H. R. 4700, supported by the AFL-CIO. Hearings of the Senate Subcommitte on Problems of the Aged and Aging, headed by Senator Pat McNamara, are providing much valuable information on such problems.

The White House Conference on the Aging, to be held early in 1961, must be made to serve as a useful forum on issues involving the aging. It must come to grips with such basic needs as adequate social insurance programs, housing, medical care and full employment. It must avoid superficial generalities and seek instead to spark immediate action programs aimed at remedying the present ills that beset our aging citizens.

The American Medical Association and some of its affiliated medical societies are organizing their own conference on aging, partly in the hope of preventing the enactment of federal health benefits for the aged. In connection with the activities of the Joint Council to Improve Health Care of the Aged, created by the AMA, labor and other supporters of federal health benefits have been denied an equal opportunity to participate in discussions although spokesmen for commercial insurance companies have been welcomed.

The older people in our nation face problems peculiar to their age group, but in the broadest sense these problems are but a reflection of the economic and social problems of all the people. The problems of income maintenance, housing, health, and respect for the individual are not peculiar to the older groups—it is just that as a result of our not having faced up to the larger issues, they become more acute with advancing age.

Morgan Says:

'Moralizing' Defended as Spur To Conscience of Americans

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ON A RADIO PROGRAM the other night, a lady was asked what New Year's resolutions she planned to make. "Oh," she replied, "I don't make resolutions. I'm retired." Seeming to confuse pledges with wishes, another woman allowed that her resolution would be to have more fun in '61.

Morgan

I am sorely tempted to moralize on those answers as reflecting all too vividly a national state of mind, a dangerous demand for even more self-indulgence; and a retiring detachment from the harsh realities of life instead of facing up to them with high resolve. But I have been privately warned by sources whose wisdom I profoundly respect that I have been doing entirely too much moralizing and humanizing in this corner lately and that I ought to get on with more illuminating analysis if not caustic comment on specific events and circumstances.

And yet, while pleading guilty to the indictment, I respectfully refuse to reform completely. I believe that the conscience, national and personal, has a valuable goading function, the more effective when it is allowed to operate in public view and not locked in a closet where the fuss it makes is more easily muffled.

I also stubbornly believe that whereas man is his own worst enemy he may be induced to become a little less cussed even though I concede on the basis of his record that it may take a frontal lobotomy to make him his own best friend.

IN THAT CONTEXT, I insist that the struggle for recognition and realization of human rights, particularly as portrayed by the American Negro's patiently relentless campaign for first class citizenship, is a struggle in which we all have a basic and inescapable stake, for the Negro is fighting the battle of freedom for every citizen.

It is in that context too, in a mixture of some moral judgment and hope along with expediency that we must regard the other major situations confronting us along the jagged horizon of the New Year. What are some of them?

By most accounts, the dark muddle in Laos has reached such desperate straits that it bears the dubious distinction of being the current top threat to world peace. Our inclination is to blame it on Communist expansion. That dynamic is certainly a principal ingredient in this witches' brew.

But we must ask ourselves, not in recrimination but to condition future actions, how much our bad judgment contributed to the crisis, how much we ignored the counsel of our allies and how much we may have been beguiled by the idea that if we can only spend enough money on military aid we can build a bulwark against communism.

On another tack, it may be even harder for us to take a reasoned approach to the monstrous problem that Latin America presents because Castro, in celebrating the second anniversary of his revolution, continues to maul us so badly. But in a sense we deserve what we are getting because while it is true that we have not completely ignored the poverty and political plunder that are the facts of life of the hemisphere, we have, until now, ignored the consequences of just such a convulsion as Castro's non-palace revolution has produced.

This may be the year in which we have to change our sense of values about a lot of things.

Scientists have already warned us that we are obliged to revise the American insistence on "foolproof inspection" if we are to make progress on disarmament before the fabrication of nuclear weapons becomes an art that everybody can practice. Our romantic hopes about the United Nations are gravely threatened. On the domestic scene, if we are to summon the strength to see us through our countless commitments, management, labor and that restless mass called the public may have to readjust their goals in terms of profits, wages and purposeful productivity.

Oops! Here I am sermonizing all over again and at what a time, too. For this marks the sixth anniversary of these commentaries. As we move into the seventh year of them, I happily reverse the commercial and pay a tribute of thanks and wide-eyed appreciation to my sponsors, the AFL-CIO, and the ABC Radio Network for the rare and responsibility-laden opportunity to speak my mind, such as it is, even to the point of pronouncing moral judgments, now and then, on broadcasting and organized labor, the bitten hands who still feed me.

The judgments may be questionable but the privilege of making them is precious.

Washington Reports:

Douglas, Cooper Stress Need For Aid to Distressed Areas

AREA REDEVELOPMENT legislation will be one of the first objectives of the new Congress, Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), author of three previous bills on that subject, declared in an interview beginning the 1961 series of Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program carried on 450 radio stations across the country.

On the same program Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) urged upon Pres.-elect Kennedy that he take the initiative, immediately after inauguration, to resume "negotiations on such things as nuclear tests, disarmament and Berlin."

Cooper, just returned from a trip to India, the Soviet Union, France and Great Britain, said that people overseas watch to see how well the United States makes democracy work.

"They look to see if we have full employment, to see whether we take care of our people in depressed areas, to see whether we have a good educational system, and they look at our law and order," Cooper said.

DOUGLAS SAID that the area redevelopment legislation presented to Congress this year will be modeled after previous bills, the last two of which were vetoed by Pres. Eisenhower. This time, he asserted, "we know that if the bill passes Congress, Pres. Kennedy will sign it and give his support to the program." Cooper was co-sponsor with Douglas of the 1959 vetoed bill.

Douglas stressed that the 1961 area redevelopment bill although it will aid distressed regions to get on their feet again, will not cure recessions. "It deals only to a slight degree," he asserted, "with the question of national growth."

The Douglas bill would provide low-interest loans, he said, "to help meet the costs of fixed capital, plants, buildings, machinery, equipment. It also would help localities provide facilities to draw industry to these areas."

Cooper reported: "All countries in the world other than the Communist are looking for world leadership to be expressed more definitely and clearly by the U.S. They think of this in terms of our foreign policy and in the way we show democracy at work" at home.

The Kentucky senator, a former ambassador to India, talked with Premier Nehru and other leaders in that country, and with Gromyko, Mikoyan, Kuznetsov and others in Russia.

Referring also to France and England, he said: "I think you might say that with a new Administration in the U.S., there is hope that there will be a new initiative. The Russians did not talk about that very much, but I think they believe there is a new opportunity."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

DEMOCRATS IN THE 87TH CONGRESS were embroiled as soon as the session opened in the familiar struggle between the party's northern and southern wings, and the rate of progress of Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy's legislative program seemed to depend on how the struggle eventually ended. There were problems for the Republicans, however, that should not be overlooked.

Two years ago, in the wake of an election disaster, Republicans who had managed to hold on to their places revealed evidences of ferment.

On the House side, this took the form of moving toward a more doctrinaire and explicit conservatism, apparently on the theory that what the GOP needed for election victories was to avoid a "me, too" attitude toward liberal Democratic legislative proposals.

The longtime House Republican leader, Rep. Joseph Martin (Mass.), was ousted by Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.), whose partisanship was bred in the bloody cockpit of Indiana politics.

Halleck at once moved into what was in effect, if not by formal treaty, a close working agreement with the Democratic chairman of the House Rules Committee, Rep. Howard W. Smith (Va.), and the Halleck-Smith combine was for practical purposes the controlling force in the House.

In the Senate, things ended up the same but GOP liberals at least put up a battle. Senators George D. Aiken (Vt.), Clifford P. Case (N.J.) and John Sherman Cooper (Ky.) led an open battle against the Old Guard's slating of Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) as Republican floor leader.

Aiken had openly criticized Pres. Eisenhower's veto of the 1958 depressed areas bill and a bill for federal contributions to airport construction, saying that the President should know there was a difference between wasteful "spending" and sound government investment to meet public needs.

The liberals got no help from the White House in their fight on Dirksen, although all of them had been Eisenhower Republicans in the bitter 1952 convention fight involving the President and the late Sen. Robert A. Taft. In the end they failed on a 20-to-14 vote to deny Dirksen the leadership.

NOW THE REPUBLICANS have lost another election, including the presidency, and despite Vice Pres. Nixon's extremely close race against Kennedy their gains in Congress were limited.

There is no liberal revolt this year in the ranks of the GOP.

Case of New Jersey, triumphantly re-elected after a bitter primary challenge from self-styled conservative forces in his own party, renewed suggestions that a new image might improve GOP political chances in the future.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.) issued a transitory challenge to re-election of the vocally conservative Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.) as chairman of the GOP Senate Campaign Committee, but after what was called an "air-clearing" verbal clash in the party caucus Goldwater was confirmed in the post by unanimous vote.

Seven lonely House Republicans, six from the East, asked their House caucus to "repudiate" any coalition with conservative southern Democrats aimed at obstructing civil rights and other "constructive" legislation. The party leaders recommended that the resolution be referred to the Policy Committee, where they will sit in judgment of themselves in regard to any GOP-Dixiecrat coalition, tacit or avowed.

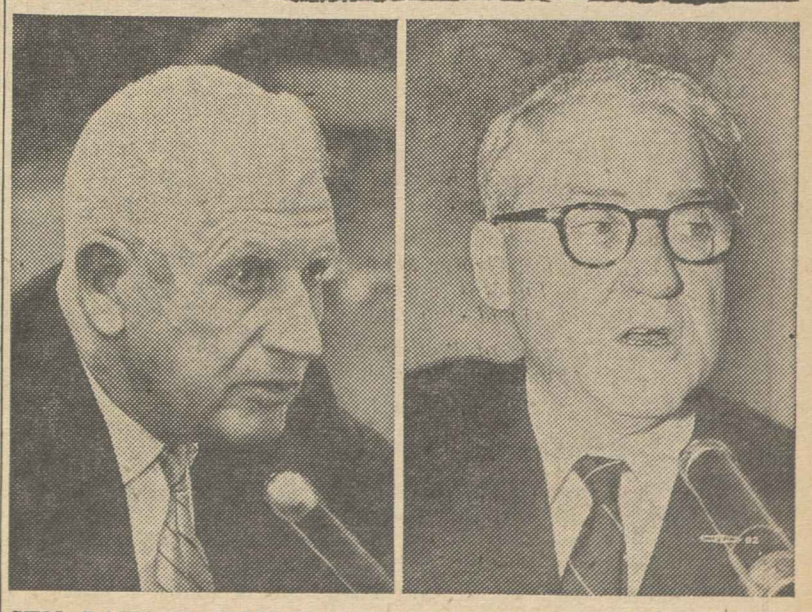
THE SITUATION of the Republicans in Congress must necessarily be on the mind of the President-elect.

Even if changes should be made in House and Senate rules, Kennedy will not be able to command support for many of his legislative proposals from conservative southern Democrats. To build an effective coalition that will pass the bills in the House and Senate, the incoming President will need substantial support from liberally minded Republicans.



SEN. PAUL H. DOUGLAS (D-Ill.), left, predicted that area redevelopment legislation, twice vetoed by Pres. Eisenhower, will be signed by Pres.-elect Kennedy. Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.), after a trip abroad, said that foreign countries expect a new initiative from the U.S. Both were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Emergency Aid Rushed To 'Freedom Village'

the threat remained that the Negroes would be ordered off the farms in wholesale lots.

For the 75 "residents" already occupying Freedom Village — its huge olive-drab Army surplus tents heated only by wood-burning stoves which provide feeble relief during the cold, damp weather—labor and citizens' groups have provided immediate assistance in the form of food, clothing and medical care.

Within hours after the evicted sharecroppers were ordered off the farms, fund-raising activities on their behalf were launched by the Tennessee State AFL-CIO and the Memphis AFL-CIO Labor Council. Coordinating labor's role in this emergency operation is Matthew Lynch, secretary of the state labor body.

Aid also has poured in from the Fayette County Civic and Welfare League, which conducted the voter registration campaign that set the stage for the mass evictions; and from such national organizations as the Committee on Racial Equality, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Theodore Brown, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, one of the first representatives of a national organization on the scene at the tent city, said that in addition to the aid now being given there is urgent need for adequate housing and job opportunities for the displaced families.

Effort Is Needed

"The tragic condition in Haywood and Fayette Counties," Brown declared, "can be corrected if citizens of all races join with local, state and national organizations and move with determined effort."

At the same time, Brown declared, "the elimination of economic reprisals" against Negroes "who dared to register and vote" in the recent election "must be guaranteed by an aroused national citizenry."

Speaking on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, As We See It, carried on stations of the American Broadcasting Co., Dir. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights said the plight of the evicted sharecroppers is of concern to the entire labor movement.

Shishkin said the case "dramatizes the major issue that is before the country today—the issue which labor regards as one of the paramount ones — the guarantee of civil rights to all Americans."

The case came to the fore shortly after the elections in which, for the first time in history, over 60 percent of the 2,000 eligible Negroes in the two rural counties registered and voted. Immediately, the government charged in its court test of the evictions, the sharecroppers who voted were subjected to economic reprisals which included being ordered off the farms and being denied the right to purchase goods at local stores.

Despite claims by farm operators that mechanization made it unnecessary to employ the Negroes, some white landlords who refused to participate in the evictions testified for the government that they had seen copies of a blacklist showing the names of Negro sharecroppers who had voted.

Union Women Credited with Key Vote Role

Women in 1960 took a greater role than ever before in the activities of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education according to a year-end review by the Women's Activities Dept. of COPE.

Tracing the progress made in the four years since the Women's Activities Dept. was set up, Esther Murray, eastern area director, and Margaret Thornburgh, western area director, reported:

- A total of 440 WAD groups are functioning in every state in the nation.
- Full-time, paid WAD directors head operations in 23 states.
- A total of 2,010 trade union women have earned WAD awards for having donated 100 or more voluntary hours to WAD projects.

The year-end review reported as "a conservative estimate" that more than 1 million phone calls were made from WAD telephone centers during the recent election campaign to remind union members to vote and to furnish voting information. More than a million letters were mailed out of WAD offices regarding the campaign issues and candidates.

Douglas Group Submits Blueprint:

Kennedy Puts Top Priority On Aid to Depressed Areas

The 87th Congress was expected to give early attention to depressed areas legislation, with a minimum of time for further public hearings, following a pledge by Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy that he would give the problem "the most important domestic priority."

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), who sponsored area redevelopment legislation vetoed by Pres. Eisenhower in 1958 and 1960, introduced his depressed areas bill Jan. 5. It was patterned after the twice-vetoed measure.

An identical House version of the Douglas bill—calling for $392.5 million in federal loans and grants to economically depressed communities—was filed by Rep. Kenneth J. Gray (D-Ill.) within minutes after Congress formally opened its first session.

Kennedy's call for prompt action to rehabilitate the areas of chronic blight and ease the hardships of the more than 600,000 long-term unemployed in these regions came at a joint press conference with Douglas at which the senator made public the report of a special task force named by the President-elect.

The Douglas group recommended a four-point program calling for:

- Immediate action by the Executive Branch to double the amount of surplus food being distributed by the federal government to needy families in these areas. The report said surplus food distribution to 3.2 million persons in September amounted to only $9.36 a month for a family of four.
- Swift congressional passage of the area development bill providing for $200 million in low interest loans for construction of new plant facilities; $175 million for federal grants and loans for such public facilities as water and sewerage systems; establishment of vocational retraining for jobless workers with federal subsistence payments during retraining; and sending technical specialists to affected areas to help plan needed improvements.
- Emergency extension of unemployment compensation to jobless workers whose standard benefits have been exhausted and who are still without work. Unlike the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958, under which the government made loans for this purpose and states had the option not to take advantage of the plan, this would involve automatic federal grants to aid all exhaustees.
- A special public works program for depressed areas or, if the Kennedy Administration undertakes general public works action to stimulate the lagging economy across the nation, then special attention to projects for blighted areas.

'Entire Nation Suffers'

At the press conference, Kennedy praised the task force report, declaring that "the entire nation suffers when there is prolonged hardship in any locality."

"This problem," said the President-elect, "is especially critical today, for one out of every 10 persons in the United States lives in an area that now feels the impact of chronic unemployment or underemployment."

The nation's depressed areas encompass a population of between 20 and 25 million, Douglas declared, adding that the economic distress affected, directly or indirectly, "a considerable fraction of the people in these areas."

In West Virginia alone, the task force reported to the incoming President, 281,000 people out of a total population of 1.8 million "depended upon surplus food in order to sustain life" in October.

Although the study was made essentially in the deep pockets of recession in West Virginia, the report made it clear that economic distress was not confined to that state but was felt in large areas of Indiana, Illinois, the upper Great Lakes, Pennsylvania, Kentucky and the textile areas of New England.

"There is wide bi-partisan agreement that the distressed area problem cannot be resolved by private initiative alone," the report declared. "Government can lend a helping hand—local and state government as well as the federal government. It is also generally recognized that no one solution—no one plan or legislative enactment — can do the whole job for all distressed areas."

In addition to the four-point immediate program, the Douglas task force called for such long-range action as:

- Federal aid to states for public welfare payments.
- Creation of a government market for industrial mortgages in the same manner that the Federal National Mortgage Association now buys and sells home mortgages.
- Creation of a Youth Conservation Corps, similar to the Civilian Conservation Corps of New Deal days.
- Federal development of parks and forests in depressed areas.
- More federal research to find new uses for coal and minerals.
- Accelerated tax writeoffs for plants locating in depressed areas, with safeguards against runaway plants taking advantage of the program to create new pockets of economic distress elsewhere.

Ruttenberg Says Census 'Undercounts' Jobless

St. Louis—If things are slow in your community and you haven't been out looking for a job because you "know" there's no work, the government interviewer will not count you as jobless unless you volunteer this information.

This Census Bureau rule may well be distorting the nation's rate of unemployment, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Stanley H. Ruttenberg told a session here on the nation's economic indicators. The American Farm Economics Association and the American Statistical Association sponsored the meeting.

"Especially in distressed areas, as well as rural areas, the lack of information on these individuals may result in considerable undercounting of unemployment," Ruttenberg declared.

The failure to count people as unemployed because they are not actively seeking work results in an undercounting of the jobless and the labor force, he added.

In calling for improved data-collecting, Ruttenberg pointed out that past periods of high economic activity produced greater-than-projected increases in the labor force. The five-year period just past was relatively slack, he noted, and the labor force increase was 1.3 million less than the government projected.

Ruttenberg's explanation was "that many people enter the labor force only when it appears that there is a good possibility that they can find employment."

In the area of corporate profits, Ruttenberg proposed changes to close what he termed a lag in the reporting of figures to and then by the government. He urged improvements in the quality of data for the non-manufacturing sectors, which account for 40 percent of all corporate profits and especially for the retail and wholesale trade areas, which account for 16 percent of total profits.

Ruttenberg also proposed that, because 1950 and 1954 tax law changes on rapid amortization and depreciation accounting methods so clearly affect the profit figures reported, the data should be published together to enable a comparison with the pre-1950 period.

The current practice, he explained is to publish corporate profit figures apart from those on depreciation, with the effect of obscuring the relationship.

OVERSEAS CALL, made by Donald P. Hutchins from Naples, Italy, to his father, William R. Hutchins, in Flint, Mich., was among more than 500 free telephone calls donated by the Communications Workers to service men and women in all parts of the world. The "Hi Mom" project is an annual community services activity of the union during the Christmas season. The Dec. 31 issue of the AFL-CIO News carried an erroneous identification of Hutchins.

Calls Farm Conference:

Kennedy Fills Key Sub-Cabinet Posts

Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy, stepping up the tempo of his pre-inaugural activities, has announced his choices for a broad range of sub-Cabinet and White House advisory positions.

At the same time, Kennedy moved his temporary headquarters to New York City's Carlyle Hotel, where he scheduled a major agricultural conference to plan concerted action against what he termed "the farm crisis."

With only two weeks remaining before he takes the oath of office as the nation's 35th chief executive, Kennedy was keeping in close touch with the developing Cuban and Laotian crises. Word of Pres. Eisenhower's decision to sever diplomatic relations with the pro-Communist Castro government in Cuba was relayed through Dean Rusk, slated to be Secretary of State in the new Administration. There were no advance consultations with Kennedy on the move.

New Appointments Made

Rounding out his official family, Kennedy announced his selection of:

- John J. McCloy, a Republican and a New York banker who had served in the Roosevelt and Truman Administrations, to be his principal disarmament adviser and negotiator.
- McGeorge Bundy, a Republican and dean of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences at Harvard University, as his special assistant for national security affairs.
- W. Averell Harriman, former governor of New York and former ambassador to London and Moscow in the Roosevelt and Truman Administrations, as ambassador at large.
- Prof. Archibald Cox of the Harvard Law School, to be Solicitor General.
- Dr. Robert C. Weaver, vice chairman of New York City's Housing and Redevelopment Board, to be the new Housing and Home Finance Administrator.
- Boisfeuillet Jones, vice president and administrator of health services at Emory University, Atlanta, Ga., to be special assistant to the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.
- Robert V. Roosa, research vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, as Under Secretary of the Treasury for Monetary Affairs.
- Lawrence F. O'Brien of Springfield, Mass., director of organization for the Democratic National Committee, to be special assistant to the President for personnel and congressional relations.

At the same time, Kennedy announced that James M. Landis, former dean of the Harvard Law School, had agreed to accept a temporary White House assignment as a special assistant to help plan the overhaul of the federal regulatory agencies. Landis recently submitted a report to Kennedy proposing a major shakeup in personnel and procedure of the quasi-judicial agencies.

Attending the New York farm conference with Kennedy were scheduled to be Agriculture Sec.-designate Orville Freeman and the leaders of nine of the nation's farm organizations. Kennedy expressed the hope that the session would "lead to further meetings . . . to recommend action to relieve the farm crisis."

As the President-elect moved forward with his plans for assuming the nation's leadership, his total of Electoral College votes inched upward to 303 as a complete recount of Hawaii's popular votes gave Kennedy a final margin of 115 votes. This reversed the original figures showing Vice Pres. Nixon, the unsuccessful candidate, had won by 141 votes and thus gave Kennedy 3 additional electoral ballots.

White House Parley To Air Plight of Aged

physicians and qualified lay leaders as possible" named by state governors and to influence statements proposed for consideration by the conference. The AMA last year spearheaded opposition to the Forand bill, backed by the AFL-CIO, which would have provided health benefits to the aged under the social security system.

AMA Executive Vice Pres. F. J. L. Blasingame also told the AMA House of Delegates that its state groups were "encouraged to work with the insurance industry" and other groups in the selection of delegates to the conference. Businessmen's groups and insurance firms joined the AMA in the attack on the Forand bill last year.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther and Joseph A. Beirne are scheduled to speak at concurrent meetings on the opening day.

Meany will address a session on "Highways to Economic Security." Reuther is among the speakers set for a meeting titled "Are Graybeards White Elephants in the Work Force?"

Beirne will be commentator of a session called "Action for the Aging: Individual, Group or Government Responsibility."

Representing labor on the conference's national advisory committee are Nelson H. Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; John Brophy, Industrial Union Dept.; and Charles Odell, Auto Workers.

A post-conference meeting has been set by Joseph P. Anderson, executive director of the National Association of Social Workers, and Cruikshank for social agency, labor and other delegates to consider ways of implementing conference decisions.

Forand Not Invited To Aging Sessions

There was one notable name missing in the long list of 2,800 delegates chosen to participate in the White House Conference on Aging —that of former Rep. Aime J. Forand (D-R. I.), "father" of the plan to provide health care for the aged under the social security system.

Forand could have been appointed by Health, Education and Welfare Sec. Arthur S. Flemming, who had the selection of many delegates in his gift. He could have been appointed by Rhode Island's 1959-60 Gov. Christopher Del Sesto (R). Neither found room for Forand on his list.

New Congress Weighs Procedural Changes

tinue to preside, on request, at future Democratic caucuses.

In the House, veteran Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.) was re-elected in a vote which followed straight party lines, and Rep. John W. McCormack (D-Mass.) was renamed majority leader.

Ike Messages Due

Republicans renamed Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) as minority leader, and Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.) as GOP whip, while in the House, Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) was again chosen to head the minority forces.

Immediately ahead of the new Congress was the last State of the Union Message from outgoing Pres. Eisenhower. Scheduled for Jan. 12, the message will not be presented by Eisenhower in person, but will be read by the House Clerk and the Senate secretary. This will be followed by the GOP Administration's Budget Message and Economic Report.

The new Administration's version of the same report will come from Kennedy after his inauguration Jan. 20 as the nation's 35th chief executive.

The Senate clash over rules changes subjected Vice Pres. Nixon, the presiding officer, to three hours of parliamentary questioning. Following his procedure in 1957 and 1959, when similar fights were waged, Nixon handed down what he termed an "opinion" that the Senate had a right to amend its rules at the opening of each session, and that debate on rules changes could be shut off by a simple majority.

Nixon's opinion, sustaining the position of the liberal bloc, was that Rule 22—which requires the affirmative vote of two-thirds of those present and voting to end debate—did not apply during the period when the body was discussing rules changes.

Two Plans Offered

The debate centered on two proposals: one submitted by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.) would reduce the two-thirds requirement to 60 percent of those present and voting; the other, submitted by Humphrey and Kuchel, would cut off debate on the votes of 51 senators — a constitutional majority—but would insure an additional 100 hours of debate once such a vote was taken.

The House adopted its rules without debate, despite earlier indications by liberals that they might seek changes in procedures that would either increase the size of the Rules Committee, limit its powers or compel it to report measures to the floor within a specified time period.

The lack of any floor fight gave weight to reports that one of the moves being considered behind the scenes was the removal from the committee of Rep. William M. Colmer (D-Miss.), who openly opposed the Kennedy-Johnson Democratic ticket in the presidential campaign.

Colmer and Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) have joined forces with the committee's four conservative Republicans in the past to blockade a series of liberal economic measures.

If the procedure to drop Colmer is followed there are indications he would be replaced by a southern Democrat considered closer to national party policies.

There were also reports that the Democratic leadership was seeking a firm agreement from Smith to guarantee that bills cleared by House committees would reach the floor, as an alternative to the more drastic step of "purging" Colmer.

In opening-day ceremonies, eight new senators were sworn in. They included Democrats Maurine B. Neuberger (Ore.); Lee Metcalf (Mont.); Claiborne deB. Pell (R.I.); Benjamin H. Smith (Mass.), named to succeed Kennedy; William A. Blakeley (Tex.), named to succeed Johnson; J. J. Hickey (Mont.), named to the vacancy created by the death of GOP Sen.-elect Keith Thomson; and Republicans J. Caleb Boggs (Del.) and Jack Miller (Ia.). The Democrats control the new Senate by a margin of 65-35.

Democrats Control House

The House—which the Democrats control by a 262-174 margin, with one race still in doubt—voted overwhelmingly on opening day to leave vacant the seat from the 5th Indiana District pending a decision on the winner.

The original tally showed Republican George O. Chambers the victor by a 12-vote margin, but subsequent corrections of county returns plus a recount of absentee votes indicated incumbent Democratic Rep. J. Edward Roush had won re-election by two votes. An official recount is pending.

Jobless Aid Boost Asked By Mitchell

The nation faces "a problem of growing unemployment" in 1961 and action must be taken to insure that unemployment compensation payments are "of sufficient duration and amount to meet the needs of the times," outgoing Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell has declared.

In his final year-end statement, Mitchell said the jobless problem is complicated by the fact that much of the current unemployment involves "experienced men and women, 1 million of whom have been out of work for over 15 weeks."

The secretary said that when the nation begins recovering from the current slump, the first thing that will happen will be that the hours of workers on short workweeks will be lengthened before laid-off employes are returned to payrolls.

"In such a situation," he declared," unemployment insurance is a first line of defense for individuals and for the economy."

Few Work Stoppages

Reviewing the labor-management picture in 1960, Mitchell said it was a year "highly significant" in industrial relations, with the fewest work stoppages since 1942.

The work stoppages numbered 3,300, he said, involving 1.4 million workers and "matching the post-World War II low reached in 1957." Mitchell added that "idleness due to work stoppages in 1960, at two-tenths of 1 percent of total time worked, was the lowest for any postwar year except 1957."

He also expressed satisfaction that "several important steps were taken toward a better labor-management relationship" during the year.

He cited as examples the agreement by the operating rail brotherhoods and the nation's railroads to submit the work rules issue to a presidential commission; agreement between the unaffiliated West Coast Longshoremen and West Coast shippers on a fund to ease the impact of automation; and the joint Steelworkers-industry creation of a human relations committee to discuss sharing of the benefits of increased productivity.

3,000 Walk Out In New York Meat Strike

New York—A strike of 3,000 wholesale meat workers against three employer associations here has been "100 percent effective" in cutting off supplies of beef, lamb and veal to some 350 suppliers, according to Pres. Karl Muller and Sec.-Treas. Frank Kissel of Meat Cutters' Local 174.

The strike was voted after negotiations on a new contract broke down because of the employers' refusal to grant an acceptable wage increase and additional benefits, Muller said. Attorneys for the employers demanded cutbacks in working conditions and the "worst 'management rights' clause" that Muller ever heard of, he said.

Picketing of wholesale shops began a day after the contract expired Dec. 31. Major hotels and restaurants had full refrigerators but small retail shops, especially kosher butchers, could be expected to feel the effects first, said Muller. Major meatpacking companies and suppliers of pork and poultry were not affected. They are covered by other contracts with Local 174, which has more than 12,000 members.

Labor Maps 20-Point Legislative Plan

Kennedy, Congress Urged to Act To Stem Rising Recession Tide

● Housing starts in 1960 were a quarter million behind 1959.

● Steel, bellwether of the durable goods industries, "stumbles along" at less than 50 percent capacity.

● Plans for private investment in new plant and equipment are being shelved "as present capacity lies idle and prospects are bleak."

"Not only must this deterioration be arrested," the council said, "America must start growing again, at a rate fast enough to absorb our rapid population growth and workers displaced by revolutionary technological changes; fast enough to wipe out poverty and insecurity at home; fast enough to meet our vast obligation to the free world and to insure our security against communist aggression.

"America's own health, moral and economic, is the key to freedom's future everywhere. It must no longer be frittered away."

Health Care Urged

The council also urged action on health care for the aged; enactment of federal standards on the amount and duration of jobless aid; tax revision to stimulate economic growth; revision of Federal Reserve Board policies; an end to exploitation of migrant farm labor; comprehensive revision of labor laws; and restoration to craft unions of the right to picket common building sites.

Also included in the AFL-CIO program were proposals to expand peacetime uses of atomic energy; development of America's natural resources; reform of the laws on immigration and refugees; continued support of mutual security; an end to wage inequities for federal employes plus statutory certification of their bona fide trade unions; and farm legislation designed to support family farms and lower consumer prices.

The Executive Council said sharply that the nation had "faltered through the 50s, victimized rather than enriched by our technological skills, unwilling or unable to cope with the great challenges of the era at home or abroad."

Many steps, it continued, can be taken at once by Pres.-elect Kennedy—in economics and civil rights fields—where by executive action Kennedy can insure civil rights in government employment and on government contracts, school integration, voting and housing, acting under laws already on the statute books.

"But the basic responsibility for prompt action on the platform endorsed by the American people at the polls, as well as on emergency legislation required by the recession, lies with the new Congress," the AFL-CIO declared.

Here is the 20-point program which the council proposed:

● Federal aid to chronically depressed areas, twice vetoed by Pres. Eisenhower in recent years, "must be delayed no longer."

● "Bold action" on housing and urban renewal can help meet one of America's "sorest problems" and help put America back to work. Creation of a federal Dept. of Urban Affairs would insure continuing action.

● Progress on aid-to-education last year was "frustrated by a reluctant Administration and a conservative coalition in Congress." Construction of classrooms will improve education and "help provide jobs for thousands," while aid to teachers' salaries is needed to insure the quality and quantity of teachers.

● Action on a $1.25 minimum wage and coverage for millions of additional workers "must come soon in order to bring a measure of economic justice to workers and to add to the purchasing power on which economic recovery depends."

● Health care for the aged is "another item of nearly-finished business" for Congress. Noting that Kennedy last year was a principal backer of legislation to put health insurance for the elderly under social security, the council said "Congress should proceed at once to pass this sound and humane system for meeting one of the prime needs of our senior citizens." The council also urged a 10 percent increase in social security benefits.

● Immediate action is needed on temporary unemployment benefits for those who have exhausted their payments, plus revisions in the system so that benefits would be at least 50 percent of a worker's average weekly wage up to a maximum of two-thirds the state's average weekly wage for a maximum of 39 weeks.

● The President should have discretionary authority, "subject to disapproval in each instance by Congress," to temporarily reduce taxes to stimulate the economy. If unemployment passes the 7 percent mark, the council urged, the first $10 of withholding taxes should be forgiven each week for a 10-week period. The council urged Congress to close "unwarranted tax loopholes" including dividend credits, capital gains "favoritism," excessive business expense deductions, split income provisions and excessive depletion and depreciation allowances.

● Federal programs for construction of hospitals, roads and airports already in being should be expanded by more generous appropriations to provide more employment and to help reduce chronic shortages. As much as $2 billion in shelved public works projects could be put into effect by federal incentive grants of $300 million, providing 110,000 construction jobs and 170,000 off-site jobs.

● The Federal Reserve Board should be urged to adopt a truly flexible monetary policy calling for purchase of intermediate and long-term bonds to end the decline in interest rates on short-term securities which has led to the outflow of U.S. dollars to foreign countries. At the same time the FRB membership should be revised "to insure competent representation of all basic functional economic groups in the nation."

● Congress should end the "disgraceful exploitation" of migrant farm workers both for "obvious economic reasons (and) for vastly more important moral and social reasons."

● In the area of comprehensive labor legislation, the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts "harshly and unfairly" limit workers' freedom to organize and bargain. Major changes in T-H should include elimination of the section permitting "right-to-work" laws; revision of mandatory injunction provisions; restoration of pre-hearing elections; and realistic modification of secondary boycott and organizational picketing provisions. L-G should be "stripped of those provisions that shackle honest unions" and more effective provisions should be enacted dealing with management misdeeds.

● Situs picketing legislation, thwarted by conservatives last year despite strong bipartisan support, should be passed imediately. "Simple justice demands early action on this measure," the council said.

● Congress should enact an expanded program of peaceful uses of the atom, including the generation of electric power, plus effective federal laws on radiation hazards and workmen's compensation for atomic workers.

● There is "urgent" need for a program of land and water development on a river basis, plus an adequate program for water pollution control.

● "In the non-economic area, no challenge is greater" than assuring equal rights regardless of race, color or national origin. The "legislative arsenal" in the fight on discrimination needs legislation "clearly supporting and implementing" the Supreme Court school desegregation decision, giving the Attorney General the right to institute civil suits, creating a Fair Employment Practices Commission, and eliminating poll taxes "and other voting restrictions." Completely effective civil rights legislation cannot be expected until the Senate's filibuster rule is changed so that debate can be ended "by majority vote."

● Immigration laws must be "liberalized and humanized," by replacing the present national origins system with one which "sheds the present discriminatory features"; the number of quota immigrants should be increased to 250,000; and there should be specific authorization to allow refugees to enter the U.S. during crises such as the Hungarian one in 1956.

● Present concern over the gold outflow "must not serve as a pretext to end or cripple the mutual security program." While our allies have a responsibility "to carry a fair share of the load," America's responsibility "is as great as ever."

● Legislation is needed to give statutory certification to bona fide unions of federal employes and bargaining rights comparable to workers in private industry.

● Farm legislation is needed to base price supports on production payments aimed at support of the family farm and lower consumer prices, with a "reasonable ceiling" on help for any one farm.

● While restoration of economic strength is paramount, "we dare not neglect our military defenses." The nation needs a defense establishment capable of coping with limited as well as total war.

Future Earnings To Pay Severance

New York—A unique agreement in which a relocated company will pay severance pay to former employes out of future earnings has been signed by Local 422, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and the Horsman Doll Co.

The company closed its Trenton, N. J., plant in June 1960 and moved to Columbia, S. C. The 800 workers made a futile effort to buy the company.

Under the agreement, the company will pay 2.5 percent of its profits, before taxes, for the years 1961 through 1963 into a fund which will be distributed to the former employes on a scale based on seniority.

YOU CAN'T JAIL SANTA CLAUS at Christmas time, or even members of the Ladies' Garment Workers attired in Santa costumes while passing out handbills urging shoppers to look for the union label on their purchases. A Chicago policeman found this out when he tried to arrest Queen E. Yow and Lena L. Evans. They were promptly released with apologies and without charges and resumed distribution, accompanied by Philip Oliver, left, ILGWU midwest educational director, and Rep. Donald Wendell, right.

USWA, Steel Industry Confer on Jobs, Output

By Gene A. Kelly

In a meeting described by Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald as "historic," spokesmen of the union and steel management have held their first joint session to discuss problems of low steel production and heavy unemployment in the industry.

McDonald headed a six-man union committee, and R. Conrad Cooper of U.S. Steel Corp. was spokesman for a five-man company committee, which met in Washington, D.C., for two hours. The groups authorized Marvin Miller of the union and R. Heath Larry, U.S. Steel vice president, to draft a program for future discussion, probably after the inauguration of the new President.

In a prepared statement, McDonald said the two committees recognize that "substantial and persistent unemployment" of steel facilities and workers presents a serious problem for the industry and the rest of the nation's economy.

"On the basis of this mutual recognition," he said, "the parties had a frank and helpful discussion of various approaches.

"The union urged support for programs designed to increase purchasing power, to stimulate housing and new construction, provide additional income for the unemployed, institute a program of public works, alleviate distressed areas, and in general to improve the health of the economy."

No agreements were reached, he said, but the discussion was "extremely useful."

"This is a historic step," he added. "The important thing is that we have to sell steel, to get everyone back to work."

Ask Tax Change

Cooper in his prepared statement said the industry group had presented several points for discussion, and that steel employment is at low levels primarily because industry customers are not ordering as much as usual.

"A more realistic approach to depreciation for tax purposes could do much to revive steel industry operations," he said. "Labor leaders should recognize that profits, progress and high employment go together. Continued bargaining and legislative efforts which accentuate the profit squeeze would depress production and employment levels further."

The proper approach, he said, is not artificial stimulation of the economy but the "seeking of ways to lift the burden from the back of the economy" and the industry.

Asked whether the union representatives had asked the industry to "get to work on Capitol Hill,"

McDonald said, "I did—not to help me, but to help the country." Legislation backed by the union was introduced in Congress on the first anniversary of the agreement ending the 1959-60 strike, to stimulate employment, USWA spokesmen said.

McDonald Initiative

The McDonald-Cooper meeting was held as a result of McDonald's invitation to the Steel Companies Coordinating Committee to meet with union executive officers in Washington to discuss the problems caused by layoffs, short work weeks, and a slump in the industry.

The slump slowed steel production to 38.6 percent of capacity for the last week of 1960—lowest rate for a non-strike period since the depression that started in 1929, according to a recent report.

The steel union head urged executive officers of 12 steel companies to meet. The executives turned down this proposal. Instead, U.S. Steel Corp.'s Cooper suggested he and McDonald meet in their capacity as co-chairmen of the Human Relations Research Committee, provided for in the agreement growing out of the settlement of the 1959 steel strike.

McDonald accepted in the hope, he said, that "some fruitful discussion might lead the way toward solution of our mutual problems."

Aging Parley Backs Health Care Plan

Labor Sets 'Priority' Goals To Check Economic Crisis

"POVERTY is the great affliction of the aging," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told delegates to the White House Conference on Aging. Meany, noting that 60 percent of the elderly have annual incomes of less than $1,000 a year, pledged labor's support to any workable health insurance program administered through the social security system. This would be, he said, the greatest national reform in a generation.

AMA Bloc Rebuffed:

Conference Backs Health Care Plan

By Don Gregory

The social security principle of financing health care for the nation's aged was given a major push toward adoption by Congress at the White House Conference on Aging.

Dominating principal sections of the conference, the issue was strenuously debated, tested and endorsed.

Despite heavy American Medical Association opposition, the issue won out by a vote of 170 to 99 in the conference section assigned to consider it. In turn, medical, insurance and business interests opposing it suffered defeat in another section where they attempted to introduce criticism of the proposal.

Final conference recommendations contain only favorable references to the social security method with no adverse criticism recorded officially in any part.

Prior to the opening of the conference, it was evident that the problem of financing health care for the aged would dominate the parley. Well in advance, the AMA admitted publicly it had worked to secure key spots in conference groups for medical, insurance and commercial interests opposing the social security mechanism. Advance registration figures also showed virtually 10 percent of the conference delegates in the AMA camp.

Opening session of the conference, however, saw AMA efforts receive a harsh blow when Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) charged that the AMA had placed its delegates "in sufficient strength in certain work groups to give the nation the impression that the conference does not favor" the social security approach to health care.

One Section 'Topheavy'

McNamara told conference delegates that 92 per cent of the doctors and dentists in a major section of the parley had been assigned to the work group on financing medical costs.

"It is unfortunate that the AMA continues to devote such massive effort to promotion of its 19th century philosophy," McNamara declared. Delegates jamming Constitution Hall cheered McNamara's blast at AMA tactics.

Opening day also saw the social security plan get strong boosts from two former Eisenhower Administration officials speaking at the conference.

Former Health, Education and Welfare Sec. Marion B. Folsom termed it "the logical plan" and said there is no basis for describing it as "socialized medicine." At

AMA Attack On Labor Hit By Meany

The bitter-end opposition of the American Medical Association to social security health care for the aged erupted in the White House Conference in a direct assault on labor.

An AMA press release issued in advance of a scheduled speech by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged the federation president with "attempting to undermine" the assembly for "partisan interests" and engaging in a "rule-or-ruin" campaign of "smear and hostility."

With sardonic emphasis, Meany in off-the-cuff remarks before his speech cited a long list of organizations backing the principle of health care for the aged through the social security system, as proposed in 1959 in a bill by former Rep. Aime J. Forand (D-R. I.).

The AMA attack on Meany followed slashing criticism of the medical group's policies by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) and full public endorsement of the principle of health care through social security by Marion D. Folsom, former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare in Pres. Eisenhower's Cabinet.

Replying to Dr. J. Lafe Ludwig of Los Angeles, spokesman for the AMA in charging a desire for "socialized medicine" to the AFL-CIO, Meany quoted from a booklet printed by the National Association of Social Workers to emphasize the

Eight Steps Urged to End Decline

The AFL-CIO, warning that the nation stands on the "threshold of the gravest economic crisis since the great depression of the 30s," has called on the 87th Congress to give "priority" attention to eight key actions to restore the nation's economic health.

In letters to congressional leaders of both parties, Pres. George Meany spelled out both immediate and long-range goals which labor considers are "essential."

The singling out of eight measures as demanding immediate attention marked the first indication by the AFL-CIO of a "priority" choice among proposals laid before the incoming Administration and Congress by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at a special meeting Jan. 5.

Division of the programs into immediate and long-range categories, drawn up by the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee, was approved by the council in its Jan. 5 special meeting.

The eight-point program included:

- Presidential authority to invoke a $10-a-week cut in personal income taxes for 10 weeks when unemployment exceeds 7 percent.
- Emergency supplementary unemployment insurance, which would cost approximately $205 million a month, including payments to jobless persons with substantial

New Jump In Jobless Rate Seen

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has predicted that December jobless figures, scheduled for release by the government Jan. 13, again would show a greater-than-seasonal jump in unemployment and a jobless rate exceeding 6.5 percent of the work force.

Meany made his forecast in releasing a statement on the impact of the recession adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent special meeting.

"The final unemployment figures for 1960 will again emphasize the magnitude and urgency of the problems confronting the nation in 1961," Meany declared.

"Our studies," he added, "indicate that the national economy would need to grow nearly 10 percent" in 1961 "to reduce unemployment to the 1951-53 rate of less than 3.5 percent.

"Even if the economy grows 5 percent or slightly more—the annual rate that most experts consider to be adequate—unemployment would be cut only to 6 percent.

Positive Action Urged

"This demonstrates the enormous task that faces us. Years of stagnation cannot be overcome in a few months. To approach full employment by the end of 1962, the economy must grow nearly 14 percent over the two-year period.

"Positive government action is essential to turn the tide."

The Executive Council said the

Two Post Office Unions Agree on Merger Plan

Two AFL-CIO postal unions have announced agreement on a merger plan which, if ratified, will lead to a three-way unification of formerly competing postal clerk unions this spring.

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the 100,000-member Post Office Clerks and Pres. Paul A. Nagle of the 25,000-member Postal Transport Association headed the 10-member joint committee which signed the merger pact after four days of negotiations.

Third Union Represented

Present for the signing ceremony was Pres. Joseph Thomas of the unaffiliated 35,000-member United National Association of Post Office Craftsmen which, last October, reached a similar merger agreement with the Post Office Clerks. UNAPOC members are currently balloting in a referendum on ratification of the merger.

Nagle said the NPTA's board of directors has voted endorsement of the merger agreement and plans to reconvene the union's national convention this spring to act on ratification of the proposal.

Last year, NPTA members voted down a referendum proposal for

Kennedy Announces Selection Of Six Top Labor Dept. Aides

Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy has announced selection of six key officials for the Labor Dept. to complete the naming of the top echelon which will serve under Labor Sec.-designate Arthur J. Goldberg.

Included in the list were a lawyer, a business executive, the president of a state central body, and three union staff representatives.

Kennedy's Labor Dept. appointments included:

● W. Willard Wirtz, 48, a Chicago law partner of Adlai Stevenson, to serve in the department's No. 2 job, that of Under Secretary of Labor. Wirtz served as chairman of the Wage Stablization Board in 1946 during the Truman Administration.

● James J. Reynolds, 54, a Schenectady, N.Y., management consultant and recently a vice president of ALCO Products, Inc., to be Assistant Secretary. Reynolds served on the National Labor Relations Board from 1946 through 1951.

● Jerry R. Holleman, 41, of Austin, Tex., a member of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, as Assistant Secretary. Holleman has served as president of the Texas State AFL-CIO since its creation in 1957, and for four years prior to that was executive secretary of the Texas State Federation.

● George L-P Weaver, 48, assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, as a special assistant to the secretary.

Weaver, an adviser at two Intl. Labor Organization conventions, worked nearly three years in Asia for the AFL-CIO and the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. He is slated to become Assistant Secretary for Intl. Affairs upon the completion of George Lodge's term of service in June.

● Mrs. Esther Peterson, 54, legislative representative of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., to be an assistant to the Secretary and director of the Women's Bureau.

A former assistant education director and later legislative representative for the Clothing Workers, Mrs. Peterson has served on the Labor Dept.'s Advisory Committee on the Women's Bureau.

● Charles Donahue, 48, research director of the Plumbers and Pipe Fitters, to be Labor Dept. solicitor.

A lawyer, Donahue served previously as an assistant solicitor in the department from 1939 until 1953, with the exception of three years of military duty and a year's service as labor counsel to the Democratic Policy Committee on Capitol Hill during the unsuccessful Taft-Hartley repealer fight in 1949.

Filibuster Battle Deferred:

House Rules Fight Nearing Showdown

The House moved toward a showdown designed to end conservative domination of the powerful Rules Committee and the Senate deferred action on proposed rules changes aimed at making it easier to end filibusters as the 87th Congress neared the end of its second week.

The procedural moves came as Pres. Eisenhower sent to Capitol Hill his ninth—and last—State of the Union Message, devoted in the main to a review of the Republican Administration's eight years in office.

The President said that he was not outlining for Congress a course for the future because "the American people, in free election, have selected new leadership which soon will be entrusted with the management of our government." Eisenhower did not appear personally before Congress to deliver the message; it was read by the clerk of the House.

After highlighting the events of the past eight years, Eisenhower conceded he was not "implying that all is well—that all problems are solved," and ticked off both the foreign and domestic problems which his Administration is leaving as a legacy to Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy.

"At home," Eisenhower conceded eight days before leaving office, "several conspicuous problems remain: promoting higher levels of employment, with special emphasis on areas in which heavy unemployment has persisted; continuing to provide for steady economic growth and preserving a sound currency; bringing our balance of payments into more reasonable equilibrium and continuing a high level of confidence in our national and international systems; eliminating heavily excessive surpluses of a few farm commodities; and overcoming deficiencies in our health and educational programs."

Cites Berlin Threat

Abroad, he declared, "there is the continuing Communist threat to the freedom of Berlin, an explosive situation in Laos, the problems caused by Communist penetration of Cuba, as well as the many problems connected with the development of the new nations in Africa."

The move to break the coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans on the Rules Committee, scheduled to go before the Democratic caucus and then the full House some time before the inauguration, was disclosed by veteran Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.).

The proposal calls for enlarging the committee—which now has 8 Democrats and 4 Republicans—to make the composition 10 Democrats and 5 Republicans. This presumably would permit the naming of two Democrats whose views more closely follow national party policies and thus break the tie created in the past when Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) and Rep. William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) voted with the four GOP members to block liberal economic measures.

Rayburn said the move to enlarge the committee would be the "painless way" of solving the problem, as opposed to earlier suggestions that Colmer be "purged" from the committee for having opposed the Kennedy-Johnson ticket during the presidential campaign.

Pledge from Mansfield

The Senate, meanwhile, ended nearly two weeks of debate over filibusters by voting 50 to 46 to send the question of proposed changes to the Rules Committee for study. The vote came after Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), Rules Committee chairman, pledged that the committee would send to the floor this session one of the proposals to limit debate.

The Senate controversy centers on Rule 22, which was amended slightly two years ago so that two-thirds of those present and voting could shut off a talkathon. Sent to committee for study were two proposals. One would permit cutting off debate by a simple majority of the total Senate, while the other would end a filibuster on the vote of 60 percent of that body.

On the rollcall vote, 32 Democrats and 18 Republicans voted to send the question to committee, while 31 Democrats and 15 Republicans favored an immediate floor showdown on the issue.

IRS Modifies Policy on Taxing Strike Benefits

The Internal Revenue Service has announced it is modifying its rulings on strike benefit payments in view of a six-month-old Supreme Court decision involving benefits paid by the Auto Workers to a Kohler Co. striker.

The high court held that a jury was within its rights in deciding that $565 in benefits paid to a non-union member, Allen Kaiser, could have been a "gift" from the union rather than "a recompense for striking," and thus subject to taxes.

In reaching its decision in Kaiser's case, the court said juries were entitled to take into account such factors as the form and the amount of the benefits, the conditions of personal need, the lack of other sources of income, and the availability of public assistance in determining whether strike benefits were given out of "generosity or charity."

On the basis of this ruling, the IRS announced, it would in the future exempt from federal income tax strike benefit payments in cases presenting facts "substantially like" those in the case of the Kohler striker.

The high court's failure to lay down specific rules regarding taxes on strike benefits, as the IRS had requested, means that the federal tax agency will continue to scrutinize cases involving strike benefits to see if they fit the pattern described by the court, the IRS said.

Canadian Appointed To ILO Ottawa Post

Geneva—Deputy Minister of Labor Arthur H. Brown of Canada has been named director of the Intl. Labor Organization's branch office in Ottawa, Ont., ILO Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse has announced.

Steelworkers Name New General Counsel

Appointment of the law firm of Feller, Bredhoff and Anker as general counsel for the Steelworkers has been approved by the union's international executive board, Pres. David J. McDonald has announced.

The appintment, effective at once, filled the vacancy created by the resignation of Arthur J. Goldberg after his designation as Secretary of Labor in the Kennedy Administration. David Feller and Elliot Bredhoff are partners in the firm formerly headed by Goldberg. Jerry D. Anker has been employed by the firm since 1958.

Building Trades Scales Rise to $3.66 Average

Hourly pay rates of union building trades workers rose 14 cents to an average rate of $3.66—a 4.1 percent increase—in the year ending last July 1, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported in its 54th annual survey of wages in the building and construction industry.

The advance was 2 cents less than in the preceding 12 months. It was about the same as the gain registered in the year ending July 1, 1958, BLS said.

Electricians (inside wiremen) and tile layers' helpers led the upward movement with average hourly gains of 20 and 19 cents, respectively.

Rates As Of July

BLS reported that average rates per hour last July 1 were $3.66 for all building trades, $3.86 for journeymen alone, $2.88 for helpers and laborers.

For individual trades, BLS gave these changes in the highest journeymen rates:

Bricklayers, up 12 cents an hour to an average rate of $4.17; boilermakers, up 17 cents to $4.11; plasterers, up 16 cents to $4.06; stone masons, up 13 cents to $4.04; plumbers, up 12 cents to $4.01; electricians, up 20 cents to $4; lathers and pipefitters up 14 cents to $4.

The report listed these average rates for other journeymen: machinists and structural steelworkers $3.96, elevator constructors $3.95, mosaic and terrazzo workers $3.93, marble setters $3.91, asbestos workers and sheet metal workers $3.90, rodmen $3.86, tile layers $3.84, carpenters $3.78, cement finishers $3.75, roofers $3.62 and $3.61, painters $3.55, glaziers $3.53, paperhangers $3.52.

Average rates for helpers and laborers ranged, according to the BLS report, from $2.51 to $3.18 an hour.

The bureau said the wage scales do not reflect rates for apprentices or overtime and other premium rates and therefore do not represent actual hourly earnings.

In Reports to Kennedy:

Task Forces Put Spotlight On Problems Facing U.S.

Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy, stepping up the tempo of his pre-inaugural activities, has received a succession of reports from special task forces on the scope of problems—ranging from health care for the aged to space exploration—which will face his new Administration.

At the same time plans were discussed for a White House conference on Jan. 19 between outgoing Pres. Eisenhower and the man who the following day will succeed him as the nation's 35th chief executive. Attending the meeting will be some officials of the Eisenhower Administration and some of Kennedy's choices for Cabinet posts.

The President-elect, in his first formal speech since his election on Nov. 8, spelled out for a joint session of the Massachusetts legislature a strict code for his Administration based on "courage, judgment, integrity and dedication" which, he pledged, "will characterize our government's conduct in the four stormy years that lie ahead."

The pre-inaugural planning took place against the backdrop of the final archaic rites of the American election system, as Kennedy was officially declared the winner of the closest election in the 20th century.

Nixon Announced Results

A joint session of Congress heard Vice Pres. Nixon, the defeated Republican presidential candidate, announce the official tabulation of the Electoral College vote which Kennedy won by a margin of 303 to 219, with Sen. Harry Flood Byrd (D-Va.) receiving the remaining 15 ballots.

Before closing his temporary New York City headquarters and heading for Palm Beach, Fla., to work on his inaugural address, Kennedy received a series of recommendations from his groups of special advisers.

A task force headed by Prof. Wilbur J. Cohen of the University of Michigan urged adoption of a program of health care for the aged financed and administered through the social security system. The proposal called for providing hospital, nursing home and home health care for those receiving social security retirement benefits, and recommended the plan be broadened to cover widows of social security beneficiaries, orphans and the disabled.

The committee proposed that the plan be financed by an additional contribution of one-quarter of 1 percent each by employers and employes—a total maximum additional cost of $12 each per year.

An economic task force, warning it would be impossible in a single year to restore full employment, suggested a temporary cut in individual federal income taxes might be necessary by spring to combat the recession. The committee headed by Prof. Paul A. Samuelson of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology also urged immediate improvement of unemployment compensation as a key anti-recession action.

A housing task force, headed by N.Y. State Housing Commissioner Joseph McMurray, called for "an entirely new" program of low-income housing, liberalization of FHA terms and increased loan authorizations, added funds for housing for the elderly, $100 million in federal loans to help cities attack mass transportation problems, liberalization of urban renewal programs, plus action on direct loans for farm housing.

A task force on education recommended $1.4 billion annually to help school districts either build new classrooms or raise teachers' salaries, or both. The committee, headed by Dr. Frederick Hovde, president of Purdue University, also called for stepped-up loans for college classroom and housing construction.

A sharply critical report of America's "inadequate" man-in-space program was submitted by a special task force headed by Dr. Jerome B. Wiesner of MIT. The report charged that the nation still trails Russia in missile development and that there is urgent need for a single military space command, and called for a thorough reassessment of existing U.S. space efforts.

Earlier, Kennedy had heard from a task force on depressed areas, and had received a report, details of which were not disclosed from a committee studying tax problems. Still to come was a report on natural resources.

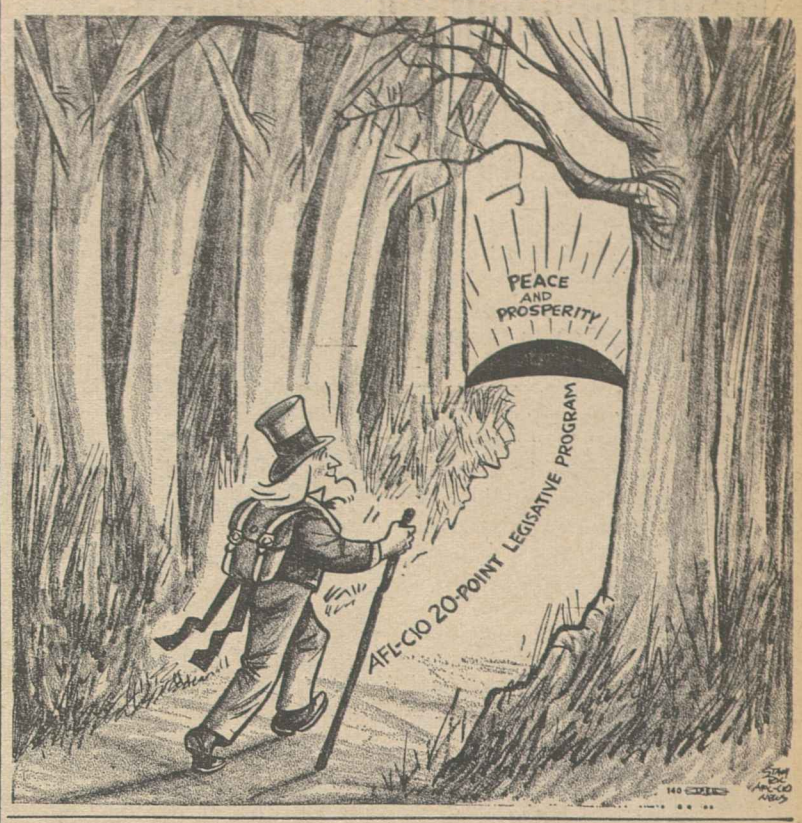
New Appointments Announced

Kennedy announced a long list of appointments to key Administration posts, including:

- Roger Jones, 52, a career government worker and currently Civil Service Commission chairman, as Deputy Under Secretary of State for Administration.
- John W. Macy, Jr., 43, executive vice president of Wesleyan University, as the new CSC head.
- Newton Minow, 34, a law partner of Adlai Stevenson, to be Federal Communications Commission chairman.
- Arthur Sylvester, Washington correspondent for the Newark, N.J., News, as Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs.
- Angier Biddle Duke, former foreign service officer, as State Dept. Chief of Protocol.
- John Moore, vice president of the University of Pennsylvania, to head the General Services Administration.
- Bernard Boutin, unsuccessful Democratic candidate for governor of New Hampshire, as Moore's deputy.
- Timothy J. Reardon, Jr., 45, Kennedy's administrative assistant when the President-elect was on Capitol Hill, to a similar White House post.
- Ralph A. Dungan, 37, former Kennedy Senate staff aide, as White House staff secretary.
- Frederick G. Dutton, 37, executive secretary to California Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown, as special assistant to the President.

In New York, Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky confirmed that he had been offered a high diplomatic post in the Administration but had turned it down rather than sever his ties with the union so soon after being re-elected as ACWA president.

The Trail Ahead



Fight Over Crew Size Brings N.Y. Tug Strike

New York—Refusal of 11 major railroads in the port of New York to write into marine union contracts provisions protecting present crew sizes has triggered a strike of three unions against tug and ferryboat operations here.

Approximately 800 members of the Seafarers, Marine Engineers, and Masters, Mates and Pilots walked out after negotiating 13 months and exhausting all the mediation provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

Talks Prolonged

The strike idled 10 passenger ferries hauling 30,000 daily commuters from the Jersey shore, and 51 tugboats hauling up to 1,000 carloads of freight a day, plus several hundred barges and lighters. Port authorities said the commuters have switched to other forms of transport.

Union members originally authorized a walkout in 1959. Their contracts expired November 1 of that year, but negotiations continued with the 11 railroads separately, with the railroads jointly, and with the aid of a mediator who reported the parties could agree only on grievance procedure.

Pres. Eisenhower appointed a fact-finding committee whose recommendations, made December 10, were rejected by the union members. Union sources said the fact-finders left the issue of crew sizes up to the negotiators, who failed to agree after more meetings.

The unresolved issues, according to a spokesman for the Railway Harbor Council, joint union committee, in addition to the size of crews, include:

- Replacement of "archaic" welfare provisions, and improvement in working conditions.
- A wage increase of 15 percent—the fact-finders recommended 2 percent, same as the last railroad increase. Based on an average $100-a-week wage, employers offer an increase of $2 a week, but have demanded that 80 cents in cost-of-living increases granted in 1957 be ended.

Financial Report Notices Sent to 40,000 Unions

Forty thousand labor organizations, whose fiscal year ended Dec. 31, 1960, have received reminders from outgoing Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell that they have less than 90 days in which to file annual financial reports required by the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The law requires all unions to submit two copies of their annual financial statements to the Labor Dept. within 90 days following the close of their fiscal year. The department said that of the more than 50,000 organizations required to report, 40,000 close their books on December 31, and thus must submit reports no later than the end of March.

At the same time Mitchell informed all unions that the Labor Dept. was sending out special financial reporting kits containing copies of the report form and informational material on what information is required.

Labor lawyers pointed out that included in the kit is information concerning which unions can use the short form and which must use the longer reporting procedure. The cutoff for unions using the short form is gross annual receipts of less than $20,000.

In this connection, those locals which have provisions calling for the employer to send checkoffs directly to the international union or some other intermediate body, and which have only a portion of these checked-off dues returned to the local, need report only on that portion of dues actually received by the local union.

Labor attorneys also pointed out that the Landrum-Griffin instructions call for reporting only the net salary paid to employes and officers, and that money deducted for income tax purposes should be reported under other disbursements rather than as salaries.

In his advisory to unions, Mitchell suggested they begin working on their reports as early as possible so as to take advantage of the technical services offered by the Labor Department's Bureau of Labor-Management Reports.

"In the first reporting cycle under the 1959 Act, 85 percent of the financial reports were deficient in one or more respects," the secretary said. "Many of the errors were minor, but even minor errors required correspondence between the department and the individual union. It is to reduce this expense in time and money that the financial reporting kit has been prepared."

Meat Cutters' Strike Wins Major Gains

New York—A five-day strike of 4,000 wholesale meat handlers and office employes against 400 employers produced an agreement with benefits long argued for by union negotiators.

Members of Meat Cutters Local 174 voted to accept a 28-month contract with these improvements:

Wage increases of $7 a week now, $4 more after 15 months; an additional employer payment of $1.25 a week into the welfare fund, plus 25 cents more per employe to admit pensioned members and their wives to the insurance and welfare fund.

Employers also agreed to create a severance pay fund by putting 25 cents per working employe per week into a fund for those who lose their jobs because of plant closings or technological changes. The contract also provides vacations of four weeks after 20 years of service; double time pay for Saturday work after eight hours; five days' sick leave and three days of paid funeral leave.

Office workers had their 40-hour week reduced to 35. They will be

Oil Workers Strike Three Phillips Plants

Houston—Three highly automated plants of the Phillips Chemical Co. in Texas have been shut down by a strike of 1,450 members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, called to force the company to bargain on major fringe benefits and to prevent management from weakening present agreements.

Phillips' Subsidiary

The company, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Phillips Petroleum Corp., produces petroleum-derived chemical products at plants located at Pasedena, Borger and Dumas, Tex.

A major issue in dispute is the company effort to establish different contract termination dates at each of its plants. Local work assignment rules are also in controversy.

The three OCAW locals involved also have demanded that changes in fringe benefits, including group hospitalization, life insurance and retirement benefits be subject to negotiation.

At present, the union said, the Phillips company has insisted that it have the unilateral right to make all decisions on these matters, including setting the amount of employe contributions to the health and welfare plans.

Name Van Arsdale To Art Center Post

New York—Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York Central Labor Council has been named a director of Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

John D. Rockefeller 3d, the board chairman, in announcing the appointment paid tribute to Van Arsdale's advice and cooperation in planning the center and in other community activities.

Van Arsdale, business manager of Local 3 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, is vice president of the United Housing Foundation, a director of the American Arbitration Association and the New York World's Fair Corp., a trustee of the National Urban League and an active participant in the work of the United Negro College Fund.

Hanover Supports All-American Canal

Buffalo—Pres. Harold C. Hanover of the New York State AFL-CIO described the proposed All-American Canal across the Niagara Peninsula "a sound investment" for the people of this state and the nation and called for additional funds to ensure "an exhaustive and complete study" of the project.

IUE Demands Price Probe, Hits GE Role

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, charging that 29 of the country's biggest electrical manufacturers have "swindled" buyers of electrical equipment and U.S. taxpayers out of millions of dollars, have asked Congress to undertake a "comprehensive investigation to determine the nature, extent and effects of price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracies" in the industry.

The IUE executive board pointed out that all 29 corporations and 45 officers and executives, previously indicted for rigging bids and fixing prices on $8 billion worth of equipment bought by the government and by private industry, entered pleas of guilty or no contest Dec. 8, 1960.

At the same time IUE Pres. James B. Carey:

- Urged Sec. of Commerce Frederick H. Mueller to "insist on removal" of GE Board Chairman Ralph Cordiner as chairman of the Commerce Dept.'s Business Advisory Council, or "take steps to deny the council its semi-official status";
- Wrote as a GE stockholder to Cordiner asking that four IUE resolutions be placed before the annual GE shareowner meeting on Apr. 26. Carey sent Cordiner the text of four proposals asking for action against corporation officers who violate the anti-trust laws and statements explaining why the shareowners should vote for the proposals.

The IUE executive board said the indictments and pleas featured the "largest and most atrocious case of criminal conspiracy in the history of the nation's anti-trust laws."

The direct result of this "criminal conspiracy," it said, was to "swindle both the purchasers and American taxpayers out of uncounted millions of dollars that would have been saved had the bidding been truly competitive." It concluded:

"This conspiracy to undermine free competition has led to artificially high prices, which have unnecessarily increased the costs of running the U.S., state and municipal governments.

"The inflated prices, moreover, have priced many items of electrical equipment out of the domestic and international market, with the effect of reducing employment at home and jeopardizing the nation's international trade."

Carey wrote Commerce Sec. Mueller that he was "seriously troubled" by Cordiner's position as head of the Business Advisory Council, and asked: "How can the Secretary sanction the continuation of this body in its semi-official status without insisting that its officers be above suspicion in their adherence to the basic economic principles" on which this country operates?

NATIONAL POSTER GIRL for the 1961 New March of Dimes, four-year-old Linda Breese of Columbus, O., is shown with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who has urged 13.5 million members of organized labor to support fund drive. The child, victim of birth defects, symbolizes millions of handicapped children and adults who may benefit from National Foundation's expanded program to prevent crippling diseases.

ICFTU Charges Castro With Subverting Unions

Brussels—The Castro revolution in Cuba has now "fully attained" its objective of imposing Communist leadership on the trade union movement and subjecting it to government control, the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has charged.

Trade union rights have been violated under the authority of several laws the Castro regime has promulgated, the ICFTU charged.

One permits the minister of labor to oust trade union leaders who had been democratically elected and to appoint successors. Another authorizes him to settle all labor disputes and to approve or disapprove all labor contracts. Still another requires workers to change jobs only through the government labor exchange, thus restricting free movement.

"Furthermore," the ICFTU added, "the government has imposed several burdens on workers in the form of so-called 'voluntary contributions' from their wages towards certain causes which it is sponsoring. These 'voluntary contributions' together with new compulsory deductions from wages amount to approximately 15 percent of workers' wages.

"The effect of these deductions combined with the wage freeze that has been enforced by the Castro regime has been to cause a serious impairment of the workers' standard of living."

The worldwide free labor body expressed sympathy with the "justified aspirations" of the Cuban people for better living standards and economic and social progress. However, it insisted, needed reforms should be carried out within a "democratic framework."

"Such reforms can have real meaning for the workers only if democratic rights, including such trade union rights as the freedom of association, the right to bargain collectively and the right of workers freely to choose their own leaders, are maintained," the ICFTU continued.

"We emphatically condemn all measures which deprive the workers of these rights and which have the effect of subjecting the Cuban trade union movement to totalitarian control.

"The ICFTU expresses its full sympathy with and support for the many free and democratic trade unionists who are fighting, whether inside Cuba or in exile, for the recovery of political and trade union freedom."

AUTO WORKERS Pres. Walter P. Reuther tells the Women's National Democratic Club in Washington, D. C., that the country must get the jobless back to work and mobilize our economic potential in the appeal for uncommitted nations to "choose to identify themselves with our kind of society."

Money and Manpower:

AFL-CIO Votes Aid To Cuban Refugees

The AFL-CIO has provided both funds and manpower for the task of providing immediate aid to Cuban refugees pouring into the United States.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced that the Executive Council, at its special meeting on Jan. 5, voted a $10,000 contribution to the U. S. Committee for Refugees which has set up a center in Florida to house those fleeing from the dictatorship of Fidel Castro.

In a letter to Maxwell Rabb, president of the Refugee Committee, and the Very Rev. Francis B. Sayre, Jr., dean of the Washington National Cathedral and the committee's board chairman, Meany said the appropriation was aimed at providing "some direct help for the unfortunate victims of the present Cuban terror."

Meany said that the grant, which is nearly three times as great as the amount voted by the AFL-CIO last year to aid the Refugee Committee in its total operations, "reflects our concern over the present Cuban refugee situation."

He expressed the hope that labor's contribution would enable the refugee group to "step up its own activities aimed at alerting the American people to this grave situation," and at the same time to provide prompt relief to those victims of the Communist-oriented Castro regime.

Labor to Sponsor Job Aid

At the same time Meany informed Rabb and Sayre that, in addition to the financial contribution, labor would provide manpower through the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee "to do everything possible to help resettle and find employment for these victims."

He said the Executive Council had directed AFL-CIO Community Service Activities Dir. Leo Perlis to set up "special field headquarters" in Florida "to expedite the relief and employment of the Cuban refugees."

Meany expressed the hope that this operation will be able to "provide the type of assistance which we rendered during the Hungarian crisis." At that time, CSC set up a special staff at Camp Kilmer, N. J., the Hungarian refugee center, to work with community groups and CSA staff members across the country on the massive job of finding employment and homes for the families which fled the Communist terror.

Affiliates Urged to Participate

The AFL-CIO president pledged that organized labor would cooperate with Tracy Voorhees, special representative of Pres. Eisenhower assigned to handle the Cuban refugee problem, and said unionists would also work with the various voluntary organizations "already doing a very commendable job."

To implement the program, Meany said, the Executive Council has called on all of its affiliates "to join in this humanitarian effort through contributions and any other ways that may be available to them."

8 Organizing Firings Illegal, NLRB Rules

An Alabama garment company was guilty of unfair labor practices when a plant manager told an employe to tell seven other employes they were fired during an organizing campaign by the Ladies' Garment Workers, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The F. G. & W. Co. of Gordo, Ala., was ordered to return the eight to work and also to reinstate 28 other workers who went on strike the day after the discharges.

The finding was based on the action of the plant manager, who stood outside the plant and said to employe Margie Fair: "You are fired and that goes for everybody that is for the union; get off and stay off and don't come back. You can go in there and tell them I said so."

When seven or eight employes left the plant, the manager made no attempt to stop them, according to testimony. That convinced the NLRB, and the trial examiner, that Mrs. Fair was acting as the plant manager's authorized "agent" when she told the employes they were fired. The discharges were illegal and so was the firing of the 28 strikers, the board said.

Management was ordered to give back pay to Mrs. Fair and the workers she told they were fired. The others were ordered placed on a preferential rehiring list.

The board ordered the company to "cease discouraging membership in ILGWU, or any other labor organization of its employes, by discriminating in regard to hire or tenure of employment; to cease interrogating employes concerning their own or other employes' union activities or sympathies; to cease threatening employes with closing the plant or discontinuing the plant if a union becomes the bargaining agent; to cease engaging in surveillance of its employes' union activities; to cease interferring with employes in the exercises of the right to self-organization."

Texas Labor Raps State Tax Proposals

Austin, Tex.—Texas labor has sharply criticized recommendations for either a sales tax or a payroll tax made by the state's Finance Advisory Committee, declaring that both proposals would fall hardest on low-income workers.

State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Fred H. Schmidt, a member of the 36-man commission, dissented from the majority's tax proposals, declaring that they were motivated "by a single concern, to get new state revenue without taxing profitable corporations and wealthy individuals in accordance with their ability to pay."

The proposed payroll tax, he said, "while better than a sales tax," is inferior to a graduated income tax. He noted that the tax recommended by the committee majority allows no exemption for dependents and imposes taxes on "those who do not even have a subsistence income."

Schmidt criticized the advisory group for rejecting an earlier proposal by Gov. Price Daniel to increase franchise taxes on multi-state corporations.

Labor's Goals . . . for a Better America

Herewith is the text, slightly condensed, of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's 20-point program on legislation and executive action recommended to Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy and to Congress:

ONE GREAT QUESTION confronts mankind as the world stands at the threshold of a new decade:

Will human genius find a way to forge the political and economic tools [to] translate our wealth of knowledge and our vast material resources into a better life for all?

The course of our own country could very well determine the answer. Never before has one nation borne so fateful a responsibility—or faced so magnificent an opportunity. And never has the concept of human liberty been confronted by so malignant an enemy.

The miracles of science now make it possible to assure all the people of this planet of the essentials of healthful life—shelter, food and clothing—and an ever-rising standard of living. But that possibility has not been realized, even in the richest land on earth. We have faltered through the Fifties, victimized rather than enriched by our technological skills, unwilling or unable to cope with the great challenges of the era at home or abroad. Another such decade might well prove fatal to human freedom and perhaps to humanity itself.

The labor movement hopes and believes a turning point is at hand. New leadership will soon be at the helm of government—leadership which is pledged to end the spiritual and economic stagnation, the indifference and self-satisfaction, into which we have drifted. We have faith in that leadership.

But the new Administration is challenged even before it takes office. America is in an economic recession, the third in seven years and potentially the most severe. The signs are everywhere:

- November unemployment was at the rate of 6.4 percent. When hours of work lost because of partial unemployment are added, the equivalent rate exceeds 7.5 percent. Even this rate would mean full-time unemployment for more than 5 million in January, with a rise to 6 million quite possible.
- Inventories are alarmingly high—in autos alone, a record of more than a million cars—offering no hope for quick recovery.
- Housing starts in 1960 were a quarter million behind 1959, and the outlook is not encouraging.
- Steel, bellwether of the durable goods industries, stumbles along at less than 50 percent capacity.
- Plans for private investment in new plants and equipment are being shelved as present capacity lies idle and prospects are bleak.

Not only must this deterioriation be arrested; America must start growing again, at a rate fast enough to absorb our rapid population growth and workers displaced by revolutionary technological changes; fast enough to wipe out poverty and insecurity at home; fast enough to meet our vast obligations to the free world and to insure our security against Communist aggression.

America's own health, moral and economic, is the key to freedom's future everywhere. It must no longer be frittered away.

The labor movement has repeatedly spoken out in recent months and years about the unmet needs of our people; but full employment is the basis of them all.

THE NEW ADMINISTRATION and the new Congress have much to do in the days ahead, and much of it must be done quickly. A wide range of progressive measures has already been subjected to exhaustive hearings and thorough debate; what they need now is enactment, not further investigation. And in addition, the gathering economic storm demands prompt and vigorous counter-measures on an emergency basis.

Many steps can, and we believe will, be taken by executive action, utilizing laws already on the statute books. The civil rights field is an outstanding example.

An alert and determined President can also take steps that will stimulate the economy, through the many continuing programs that are under the control of the executive department. In particular, he can and should observe the spirit as well as the letter of the Employment Act of 1946, and restore the Council of Economic Advisers to a meaningful role in government.

But the basic responsibility for prompt action on the the platform endorsed by the American people at the polls, as well as on emergency legislation required by the recession, lies with the new Congress. Freed from the threat of Presidential veto, guided by leadership that looks forward instead of back, Congress can now enact with confidence what it knows is best for the nation.

In this spirit the AFL-CIO recommends the following 20-point program, covering both long-range and short-range problems that have too long been neglected:

1. Twice vetoed in recent years, federal aid to chronically depressed areas must be delayed no longer. Even in times of national "prosperity," many American communities are depression-ridden for reasons beyond their control. In times of recession their plight is terrifying. A bold program of loans and grants for vocational retraining, essential public works, plant construction and technical assistance to encourage establishment of new plants is needed.

2. Bold action in the field of housing and urban renewal can do much to meet one of America's sorest problems and to help put America back to work. The Senate last year approved expanded urban renewal and public housing programs, only to be stymied by the House Rules Committee. The proposed Federal Department of Urban Affairs can do much to insure continuing action.

3. [On schools], much progress was made last year toward the inauguration of a federal aid-to-education program, only to be frustrated by a reluctant Administration and a conservative coalition in Congress. The construction of many more schoolrooms will improve our educational plant and also help provide jobs for thousands. Aid to teachers' salaries is needed if we are to retain and obtain the quality and the number of teachers needed for a growing America.

4. Final action on [minimum wages] was prevented last year when a conservative coalition refused to budge from the House-passed Kitchin-Ayers substitute. Moderate bills raising the minimum to $1.25 an hour for presently covered workers had been reported out by both House and Senate Labor Committees. The bills also established this wage in annual step-ups and lowered maximum hours in annual step-downs for several million newly covered workers. Action in 1961 must come soon in order to bring a measure of economic justice to workers and to add to the purchasing power on which recovery depends.

5. [Health care for the aged] is another item of nearly finished business. The new President of the United States was a principal backer of Forand-type legislation, which would provide health insurance for our older citizens under the tried and tested social security system. Now that the veto threat of last year has disappeared, Congress should proceed at one to pass this sound and humane system.

Other improvements in the social security system are also needed. A 10 percent increase in benefits should be adopted at once. This can be done without impairing the long-range fiscal soundness of the system.

6. Immediate action is essential to restore unemployment payments to those whose rights have been exhausted, to extend the duration of payments to those now receiving them and to set a realistic floor under their amount. The federal-state jobless benefits system should provide benefits at least 50 percent of a worker's average weekly wage up to a maximum of two-thirds the state's average weekly wage and for so long as a worker is unemployed up to a maximum of 39 weeks.

7. The federal tax system should be flexible enough to aid in spurring economic recovery and encouraging economic growth. The President should have discretionary authority, subject to disapproval in each instance by Congress, to temporarily reduce taxes to stimulate the economy.

We believe that when unemployment exceeds 7 percent of the work force, the first $10 of withholding taxes should be forgiven each week for a period of ten weeks. Such tax reduction should not exceed $100 per year per tax return. An equivalent reduction should be given to taxpayers, not covered by withholding, at the end of the year. In addition, Congress should close such unwarranted tax loopholes as dividend credits, capital gains favoritism, excessive business expense deductions, split income provisions and excessive depletion and depreciation allowances.

8. Federal programs for the construction of hospitals, roads and airports are already in being. These programs should be expanded by more generous appropriations.

Literally thousands of public works projects have already been planned, programmed and engineered by state and local governments, but shelved by cost problems. As much as $2 billion in such projects could be put into effect in 1961 by incentive grants of $300 million, or 15 percent of total cost, by the federal government. The result would be approximately 110,000 construction jobs and 170,000 off-site jobs.

9. The Federal Reserve Board should be urged to abandon its "bills only" or "bills usual" policy for a truly flexible monetary policy. At present, the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee should buy securities of varying maturities, rather than concentrate almost exclusively on the purchase of bills. The effect of buying bills and some short-term securities of not more than 15 months duration has been to reduce interest rates on such securities, but not on bonds of intermediate and long-term duration. As a result, interest rates on short term-securities have declined almost 50 percent since January, 1960—with an effect on the outflow of U. S. dollars to foreign countries—while interest rates on long-term bonds have moved down less than 15 percent.

The Open Market Committee's purchase of intermediate and long-term bonds would help curtail the outflow of U.S. dollars, and at the same time stimulate bank lending and mortgage loans by reducing long-term interest rates. Our monetary policies should be designed to influence our industrial technological progress consistent with our economic growth. We also urge that the membership of the Federal Reserve Board be revised to insure competent representation of all basic functional economic groups.

10. Not only for obvious economic reasons, but for vastly more important moral and social reasons, Congress must act to end the disgraceful exploitation of the nation's migratory farm workers. This problem must be vigorously dealt with on all fronts—wages, housing, education, social security and public health. The foreign contract labor program, justifiable only in times of national manpower shortages, should be discontinued as quickly as possible.

11. Both the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts contain provisions which harshly and unfairly limit the freedom of workers to organize and bargain collectively, and which impose inordinate burdens on established unions.

Among the major changes needed in the Taft-Hartley Act are elimination of the section permitting state "right-to-work" laws; revision of the freedom of speech and mandatory injunction provisions to accord unions equality of treatment with employers; restoration of the pre-hearing election and realistic modification of secondary boycott and organizational picketing provisions to restore the right of free speech to trade unions.

The Landrum-Griffin Act should be stripped of those provisions that shackle honest unions in their legitimate activities. The weak sections on management misdeeds should be made more effective.

12. One item of labor legislation should and can be passed immediately. The right to picket on construction sites was requested by Pres. Eisenhower three times and received strong bipartisan support. Last year, however, the Kennedy-Thompson Bill was killed by the House Rules Committeee and filibustered to death in the Senate Labor Committee. Simple justice demands early action.

13. An expanded federal program to develop the peacetime uses of atomic energy, including the generation of electric power, should be enacted. Needed also are an effective and comprehensive federal program to control atomic radiation hazards and a federal workmen's compensation system for atomic workers.

14. America in the Sixties must face up to the unprecedented and rapidly increasing demand upon her great but not unlimited stockpile of natural resources. A bold program of land and water development on a river basin approach is urgent. An adequate program of water pollution control cannot wait any longer.

15. In the non-economic area, no challenge is greater than that of completing the job started 100 years ago of assuring equal treatment before the law and equal opportunity to all, regardless of race or color or national origin.

The legislative arsenal in this crucial fight on discrimination will not be complete unless and until it includes legislation clearly supporting and implementing the Supreme Court decision on schools, the right of the Attorney General to institute civil suits on behalf of aggrieved persons, an effective Fair Employment Practices Commission and the elimination of poll taxes and other voting restrictions.

Completely effective civil rights legislation cannot realistically be expected out of the Senate unless an end is put to the present filibuster rule.

16. Our present immigration law must be liberalized and humanized. Its unworkability has been demonstrated in the eight years since passage by the enactment of numerous special measures to meet America's responsibilities in the world community. The present national origins system should be replaced by a new quota system that sheds the present discriminatory features. The number of quota immigrants should be increased moderately to 250,000 to reflect the much-increased population of the United States and the increased needs throughout the world. The new law should include explicit and permanent authorization to allow refugees to enter the United States during crises such as the Hungarian one in 1956.

17. The present concern over gold and international payments must not serve as a pretext to end or cripple the mutual security program. Allied nations whom we helped to economic recovery do have a responsibility to carry a fair share of the load, but America's responsibility is as great as ever.

In the newly emerging nations of the world, economic and technical assistance from democratic nations can make the difference between freedom and tyranny for the people.

18. Legislation should be passed giving statutory certification to bona fide trade unions of federal employes so that these workers may have the right of collective bargaining comparable to workers in private industry. Inequities now existing in pay scales of postal and classified employes should be reviewed by the Congress.

19. We favor the enactment of legislation which will wherever possible base price supports on production payments aimed at support of the family farm and lower prices to consumers. A reasonable ceiling should be placed on help for any one farm. We also endorse program to bring more of our abundant food and fiber to the aid of unemployed and other needy Americans; the expansion of our school lunch program, and more extensive use of our agricultural surpluses overseas.

20. While the restoration of our economic strength and our moral leadership is of paramount importance, we dare not neglect our military defenses. We, together with our allies in the free world, must be strong enough to deter, and if necessary to defeat, aggression from any source in any form. This means a defense establishment equipped to cope with small crises as well as large ones; with limited as well as total war. We recognize the immense complexity of the problem, but for the security of our way of life, it must be solved. Certainly security for America and her people is worth what it costs.

The Crisis in Jobs

HOW BAD is the unemployment situation? In the next month or so it is anticipated that 7 out of every 100 Americans looking for jobs will be unable to find them. Under so-called normal economic conditions, 3 workers in 100 cannot find jobs at the moment they are searching for employment.

When the nation is confronted with unemployment at more than double the normal rate, the situation is critical.

The AFL-CIO estimates that to reduce present joblessness to the 1951-53 rate of less than 3.5 percent of the labor force would take a growth rate of nearly 10 percent in 1961—or twice what is considered an adequate average growth rate by outstanding economists.

If the economic growth rate jumped from its present stagnant condition to 5 percent this year, at the end of 1961 unemployment would be cut from 7 out of every 100 jobseekers to 6 out of every 100, labor economists estimate.

This is a crisis that calls for decisive government action. If there is hesitation, if Congress fails to meet the needs, another recession will more than likely be waiting to come on stage in 1963 or 1964.

Social Security Vindicated

THE WHITE HOUSE Conference on Aging has produced substantial evidence that the American people are ready to support a program of health care for the aged under social security.

The prevailing sentiment of the conference work groups concerned, despite the well-organized and widely-publicized opposition of the American Medical Association, supported legislation in the 87th Congress to make health care for the aged a matter of right rather than subject older citizens to disgraceful means tests.

The conference produced important support for the program from two former top officials of the Eisenhower Administration—HEW Sec. Marion B. Folsom and White House aide Arthur Larson, reflecting the widespread support for this financially sound and dignified approach to a critical problem.

The shrill cries of the AMA and the insurance companies will continue on Capitol Hill during the congressional session. But this special-interest pleading has been exposed as resting on the narrowest possible base.

Congress has a green light from the majority of American people. The incoming Kennedy Administration is on record for the health care program. With exhaustive hearings and debate of the last Congress as a basis, the 87th Congress should move quickly.

Public Interest Program

A RESPONSIBLE, realistic, public interest program to cope with the third and possibly most serious recession since 1953 and to build a sound and strong economy for the Sixties has been drafted by the AFL-CIO for the consideration of the new Congress and the incoming Kennedy Administration.

Only three of the 20 points in labor's program deal with legislation directly affecting unions—revision of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts to make them more equitable and just and the acknowledgment of bargaining rights for federal workers. The other 17 points, ranging over the vast problems that confront the nation, are not "labor" matters—they constitute a program that grinds no axe except for the public interest.

It is a responsible program keyed to the reality that the cost of doing nothing is disaster and defeat, that the reward of action is an advance toward long-term prosperity and peace.

Outlook for 1961:

Employer Attitude to Unionism Seen Key to Industrial Peace

Following are excerpts from an article by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany which appeared in a special section of the Washington Post, "Preview 1961."

LABOR LOOKS to 1961 as a turning point toward better times.

We believe the Kennedy Administration will move promptly and vigorously to strengthen the entire nation, to reduce high unemployment and to stimulate healthy economic growth.

Since 1953 we have not had a sound, growing economy. Our rate of economic growth has been halved. Our "normal" rate of unemployment has doubled. In 1959 there were actually fewer manhours worked in private employment than there were in 1953, despite an increase of nearly 5.5 million in the national work force.

We are even more disturbed when we look to the future. The "baby boom" that began about 1940 will hit the labor market in the coming years as it has been hitting the schools for the last decade and a half.

When this population explosion is coupled with the steady and often dramatic rise in manhour productivity in both industrial and white-collar occupations, there is ample reason to wonder where the jobs are coming from.

WE BELIEVE the Federal Government must take active leadership in order to stimulate economic growth. The Employment Act of 1946 should be applied in a meaningful way. There should be legislation relating to depressed areas, aid to education, the Federal minimum wage, housing, medical care and the like. There should be renewed efforts to insure equality of opportunity for all citizens.

We expect such legislation to be enacted because it was pledged in the Democratic platform and vigorously endorsed by Senators Kennedy and Johnson during the campaign. We feel reasonably sure that strong presidential leadership on behalf of social and economic progress will overcome the reactionary opposition in Congress.

Up to now I have discussed only questions of broad, general concern. The labor movement realizes that the national interest far outweighs any special interests, and we know that we can prosper and progress only as our country does so.

At the same time, we do have special interests that involve the labor movement as an institution, and the relationships between labor and management. Here, too, we hope some changes will be made.

THERE IS AN UNDOUBTED NEED for thorough, dispassionate reexamination and revision of our basic labor-management laws. While priority should be given to the program for putting the country as a whole back on the right economic track, there are some immediate steps the new Administration and Congress can take.

There is the legalization of picketing on construction sites, on which nearly everyone is agreed but which has somehow eluded the legislative process. There is the matter of administrative attitude in the National Labor Relations Board, which for eight years has hardly reflected the established policy of the United States that collective bargaining is good for the country and ought to be encouraged. There will be, if our fears are realized, an immediate need to strengthen the unemployment insurance system.

As for face-to-face and day-to-day relations between labor and management, these as always will vary from union to union, from industry to industry and from place to place. I would hope that the new Administration will pursue more vigorously my proposal for a continuing exploration of ways and means to achieve better understanding between labor and management. Yet it should be recognized that genuine understanding requires a genuine desire on both sides to achieve it.

Whether the labor-management "climate" will be fair or foul depends mostly upon management. If management practices sincere collective bargaining in the determination of wages and working conditions, the chances of peaceful agreement are great. If, on the contrary, management regards the union as a burden to be endured only until it can be cast aside, and resents collective bargaining as a challenge to management's "infinite wisdom," conflict is inevitable.

Failure by management to accept the inevitability and the permanence of union organization is the greatest single threat to industrial peace in America.

Labor, along with all Americans, wants peace and the preservation of human freedom. We believe this goal can be achieved only with a stronger, more vital America.

Morgan Says:

Misdeeds of Business Given Scant Coverage in Daily Press

MAYBE IT'S A LEGACY from the time when few dared to question—out loud—the behavior of the "ruling classes," so-called, but the unpretty fact is that we Americans still use a double standard in measuring the morality of management and labor. One of the most eloquent examples of this duality ever recorded emerged in the government's victory in the largest antitrust case ever tried.

Morgan

It's a safe bet that the public at large is quite unaware that in early December, 19 big manufacturers of heavy electrical equipment pleaded guilty in federal court to criminal charges of price fixing. Among the principal defendants were firms whose brand names—General Electric, Westinghouse, Allis Chalmers—are household words.

But the word of their criminality simply didn't get around as widely as it would have if a similar rap had descended on a trade union. The story was not suppressed. But by the nature of our American sense of values as measured by the information media, it just didn't get the play given, say, exposés of labor racketeering in the heyday of the McClellan committee.

What happened, briefly, was this: in the decade of the 1950's by a simple but secret system of faking competitive bids these companies carved up markets and rigged prices on sales amounting to a total of $7 billion to industry—private utilities and other corporations—and $1 billion in federal, state and local government contracts.

With factual reporting and a series of biting editorials, the Washington Post, to its everlasting credit, has endeavored to put this whole mess into a little sharper perspective. The Post provides a fascinating peek into the workings of some corporate minds by excerpting from a General Electric task force report some recommendations on public relations:

"Business," the excerpt begins, "might subsidize a 'brain trust' of competent writers (novelists, playwrights, etc.) to begin an active campaign of turning public attention away from the left through the source of popular attitude formation (television, movies, stage, radio, novels, magazine articles, etc.)

"It is important to pick out opinion molders in each community and 'work on them.' However, as a rule a specific story should not be given to them directly by just anyone at random. For example, if the opinion molder to be influenced is a newspaper publisher it might be best to have him approached by one of his biggest advertisers."

IN AN INTERESTINGLY REFINED concept of executive responsibility, the board chairman and ex-president of General Electric, Ralph J. Cordiner, says he knew nothing of the conspiracy in which GE was so deeply involved. But it is as if this whole pattern, from the sly public relations approach outlined above to the conniving actually to cheat other businesses and the government—and thus the public—out of millions, had become an accepted way of life.

What a hollow, hyprocritical sound there is now to the arguments of "patriotism" and "national security" which the industry has tried to use—sometimes successfully—to defeat foreign competition.

In 1959, TVA bought a British turbine generator for a low bid of $12.1 million. Though GE and Westinghouse bids were each more than $5 million higher, appeals were made—unsuccessfully—to the White House to revoke the British bid. One GE vice president complained foreign bidders had the advantage of lower wages. But economists for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers figure the 45 percent difference in bid prices more than exceeds the difference in labor costs between the American and British electrical manufacturing industries; that in other words GE and/or Westinghouse could have met the British bid and still made a profit despite higher American wages.

The behavior of business, as revealed in this vast and shocking price-fixing conspiracy, should not only impel sober self-appraisal by the captains of industry but stir deep public concern.

The same concern and soul-searching, I hasten to add, should apply to unions wherever wrongdoing is involved. Of course, the racketeering or misuse of power by certain labor leaders is not mere juvenile delinquency. It is despicable and unacceptable in any size. But let's begin now to apply the same standard of morality to both union and management.

We should have realized long ago that insofar as human weakness and strength are concerned, we do indeed have a classless society.

Washington Reports:

Mansfield, Dirksen See Action On 5-Point Kennedy Program

THE DEMOCRATIC AND REPUBLICAN leaders of the Senate both expect action in the new Congress on area redevelopment, housing, minimum wages, medical care for the aged and education, but as Sen. Everett Dirkesen (R-Ill.), the minority leader, puts it, "We will be in disagreement in many cases on means and methods, probably not so much on goals."

Sen. Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), majority leader, and Dirksen were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

Mansfield flatly predicted passage by Congress of the five-point program proposed by President-elect John F. Kennedy.

"We have held hearings on all these measures," he said. "All we have to do is up-date them.'

"The election is over and now it is our responsibility, regardless of the labels we wear, to work in the interest of the country" Dirksen declared. "I am quite confident there will be no blind opposition to a program."

The Democratic leader said that housing, minimum wage, education, health care for the aged and area redevelopment "are in themselves, in a certain sense, civil rights measures because they apply to all people, regardless of race, color or creed."

Mansfield asserted that, "as far as civil rights legislation itself is concerned, it would be my belief that in view of what Pres.-elect Kennedy said during the campaign he would use to the utmost the powers which are vested in the presidency and which have not been used up to this time. Then, if these are not enough to assure that every American is given the equality of opportunity and the rights which are his under the constitution, I would assume that civil rights legislation would be introduced."

DIRKSEN SAID he expected an effort to do something about secondary boycotts and Section 14-b of the Taft-Hartley Act which gives states the right of independent action on anti-union right-to-work legislation. On the latter, he said, "We might find ourselves in opposition without being able to bring in a substitute."

"In the main," he said, "we will be plowing old ground, considering many matters that have been under consideration for a long time and on which hearings have been held."

Action on health insurance for the aged, according to Mansfield, will have to await action by the House Ways and Means Committee. If no bill comes from the House, he added, "we will be ready to consider attaching an amendment on medical care to a bill of a different nature coming out of the House by way of the Ways and Mean Committee."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

WHILE NATIONAL ATTENTION is centered on the Kennedy inauguration, liberals in the state of Virginia are thinking of the possibility that this year, when a new governor will be chosen, there is for the first time in nearly three decades a chance to upset the conservative Democratic machine operated by Sen. Harry F. Byrd.

The significance of such an event would be national rather than local, for Virginia is still the state that sets the patterns for much of the South. The "massive resistance" policy to school integration initiated by Byrd himself encouraged Deep South states to rash actions threatening to shut down the public school system rather than permit integration.

The political and financial conservatism that permeates the state's government—the Byrd Machine calls it "sound fiscal policy"—has resulted in poor schools, an appalling deficiency in mental hospitals and social services generally, and a third-rate highway system. In all such matters, politicians in states with less of an aura of historic leadership can point to Virginia's policies as justification for their own slothfulness and conservatism.

ONE OF THE BEST sources of intelligence on Virginia politics is the news letter of the Virginia State AFL-CIO, which points out that a few years ago the Byrd Machine could not only have told in advance the name of the next governor but also "who the governor would be after the next governor."

New factors have now been inserted, the news letter reminds its readers, that are based largely on Gov. J. Lindsay Almond's successful revolt against the machine on the public school issue. The analysis continues:

"The first fact, which may not be to the liking of some of our people, is that Virginia is not yet going to get a liberal governor. Present indications are that we are going to have to choose between a candidate who has the blessing of the Byrd faction and one who does not have it.

"Since there is no indication there will be a genuine liberal or 'anti-organization' candidate, people may wonder why the Byrd group finds it necessary to put up a candidate of its own. The answer is simple: For decades, the potential candidates have come to the Machine; it would never do for the Machine to go to one itself. That would invite loss of face; the little man from Berryville would no longer be making all the decisions. Some people might get to the point where they tried to reason for themselves or to act on their own."

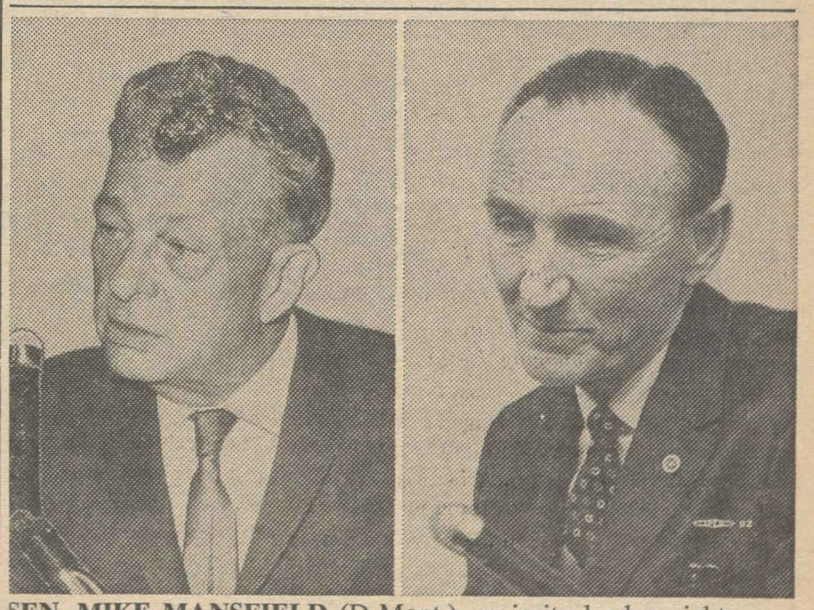
SUGGESTING that the Byrd Machine will probably back Attorney Gen. Albertis Harrison in the Democratic primary in July against Lieut. Gov. A. E. Stephens, who is close to Almond on public school and tax issues, the news letter points out that because of the cleavage in the party, the Byrd Machine candidate would ordinarily be considered at least potentially in trouble.

The probability, however, is that Republicans may vote heavily in the Democratic primary. "Party lines in Virginia have almost disappeared. Byrd is a Republican by philosophy; they would be inclined to support his candidate. Would it not be a fitting repayment by Republicans for the 'golden silence' on Byrd's part which helped throw Virginia to Richard Nixon last November?"

The news letter re-emphasizes that "a choice between reaction and liberalism is not in the cards for Virginians this year. It will be a choice between a moderate and the Byrd Machine."

Any choice at all is vastly preferrable to no choice. Any change in the tone of Virginia politics would encourage liberalism all over the South; it would give incentive to the moderates who are now silent to begin civic and political action of their own. And the effect would reach into national affairs through the House and the Senate.



SEN. MIKE MANSFIELD (D-Mont.), majority leader, right, predicted Congress will act favorably on the Kennedy five-point program in the current session. Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.), minority leader, also on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program, said the Republicans will have a "constructive attitude" toward Administration proposals.

How to Buy:

Most Consumers Still Puzzled By Deceptive Interest Rates

By Sidney Margolius

A NUMBER OF SURVEYS have shown that most people don't understand what interest rate they pay when they borrow money or buy on credit. The most recent, by the University of Michigan's Survey Research Center, found that two out of five people questioned had no idea what it cost them to buy cars on time payments, and the others guessed all the way from 6 percent to 13 percent. The research center also reported that this is the first question on which it has ever found college graduates as misinformed as the rest of the public.

Actually, the deceptive way in which finance charges are stated is one of the biggest foolers of the public being practiced today. This deception is practiced by almost all lenders. In fact, even the United States Government participates in the foolery when it tells the public that the finance charge on FHA home improvement loans is "$5 per $100." This appears to be a 5 percent interest rate. It is not. It is a true interest rate of approximately 10 percent.

Moreover, the interest-rate deception, instead of being stopped, is increasing. Now education loans are being offered by large finance companies at rates which are really twice as high as they seem, and can seriously fool parents and students. They may be led to think that the "4 percent" charged by Tuition Plan Inc., a subsidiary of Commercial Investment Trust, or the "5 percent" charged by Education Funds, Inc., a new plan sponsored by Household Finance Corp., are really close to the 3 and 4 percent colleges themselves charge students for loans. They are not.

The difference is that the college and Government-sponsored loan funds charge interest only on the remaining balance of the debt. Thus, their rates are true annual interest rates.

But the rates charged by the commercial educational lenders are figured on the original or face amount of the loan.

UNTIL INTEREST-RATE DECEPTION is outlawed, you do need a little knowledge of how to tell the true interest rate to protect yourself. A few rules can help you know.

First of all, if the interest rate is stated as a monthly percentage of the declining balance, you simply multiply by 12 to know the true annual interest rate. Thus, 1 percent a month charged by a credit union is a true 12 percent. The 2 percent a month which a small-loan company may charge, is a true 24 percent per annum. The 1.5 percent a month charged by some retailers on "budget accounts" is a true 18 percent a year.

But that's only half the story. Many lenders advertise a yearly rate. Then you can use this rule of thumb: When the finance charge is stated as a yearly rate, and you pay back every month, the true annual interest rate is approximately double the stated rate. (The exception is home mortgages. The true annual interest rate is the stated rate, since mortgage lenders figure the credit fee on the declining balance.)

FHA says its home-improvement loans cost you $5 a year per $100 of loan. You borrow $600 to be repaid in 12 months. The credit fee is $30. You don't really owe $600 for the whole year. You owe $600 the first month, $550 the second month, and so on. Your average debt is really $325. (To know what your average debt is on an installment loan, all you really need do is add the amounts you owe the first and the last month, and divide by two. In this case, your first month's debt is $600, the last month's is $50.)

You then divide your average debt into the credit fee. In this example, dividing $325 into the finance charge of $30 gives you a true annual interest rate of 9.2 percent—approximately double the stated rate.

Where people really get confused is when the debt is for more or less than one year. But that's not too hard to figure out. Suppose you borrow $600 for a used car to be repaid at the rate of $25 a month over two years. The dealer charges you 12 percent of $600 for each year. That's $72 a year or $144 for the two-year period. Your average debt is $312 (first month's debt plus last month's, divided by two). You then divide the $312 into $144. That gives you 46 percent. But since the period is for more than a year, you reduce the interest rate proportionately. In this case, you divide the two-year cost by two to know the true annual rate—23 percent.

But if the debt is for less than a year, you increase the rate proportionately. An insurance company may charge you $2 for delaying a $20 payment on your auto insurance for two months. This is not a rate of 10 percent as it may seem. You are paying $2 for the use of $20 for one-sixth of a year. The true per annum rate is 60 percent.

And that happens to be a true example.

From Soup to Nonsense:

A Not-Very-Guilty Conscience Can Still Prove Embarrassing

By Jane Goodsell

I'M AS HONEST as the day is long. Oh, all right, I'm almost as honest. Stop raising your eyebrows at me, and I'll admit everything. I'm 6 cents overdue on my library card, and I occasionally swipe sugar cubes when I eat in a restaurant. Oh, not the whole bowlful. Just one or two. Three at the most.

Surely that isn't enough for the guilty way I act whenever I find myself face-to-face with a policeman. The harder I try to look innocent, the worse it gets. I concentrate so intently on looking the officer straight in the eye that I can hardly breathe. My eyes begin to water and my facial muscles twitch.

The last time I was stopped by a policeman, who was making a routine traffic check, I acted as suspicious as if I were smuggling dope over the border. I blushed and stammered and, when he asked for my driver's license, I handed over my library card.

The same thing happens when I cash a check. Hard as I try to be nonchalant, I can't bring it off. Instead of behaving like a person engaged in a routine financial transaction, I sneak around like a pickpocket.

When asked for proof of my identity, I act as though I'm on the witness stand, fighting for my life. I not only display my driver's license, but also my social security card, my blood donor's certificate, snapshots of my children and a letter from my cousin. I can barely restrain myself from offering to submit to a lie detector test.

USING A CHARGE ACCOUNT—my very own charge account—makes me feel sneaky like a crook. If the clerk makes a routine phone call to check on the account, I feel certain that she is summoning the house detective.

All currency larger than a $10 bill looks to me like ransom money. If I have two $20 bills in my wallet, I have an apprehensive feeling that the FBI is about to close in on me.

The way I figure it, there are only two possible solutions to my problem. I can consult a psychiatrist or else I can stop swiping those sugar cubes.

UAW Proposes Recession 'Cushion':

Temporary Shutdowns Urged To Stabilize Auto Employment

Detroit—The Auto Workers, facing heavy production cuts in the automotive industry, have called on the "Big Three" manufacturers to adopt a program of periodic one-week plant shutdowns as a substitute for either mass layoffs or short workweeks.

Noting that the industry has extremely large piled-up new-car inventories, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther said the proposals would both help check the recession and protect workers through unemployment compensation and supplementary unemployment benefits (SUB).

The emergency shutdowns, Reuther said, would give workers involved substantially more purchasing power than they would have if the industry relied on layoffs or shortened work schedules. Such a step, he said, would "minimize hardship" for families and communities and would "reduce the damage to the national economy."

The UAW proposal—submitted orally to the managements of General Motors, Ford and Chrysler in separate meetings—has been taken under consideration by the three corporations, the union declared.

Under the Auto Workers' plan a plant forced to slash employment by 20 percent would close down its entire operation for one week out of every five. Reuther gave these figures to back up the union proposal:

Weekly Average Higher

An auto worker with a wife and two children, earning the current average straight-time hourly rate of $2.78, would receive take-home pay of $79.49 a week if he were placed on a four-day schedule. Under the UAW plan, he would receive his full normal take-home pay of $96.86 each week for four weeks, and unemployment compensation and SUB amounting to $62.96 in the fifth week, for an average weekly income over the five-week span of $90.08.

By utilizing the shutdown principle, Reuther said, the industry would be helping to "cushion the impact" which production cutbacks will have on auto workers' purchasing power.

"It is now widely recognized," he said, "that the amount of consumer purchasing power available will determine the length and depth of the recession.

"It is in the interest of all of us—labor, management and the public generally—to minimize in this very delicate economic situation any further contraction of consumer purchasing power."

'Special Obligation' Seen

The UAW president said the Big Three have a "special obligation" to meet the problem of cutbacks resulting from the current backlog of more than 1 million unsold cars, since the union warned last June that "abnormally high production schedules" at that time would result in "excessive inventories" during the winter.

Reuther emphasized that the proposal should not be "construed as a long-term policy of our union." He described the plan as "a temporary measure to ease the hardships and minimize the national dangers of what we hope will turn out to be a short-term temporary situation."

Noting that the plan would still leave the average auto worker "significantly short of his normal income," the UAW president said the proposal is "not a complete solution" to the current economic problem. "Better answers must be found and implemented at both the national and industry levels to avoid a recurrence of the kind of serious economic problem we face today," he added.

'R-T-W' Repeal Drive Launched in Indiana

Indianapolis, Ind.—Indiana's Gov. Matthew E. Welsh (D) has called for early repeal of the state's so-called "right-to-work" law in an address to a joint session of the legislature.

The newly-installed governor, elected on a platform calling for repealing the ban on the union shop, told the legislature that "the misnamed 'right-to-work' law is a source of controversy and labor unrest without any benefit to the state or its citizens."

His message to the legislature—the Senate narrowly controlled by the Democrats and the House held firmly by the Republicans—set the stage for a two-front battle over restrictions on union security.

Supporters of the repeal drive are seeking a coalition of Democrats and liberal Republicans whose support is essential to win House approval.

A counter-move finds business-backed Republicans calling for legislation to outlaw the agency shop, under which employes who do not join the union which represents them in collective bargaining are required to pay a service fee normally equivalent to union dues.

The agency shop was upheld as legal in a state court decision. Welsh told the legislature that although this made the "right-to-work" issue largely "academic," it remained as a source of "labor unrest."

A major assist in the broad-based drive for repeal of "right-to-work" came on the eve of the convening of the legislature at a dinner given by the Negro Federation of Associated Clubs for members of the legislature.

The federation, made up of 136 Negro organizations in the state, told the legislators that repeal of the "right-to-work" law was one of the group's four chief legislative proposals, along with establishment of a state civil rights commission and an end to employment and housing discrimination.

Rev. Clinton Marsh, a member of the Indiana Council for Industrial Peace, charged that the "so-called 'right-to-work' law has wrought its greatest injustice on the Indiana Negro worker." The effect of anti-union legislation is to depress wages and working conditions of Negro workers, he said.

In a letter to Pres. Starling James of the Negro federation, State AFL-CIO Pres. Dallas Sells thanked the group for its effective campaign against R-T-W and noted that "right-to-work" laws encourage "auction-block employment practices."

The first test of the repeal drive is expected to come in the Senate, where the Democrats hold a scant two-vote margin. A single Democratic defection, unless countered by a GOP vote for repeal, would give the state's Republican lieutenant-governor the tie-breaking decision.

In the House, a number of Republicans have pledged to support repeal. With the GOP holding a 30-vote edge, the division is likely to be close.

Union Label Group Hits Airline Caterer

New York—The Greater New York Union Label & Service Trades Council has begun the distribution of leaflets advising air travelers to "fly first class all the way" on airlines which use union food caterers for in-flight meals. The Hot Shoppe chain, which supplies Eastern Air Lines in New York, is non-union, the council pointed out. Its consumer information leaflets are being distributed at all of Eastern's New York terminals.

Meany Urges Support For Library Programs

All AFL-CIO central bodies, state and local, have been asked by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to participate in National Library Week and all members of AFL-CIO unions have been urged to make extensive use of their public libraries.

Events to mark National Library Week will be held in thousands of communities during the week starting Apr. 16. Planning is under way now on national, state and local levels.

Several public libraries, including those in New York City and Detroit, had full-scale labor exhibitions last year. The Kentucky State AFL-CIO donated papier-mache animals for the children's room of the Louisville Public Library.

Saying that the AFL-CIO wants National Library Week to succeed, Meany expressed the hope that local central bodies will cooperate with local library committees, and that state central bodies will work with the State Library Association and state planning committees.

The AFL-CIO cooperates on library matters with the American Library Association throughout the year through the Joint Committee on Library Service to Labor Groups, Meany pointed out.

"'Use' is the key word to the library's treasures. For this reason, I urge members of AFL-CIO unions to make more use of their public libraries."

In an earlier message to Whitsey N. Seymour of New York City, chairman of the National Book Committee, Inc., Meany wished the committee success for National Library Week "on behalf of the AFL-CIO, and personally."

Workers believe, Meany told Seymour, that "ready, popular access to significant publications is a necessity" for a modern democracy and that the contributions of librarians and libraries are of great importance.

AFL-CIO groups desiring help in a program of cooperation with libraries have been advised to send requests to Lawrence Rogin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

Supreme Court Voids Award to Dixon-Yates

The Supreme Court, writing the final chapter to one of the hottest political battles of the Eisenhower Administration, has struck down a $1.8 million award to the Dixon-Yates power group for the cancellation of its controversial contract with the government.

The court, by a vote of 6-3, held that Dixon-Yates could not enforce its claim on the government because the contract had been "infected" by violation of the conflict-of-interest laws when financier Adolphe H. Wenzell acted both for the government and for the private interests involved.

When the Dixon-Yates issue blew up in 1954 and 1955, on the charge that the Administration was mounting a major attack on the Tennessee Valley Authority, Eisenhower and his aides staunchly defended the contract. After the agreement was abandoned under strong Democratic fire, Administration lawyers turned on the contract and termed it legally worthless because of the conflict-of-interest question.

Chief Justice Earl Warren, writing the majority opinion, held that the contract was invalidated because Wenzell served for 10 weeks as an unpaid consultant to the Budget Bureau, working with the Atomic Energy Commission to negotiate with the power combine, while retaining his job as vice president of First Boston Corp. which later was awarded the financing of the project.

Joining Warren were Associate Justices Hugo L. Black, Felix Frankfurter, William O. Douglas, Tom C. Clark and William J. Brennan, Jr.

To Protect Public

The court held that the primary purpose of the conflict-of-interest statute, first enacted in 1863, was to "protect the public from the corrupting influences" arising when government agents are financially interested in business transactions which they are conducting on behalf of the government.

"This protection," the majority held, "can be fully accorded only if contracts which are tainted by a conflict of interest on the part of the government agent may be disaffirmed by the government."

A dissent by Justice John Marshall Harlan, in which Justices Charles E. Whitaker and Potter Stewart joined, said the court should not sit "as a committee on general business ethics," but merely to enforce the conflict-of-interest statute, and added that there was doubt as to Wenzell's personal interest in the contract.

In 1954, the Eisenhower Administration contracted with the Middle South Utilities, Inc., headed by Edgar H. Dixon, and the Southern Co., headed by the late Eugene A. Yates, to build a $107 million plant in West Memphis, Ark., to supply electric power to TVA. The move was aimed at blocking TVA construction of a plant at Fulton, Mo., to generate electricity both for municipal customers and the Atomic Energy Commission.

After lengthy negotiations in which Wenzell played a key role, the AEC and Dixon-Yates signed a contract on Nov. 11, 1954. In the ensuing months, a Senate investigation headed by Sen. Estes Kefauver (D - Tenn.) brought Wenzell's role to light and under pressure from Congress Eisenhower ordered the contract terminated on July 11, 1955.

Dixon-Yates sued in the Court of Claims, demanding $3.5 million for its costs in starting work and for damages, and the court handed down a $1.8 million award despite the government's argument that the contract was unenforceable because of the conflict-of-interest centering on Wenzell's role.

Doherty Sees Human Side to Postal Service

To most Postmaster Generals, the postal service has been a business—the world's biggest. To William C. Doherty, a "mailman" since 1923, president of the Letter Carriers since 1941 and a vice president of the AFL-CIO, the postal service is people—people he likes.

He began his book, Mailman U.S.A., with the admission that "I am very prejudiced in favor of the 125,000 letter carriers who deliver the mail to the homes and business offices of America."

Doherty is somewhat less kindly disposed to those Postmaster Generals—and there have been surprisingly many — who have waged bitter war on unions, using spies, firings of union leaders and harassment of members as weapons.

Mailman U.S.A. is a story of legislative campaigns and union battles, of progress and setbacks. But most of all it is the story of people—the people its author takes his greatest pride in representing — Mailman U.S.A., by William C. Doherty, $3.95, David McKay Co., New York.

MERGER AGREEMENT is signed by Pres. E. C. Hallbeck, left, of the Post Office Clerks and Pres. Paul A. Nagle of the Postal Transport Association. Standing is Pres. Joseph Thomas of the unaffiliated United National Association of Post Office Craftsmen, which earlier reached an agreement on merger with the Post Office Clerks. If the agreements are ratified by the participating organizations, a three-way merger will take place this spring.

merger with the Letter Carriers. The union's convention this summer, however, directed the NPTA's board to continue to seek unity among postal organizations and authorized the reconvening of the convention to act on any merger plan which might be developed.

Nagle said he expected the convention would probably be called to coincide with a contemplated legislative conference of AFL-CIO government employe unions to press for passage of a union recognition bill.

The agreement between the NPTA and the Post Office Clerks creates three offices in the merged organization, which will be known as the United Federation of Postal Clerks, AFL-CIO, to be filled by present NPTA officers. Nagle would become administrative vice president of the combined union; NPTA Vice Pres. Charles D. Sherwin would become director of education and research, and NPTA Industrial Sec. Wallace J. Legge would be named assistant secretary-treasurer.

Hallbeck as president and Sec.-Treas. John Bowen of the Post Office Clerks would hold the same offices in the merged union.

Under the merger agreement, NPTA's 15 divisional presidents would become associate vice presidents for their areas. The previous agreement with UNAPOC named Thomas as director of organization, UNAPOC Sec.-Treas. Joseph V. Silvestri as executive aide and nine other officials of the union as regional organizers.

Merger of postal unions has been a subject of frequent discussions in recent years. Letter Carriers' Pres. William C. Doherty has strongly urged unification of all postal unions. His union, largest in the field, has carried on merger talks with a number of postal organizations.

The Post Office Clerks, while rejecting "one big union" proposals, invited consolidation of clerical unions, representing the Post Office Dept.'s "inside" workers. Shortly after Hallbeck, longtime legislative representative of the NFPOC, was elected president at the union's convention last summer, he set up the merger conference with UNAPOC, a rival of the Post Office Clerks for more than half a century.

The Post Office Clerks and the NPTA—formerly the Railway Mail Association—had few jurisdictional problems during the period when the postal transportation service was operated as a separate branch of the Post Office Dept. An internal reorganization of the postal service in recent years brought both groups of workers under the same management and resulted in serious jurisdictional disputes in some cities.

In Economic Report to Kennedy:

Standby Tax Slash Proposed As Anti-Recession Measure

A temporary cut in individual federal income taxes—which could result in a saving of between 15 and 20 per cent of the total tax bill paid by the average taxpayer—may be necessary this spring to combat the growing recession, an economic task force has told Pres.-elect John F. Kennedy.

The group, headed by Prof. Paul A. Samuelson of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said a cut of 3 or 4 percentage points in the rate could be a "powerful weapon" to halt the downturn. Since the basic tax is 20 percent, a cut of 4 percentage points would reduce an individual's rate to 16 percent.

The task force described the current state of the economy as "sluggish and tired," and called for a broad range of measures including improved unemployment compensation, which it termed "one of the most important measures from the standpoint of anti-recession action."

In a separate action, the nonprofit, nonpolitical National Planning Association declared that the economy is suffering from its "fourth recession within a dozen years," and called for "aggressive" federal action to boost the rate of growth from the present 2.6 percent to a "sustained" rate of about 4.5 percent.

Unemployment Rise Seen

Failure to lift the growth rate, the NPA's 15-man steering committee said, would leave the U.S. "with unemployment rising from 7 percent in 1961 to 10 percent and more in 1963 and following years."

Kennedy's economic task force declared that "prudent economic policy must face the fact that we go into 1961 with business still moving downward. This means that unemployment, now above 6 percent of the labor force, may this winter rise more than seasonally."

It predicted that when Pres. Eisenhower sends his final Budget Message to Congress it will show a deficit for the current fiscal year, instead of the $4.2 billion surplus Eisenhower forecast a year ago. The projected deficit, the Samuelson group indicated, will come about because rising unemployment and falling tax receipts have wiped out the earlier estimated bulge in income over spending.

The task force said bluntly that "one cannot realistically expect to undo in 1961 the inadequacies of several years," and warned it might not be possible to "aim for the restoration of high employment within a single calendar year."

It set as goals for 1961:

- "To bring the recession to an end."
- "To reinstate a condition of expansion and recovery."
- "To adopt measures likely to make that expansion one that will not, after a year or two, peter out at levels of activity far below our true potential."

The tax cut suggestion was conditioned on the economic outlook in the first three months of the year. The task force called on Congress to enact standby legislation that could "take effect immediately" in March or April, if needed, and which would continue through the balance of 1961.

"Greater Flexibility" Urged

A the same time, calling for "greater flexibility" in taxing, the committee said it would be "highly desirable" for Congress to give the President the right to continue such a reduction—subject to a decision to the contrary by both the House and Senate—"with the clear understanding that the reduction will definitely expire by the end of 1962."

The task force, putting forward what it called "first line of defense" policies to combat the recession, declared that spending programs already pledged "should be pushed hard." At the same time it called for action on aid to education, urban renewal, slum clearance, health care for the aged, aid to depressed areas, housing and reduction of mortgage rates to 4.5 percent.

The National Planning Association also called for action on a similar list of "high priority programs" which included strengthening of unemployment benefits and special measures for blighted communities, pointing out that even with stimulus being given to economic growth "persistent unemployment . . . in depressed areas . . . will not soon be reduced to tolerable levels."

In addition to these immediate measures, the NPA called for "more effective implementation" of the mandate of the Employment Act of 1946, and called for more effective policies to prevent price rises resulting from what it said was "the abuse of private economic power" in crucial industries.

Plight of Farm Workers Blamed On Mexican Contract Program

St. Louis—A leading expert on farm labor has strongly appealed for the repeal or "radical" overhaul of the program of importing Mexican workers as the vital first step toward relieving the "miserable plight" of American farm workers and their families.

Unionization is the best hope of ultimate solution, Msgr. George G. Higgins told the Catholic Economic Association at its annual meeting here. Higgins is director of the Social Action Dept., National Catholic Welfare Conference.

Higgins urged extension of the federal minimum wage, noting that average farm worker earnings total less than $1,000 a year and called for the child labor protection, noting the "ugly" fact that 457,000 children from 10 to 15 years of age worked for pay on factory farms during 1957.

But, Higgins warned:

"Congress could legislate on this problem from now until doomsday and accomplish very little unless and until it either repeals or radically amends Public Law 78, which authorizes the wholesale importation of Mexican farm workers in the United States on a contract basis."

Higgins was one of a group of four consultants who studied the Mexican program at the request of Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell. Their report, filed late in 1959, found that domestic workers had been swamped out of certain crops and had their work chances, wages and conditions depressed by the imported work force.

Higgins told the CEA that the Mexican import program, which the last Congress extended to Dec. 31, 1961, should not be renewed unless it insured the fullest use of American workers and limited Mexicans to unskilled work.

He said his proposals were partial remedies, that the hope of an ultimate solution was in the organizing of farm workers into bargaining associations.

Farm labor, Higgins declared, was treated as "a commodity to be bought at the lowest possible price."

Higgins denied that a minimum wage for agriculture would significantly affect consumer prices and added that in any event, it was doubtful Americans would choose to keep down their bills at the cost of overworking and underpaying human beings.

He expressed regret that "government at all levels has seen fit to exempt agricultural labor from most of the great social and labor legislation which has been enacted during the past 30 years."

Labor Dept. Endorses Farm Minimum Wage

A minimum wage for farm workers is both feasible and desirable, Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell has told members of Congress in letters accompanying a report officially submitted after a staff study by the department.

Saying he hopes Congress will find the report useful, Mitchell said he believes there is a "clearly demonstrated need for adequate and immediate relief" for the generally unprotected farm workers of the United States, whose average income fails to provide them with a "level of living commensurate with their contribution" to society.

The AFL-CIO has previously called upon Congress to end the exclusion of hired farm workers from both the minimum wage law and from coverage of the National Labor Relations and Social Security Acts.

The third federation convention in 1959, meeting in San Francisco, approved a resolution declaring that "conditions of agricultural employment for domestic workers must be greatly improved so that the wages and working conditions of farm workers no longer are a blot upon our national conscience and a drag upon our over-all economic progress."

The convention specifically urged Congress and the state legislatures to "extend to agricultural labor the same protection of our laws as is now enjoyed by workers in other industries." A basic first step, the convention said, would be the extension to farm workers of the full protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act and state minimum wage laws.

The resolution pointed out that average earnings of the approximately 2 million hired farmhands who worked 25 days or more a year in 1957 were only $892 a year, or $17 a week.

In his letter to Congress, Mitchell said:

"A minimum wage for agriculture is in my opinion both feasible and desirable, and need only apply to those large farms which employ most of the hired farm labor, to be effective.

"I hope the 87th Congress will provide adequate minimum wage protection for those millions of Americans who produce the food and fiber this country consumes."

The study, made at Mitchell's request, is titled "Problems Involved in Applying a Federal Minimum Wage to Agricultural Workers." It was made by Harry S. Kantor, Cora S. Cronemeyer and Francis L. Hauser of the Labor Dept., with the assistance of other federal departments.

They pointed out that Congress can put farm workers under the federal wage and hour law merely by removing an exemption which has been part of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 from the beginning.

The report declared that "substantial benefits to agricultural workers and the agricultural economy may be expected" without serious adverse effects "if the scope of application and the wage level are set within appropriate limits."

Labor Dept. Issues Legal Fee Study

All but two states provide some protection against excessive attorney's fees being charged in workmen's compensation cases, according to a newly-published Labor Dept. study.

The study, however, questions the effectiveness of some state regulations and declares that "the promise of a workmen's compensation system intended to produce simple justice without litigation and without delays is far from fulfillment."

Copies of the study (Bulletin 220—Attorney's Fees in Workmen's Compensation) may be obtained without charge, as long as the supply lasts, from the Bureau of Labor Standards, U.S. Dept. of Labor, Washington 25, D. C., or at a cost of 25 cents from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C.

Labor Urges Steps To Halt Recession

earnings records who are not now insured.

- An immediate 10 percent increase in social security benefits, amounting to $100 million a month. The AFL-CIO said no increase in social security taxes would be required before 1962.
- Federal incentive grants of $300 million to stimulate action on state and local public works projects already engineered and approved but temporarily shelved.

Aid to Small Business

- Tax relief for small business by reversing the corporate tax structure so that firms would pay a 22 percent normal tax and a 30 percent surtax, instead of the present 30 percent basic tax and 22 percent surtax.
- Easing of terms on mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration and Veterans Administration to stimulate home building.
- Accelerated placement of government contracts both for construction and the purchase of supplies.
- Revision of Federal Reserve Board policy to provide for purchase of securities of varying maturities, with a view toward lowering long-term interest rates.

The latter two steps require "executive action and leadership," the AFL-CIO statement noted.

The eight-point program, the council said, would "stimulate sufficient economic activity, with enough speed, to reverse the present decline and set the stage for the long-range and structural programs that are necessary to sustain a balanced and growing full-employment economy, with reasonable price stability."

Meany's letter noted that some of the proposals carried cost estimates, but said the more important question is: "How much will it cost us not to take these steps?"

'Investments' in Future

"We believe a growing America will pay its own way," the AFL-CIO president wrote congressional leaders. "Every proposal that builds a stronger economy at the same time builds the income base on which taxes are levied. We look upon our proposals as investments, not expenditures; investments in our own destiny, investments that will bring incalculable riches to those who have faith in them."

The companion statement on long-range objectives urged a more active role for the President's Council of Economic Advisers, in order to "provide all sectors of the American economy with guidelines for decisions that can sustain full employment and balanced growth."

The labor movement called for federal aid for school construction and teachers' salaries; a comprehensive housing program, including low-rent public housing, middle-income private housing, and special projects for colleges and the elderly; a broad urban renewal program; a "new and better" community facilities program; greater attention to natural resources development; aid to distressed areas through an independent federal agency; and a $1.25 minimum wage and extended coverage.

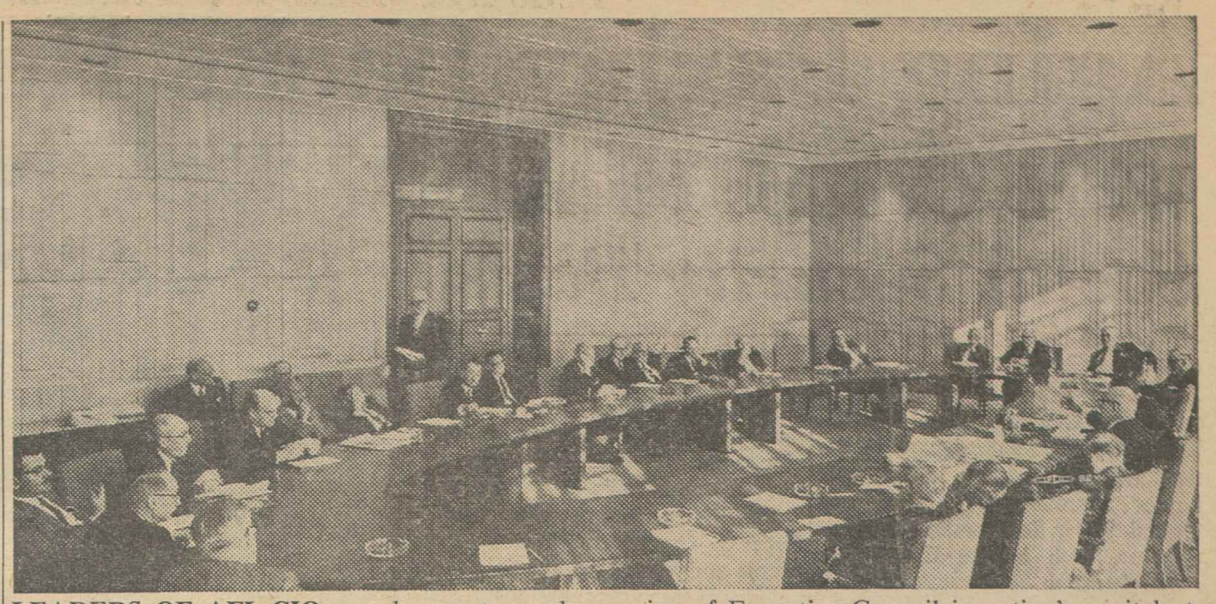
It also urged action on federal standards for unemployment insurance; more liberal social security benefits; the addition of health care for the aged to the social security system; a shelf of deferable federal, state and local public works projects for use in event of another recession; a gradual reduction in the standard workweek with no cut in pay; and reform and revision of the federal tax structure to remove inequities.

Sent to Congressional Leaders

Meany's covering letter was addressed to Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.), Democratic Whip Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.), Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and Minority Whip Thomas Kuchel (Calif.), and to House Speaker Sam Rayburn (Tex.), Majority Leader John McCormack (Mass.) and Minority Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.).

In it, the AFL-CIO president called for consideration of labor's proposals "in the context of America's needs," declaring that current statistics—with an estimated 6.5 percent of the work force jobless and 25 percent of the nation's productive capacity idle—are "alarming," and that "the long-run outlook is even grimmer."

"During the next decade," he said, "the products of the 'baby boom' which began 20 years ago will come of age; instead of our customary increase of some 800,000 a year in the labor force, we will have 1.35 million new workers to place. When this population surge is combined with the effects of automation and other technological changes, the job problem assumes almost terrifying dimensions."



LEADERS OF AFL-CIO are shown at one-day session of Executive Council in nation's capital at which a 20-point legislative program was laid before incoming Kennedy Administration and 87th Congress. Program called for a series of "vigorous counter-measures" to stem the nation's third recession in seven years, plus action on a broad range of legislative measures "that have too long been neglected."

RLEA Raps Safety Laxity Of Railroads

Rail unions have charged that inadequate maintenance of equipment by many of the nation's railroads is creating a "perilous" safety hazard.

Harry See, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association safety committee, said 22 railroads paid fines totaling $41,187 during the month of November for 169 separate violations of safety laws and Interstate Commerce Commission regulations. He said that 141 violations involved defective equipment.

See declared that "these statistics reflect only a minor portion of the actual total violations of safety laws, since they represent only those instances where a railroad has been caught, prosecuted and convicted." He asserted that "many more violations are going undetected" because the ICC has a "woefully inadequate safety inspection staff."

See said the safety violations are "directly related" to the sharp drop in railroad employment.

Clinton Fair Named To Special Jobs Group

Clinton Fair, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, has been named by the President's Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped to serve on a special committee to promote job opportunities for the mentally handicapped and increase public understanding of the mentally restored and the mentally retarded.

Council Votes $50,000 For Farm Organizing

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has voted $50,000 for the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee to continue its California drive through the end of February.

The funds will carry the committee through the next Executive Council meeting scheduled for Feb. 20 at Bal Harbour, Fla., when the farm worker organizing program will be reviewed.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters that the program will not be dropped but that the council may work out a different approach at the February meeting to the difficult problem of organizing farm workers.

Meany told a press conference that in addition to adoption of the 20-point legislative program (see text, Page 5) the council also:

- Received a report from the federation's Intl. Affairs Committee on the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The eight-member Executive Committee will confer with ICFTU leaders in Washington later this month on a special AFL-CIO program to aid African trade unions, supplementing the programs of the ICFTU in this area.
- Directed the federation's Community Service Activities to work with the U.S. Commission on Refugees to aid the growing Cuban refugee group in Florida. The council voted $10,000 as a contribution to the U.S. commission and asked affiliates to send additional funds.
- Voted a $2,000 contribution to the Tennessee State AFL-CIO to help buy food and clothing for evicted sharecroppers in Freedom Village, Tenn.

Court Orders New Election Under L-G Act

Jacksonville, Fla.—The first court order invalidating a union election because of alleged violations of the Landrum-Griffin Act has been issued here by U. S. District Judge Bryan Simpson. The union involved, the unaffiliated self-styled Independent Workers Union of Florida, agreed to a consent decree ordering a new election to be held within 75 days under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor.

Seven other election invalidation suits brought by Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell under the Landrum-Griffin Act are still pending in federal courts. They involve challenges to the election procedures of one international union, the Maritime Union, five locals or districts of other AFL-CIO affiliates, and an unaffiliated petroleum workers' organization in New Jersey.

Workers Vote To Continue Timken Strike

St. Thomas, Ont.—Striking members of the Steelworkers have voted down a proposed settlement aimed at ending a bitter five-month strike at Timken Roller Bearing Co. here.

The proposal, worked out in negotiations held under the direction of Louis Fine, Ontario's chief conciliation officer, called for a 20-cent-an-hour pay boost spread over a three-year period.

Members of USWA Local 4906, turning down the offer, pointed out that the majority report of the Ontario Conciliation Board had recommended an 18-cent wage hike spread over only two years. Timken rejected the board's recommendation.

In addition to opposing the contract on the basis of the wage schedule and the proposed length of the agreement, the 320 production workers objected to a seniority provision in the proposed settlement which called merely for a labor pool giving preference to men with longest service.

The steel workers walked out last August after Timken refused to implement the wage boosts, security and fringe benefits recommended by the Ontario Conciliation Board.

Meany Forecasts Sharp Jump in Jobless Rate

present recession probably will push the jobless rate to 7 percent in the next few months. The seasonally-adjusted jobless rate was 6.3 percent in November, with over 4 million unemployed.

The council also warned that unless "decisive government actions" are taken to reverse this third recession in seven years, there is a "real danger" that another recession will hit the nation in 1963 or 1964.

The council's statement came against the background of these developments:

- The Labor Dept. reported that labor turnover figures in November "reflected further declines in factory employment as hirings dipped and layoffs rose."

The government report showed total separations exceeding hirings by 16 per 1,000 workers. As in October, the report said, both hiring and quit rates were at their lowest levels for the month in the postwar period. Manufacturing employment totals about 16 million.

- Layoffs and shorter hours were sweeping through the automobile industry, with the Auto Workers reporting that at least 15,000 layoffs will take place by the end of January.

These cutbacks followed a December drop in car sales, with new-car inventories building up to about one million—a record for this time of year and about 40 percent higher than a year earlier.

UAW sources reported widespread layoffs in effect or planned: 3,600 of 13,900 Buick workers at Flint; 800 of some 4,800 at a nearby Fisher Body plant; 1,100 of 9,700 Oldsmobile workers at Lansing; about one-third of the 1,900 General Motors workers at Wilmington, Del.; one-fourth of the 3,200 workers at GM's Linden, N. J., plant, and 900 of the 2,400-man workforce at an Atlanta, Ga., assembly plant. This was the pattern at other GM plants and at Ford and Chrysler.

The council pointed out that adding the loss due to parttime work to the total jobless raises the jobless rate to about 7.5 percent of the labor force at present, a rate which might exceed 8.5 percent in the next few months.

Industrial Output Dropping

It also emphasized that industrial production is 6 percent below its high point of January 1960, and falling; that 25 percent of the nation's industrial plant is idle; that new-car inventories are mounting, causing auto and related-industry layoffs; that housing is lagging and that steel is operating at half-capacity.

"These trends indicate the likelihood of a continuing decline of production and employment during the next three to six months or more," the council commented.

A slight pickup in the spring or summer would be but a continuation of the stagnation of the past few years, the council said, adding:

"Only strong government action can turn the present decline around with enough strength to place the economy on the road to full employment."

Rapid Growth Needed

The council said a growth rate of 9 to 10 percent would be required during 1961 to reduce unemployment to a 3 to 3.5 percent level. A 5 to 6 percent growth rate would reduce the jobless rate to 6 percent, the Council added.

The proportions of the problem, therefore, are "quite enormous," the council declared.

The council proposed that immediate government actions be backed up "by long-range measures to assure stable economic growth and full utilization of human and physical resources."

Aging Parley Backs Health Care Plan

Work Groups Favor Social Security Basis

another session, Arthur Larson endorsed the principle, claming it is the proper function of social security to provide medical care to retired citizens. Larson is a former Under Secretary of Labor and United States Information Agency director, both in the Eisenhower Administration.

Initial testing of delegates' sentiments on the health care issue came in the conference's second day when work groups met and voted. In the Income Maintenance Section, where conference officials had placed the issue, six out of seven work groups voted in favor of the social security method. The following day at the overall section meeting this view was upheld by the 170-99 vote.

Meanwhile, at the Health Care Section of the conference, largely dominated by AMA delegates, a statement terming the Social Security mechanism "unnecessary and undesirable" was stricken from conference proceedings when Chairman Robert W. Kean a former New Jersey Republican member of Congress, ruled that the Health Care Section had "no right to pass any recommendation on financing such care."

Typical of the AMA-controlled work groups in the Health Care Section was one in which there were 15 physicians out of 19 delegates. In this work group, the chairman and resource personnel were physicians and the recorder was the president of a drug firm.

Despite this formidable opposition, a minority report was approved in this section on behalf of 43 percent of the delegates. The minority stressed that the individual should be enabled to pay during his working lifetime for the health care he requires after retirement.

The minority added: "It is distressing to be told by organized medicine that the quality of care that the individual physician renders will be influenced by the source of payment. We do not believe this is so."

Two other conference sections—Federal Organizations and Programs and State Organizations—also passed recommendations favoring health care for the aged through social security.

The Income Maintenance Section's final recommendations specifically called for adequate health services to be made available to all aged persons irrespective of ability to pay.

"Establishment of a program of health benefits financed in the same way as social security cash benefits, would give to the aged the assurance that the costs of essential health care will be met when their working years are over," the recommendation stated. It called for legislation utilizing the "mechanism of contributory social insurance."

Hundreds of recommendations on virtually every problem faced by the older citizen of today were forthcoming from the 20 conference sections.

Among these, the conference called for:

- Congress to appropriate $100 million a year for the direct loan program for housing for the elderly under the Housing and Home Finance Agency.
- Employers to consider adoption of more flexible retirement policies.
- Congress to appropriate grants to states to establish or expand facilities and services of a state office on aging.
- Benefits under the Old-Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance program to be adjusted to changes in prices, wages and productivity.

Rising Hospital Costs Spur Self-Insurance

The rising cost of hospital and medical care has led trustees of health and welfare funds to consider self-insurance of their programs as one possibility for reducing costs, a joint labor-management study has reported.

Savings as high as 5 percent sometimes can be achieved by self-insured certain types of benefits, according to the recent report of the Foundation on Employe Health, Medical Care and Welfare, Inc. The report was the fourth and last in a series financed by the foundation.

Officers of the labor-management group include A. J. Hayes of the Machinists; IAM Sec.-Treas. Elmer E. Walker; Pres. John I. Snyder, Jr., and Executive Vice Pres. Walter F. Wilmas of U.S. Industries, Inc.

Trends Cause Concern

Welfare fund officers should decide what method to use only after a careful comparison of costs, the study advised. It said many longtime supporters of group health plans have been alarmed by "continuing increases in rates . . . the lag in broadening coverage, and the upward revision of income ceiling levels."

Other problems, the foundation found, are "the lack of representation on many boards of directors and other unresolved relationships" with those who supply hospital and health services.

"With the tremendous advances in medical science and technology, and increased demand for hospital services," the report continued, "it may be that larger amounts should be allocated for health insurance" because of the difficulty patients have in paying charges not covered by existing plans.

A separate report will be issued, the foundation said, on cost comparisons with plans like those of Blue Cross.

Previous sections of the report, issued in 1957 and 1958, dealt with other phases of health and welfare programs, and ways of keeping costs at a minimum.

The final report made the point that each employer-union group must decide for itself whether it wants insurance, self-insurance, or a combination.

Some employers and union officials believe, it said, that an employe health and welfare program should be run on a non-profit basis without gain to an insurance company.

"They believe they can invest their reserves wisely, and put them to socially worthwhile purposes. Some have become do-it-yourself advocates . . . because they want to provide types of services not available elsewhere in the community" on a prepaid basis.

OFFICERS of the Taylorville, Ill., AFL-CIO marked the 169th anniversary of the adoption of the Bill of Rights by presenting copies of the historic amendments to the public school system. AMA's 'Bitter-Enders' Erupt in Blast at Labor broad sweep of supporters of Forand-type legislation.

"The company I keep, at least in this instance," Meany said, includes the American Nurses Association, the American Public Welfare Association, the American Veterans Committee, the magazine Business Week, the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds and the 1960 Governors' Conference.

The list read by Meany went on to include the New York Times, the Washington Post, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, columnist Walter Lippmann, Life magazine and a number of leading academicians and social security experts.

Meany also quoted the press release claiming that AMA members of the conference came "in a spirit of cooperation." He placed the claim in context with an official report by AMA Executive Vice-Pres. F. J. L. Blasingame that the AMA field staff acted to get "as many physicians and qualified lay leaders as possible" named by state governors.

"The states were also encouraged to work with the insurance industry, Chambers of Commerce and other groups to likewise obtain representative delegates to the White House Conference," Meany quoted Blasingame as saying and adding:

"This met with an excellent degree of success in spite of the fact that social and welfare workers immediately and spontaneously requested that they be designated among the state delegates."

Cooperation?

This evidently, Meany ironically remarked, is what Ludwig referred to in speaking of the AMA's "spirit of cooperation."

Meany in his prepared address pointed to "the cold, unsentimental figures" that 60 percent of the 15 million Americans over age 65 have incomes of less than $1,000 a year. Half the aged, he said, have assets of less than $500 and only one-third have as much as $2,000 to their names.

"These statistics spell poverty. We must face the fact that poverty is the great affliction of the aging," Meany declared.

Meany proposed that, along with a wide range of actions to reverse the economic downturn, the incoming Kennedy Administration raise social security benefits by 10 percent. The current average monthly benefit is $83.

Renewing organized labor's support of "a good and workable plan" for providing health care for the aged through the social security system, Meany emphasized that it would operate "without the indignity of a means test."

In other speeches by union officials at conference sections:

- Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers urged consideration of such questions as a flexible retirement age to replace the "obsolete" age of 65; gradual instead of the present abrupt retirement; retraining of older workers; working out a useful role for the aging in a dynamic society.

Providing health care for the aged is one of the first and simplest things to be done, Beirne said in proposing examination of broader and more basic problems.

- Charles Odell, assistant director of the Auto Workers' Retired Workers Dept., proposed a six-point approach to enable labor, management and the government to utilize middle-age and older workers more wisely. Odell substituted for UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, who was prevented from attending by a minor accident.

Odell said a broad and positive program "will cost far less in the long run than a palliative approach which first pauperizes the aged person and only then offers a helping hand if the individual is willing to declare himself a public charge."

Meany in his speech said the AMA has opposed such proposals as the Forand bill on grounds they were "socialized medicine" and lately, "compulsory."

"Perhaps the AMA will next discover that the income tax is compulsory and that going to school is compulsory," Meany declared.

Meany said labor was troubled and disappointed that the AMA first opposed health care bills and then gave "tepid support" to the "inadequate, unwieldy and unrealistic substitute plan" finally adopted last year by the Eisenhower Administration.

He appealed to all elements in society to join in a "realistic" approach to the problems of the aging.

Hatters Win Major Gains In New Pact

New York—A new two-year contract that is expected to set an economic pattern for U.S. hatmakers has been agreed to by the Millinery Workers' Joint Board of the Hatters, and members of the Eastern Women's Headwear Association, representing makers of two-thirds of the country's production of women's hats.

The agreement was notable in several respects—it averted the threat of a walkout by 12,000 New York and New Jersey workers; it provided the largest wage increases for unskilled and semi-skilled employes; it provided for the establishment of a severance pay plan in the industry.

Pres. Alex Rose expressed confidence that the agreement will be ratified by members and signed by employers. Nathaniel Spector, Joint Board manager, and an employer spokesman said they expected the pact to promote stability in the industry.

The agreement provides for wage increases this year of $5 a week for time workers, including most of those at the bottom of the salary scale; 5 percent more for pieceworkers; 7.5 guaranteed holidays, including Election Day; time and a half for all workers after 35 hours a week or 7 hours a day; a new wage minimum for any worker of $1.575 an hour as of July 1, 1961.

Negotiators agreed that a committee shall meet to arrive at a formula for paying termination benefits to those who lose their jobs. Representatives of both sides also will meet to consider increasing the industry promotion fund, now 1 percent of payroll, to 1.5 percent.

Rose said the union believes that extra protection for low-paid workers is not only sound union economics but also a fulfillment of community responsibility.

"We know the unhappy conditions that low wages breed for a community," he said.

It was agreed that wage increases would be effective immediately, and next July 1, in equal installments.

Printer Pay Hikes Reach 2.9% in '60

Pay scales for union printing trades workers in U.S. cities of 100,000 or more population increased an average of nine cents an hour, or 2.9 percent, to an average rate of $3.23 an hour during the year ending last July 1, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Dept. of Labor has reported.

Average rates varied from $1.87 for bindery women to $3.94 an hour for photo engravers in book and job shops, an average of $3.08. In newspaper shops, the rates ranged from $3.05 for day mailers to $3.93 for night engravers for an overall average of $3.48 an hour.

Summons America To Historic Test

By Gene Zack

Pres. John Fitzgerald Kennedy has made his Inaugural Address a rallying cry to the American people, and the citizens of the entire world, to join in a massive struggle "against the common enemies of man: tyranny, poverty, disease and war itself."

Standing bare-headed before thousands of dignitaries and private citizens in front of the Capitol, where a few minutes earlier he had taken the oath of office as the nation's 35th chief executive, the new President declared solemnly:

"In the long history of the world, only a few generations have been granted the role of defending freedom in its hour of maximum danger.

"I do not shrink from this responsibility—I welcome it. I do not believe that any of us would exchange places with any other people or any other generation.

"The energy, the faith and the devotion which we bring to this endeavor will light our country and all who serve it—and the glow from that fire can truly light the world."

Kennedy's Inaugural Address—carried to millions of his fellow Americans via nationwide television and radio networks—was addressed, as well, to peoples around the globe: to America's allies in the free world, to the newly emerging nations of Asia and Africa, to those people still struggling for freedom, to America's "sister republics south of the border," and finally to "those nations who would make themselves our adversary."

'Let Us Begin'

To all of these groups, the newly inaugurated President issued an eloquent plea for world peace, freedom and understanding.

All of this, he told his worldwide audience, "will not be finished in the first 100 days. Nor will it be finished in the first 1,000 days, nor in the life of this Administration, nor even perhaps in our lifetime on this planet. But let us begin."

Citing the danger that the arms race between the Soviet Union and the Free World could lead to "mankind's final war," Kennedy called on both sides to work out "serious and precise" plans for arms inspection and control "before the dark powers of destruction . . . engulf all humanity."

The 43-year-old Chief Executive, youngest man ever elected to the presidency and second in youth only to Theodore Roosevelt who moved up from the vice presidency at the age of 42, declared:

"Let the word go forth from this time and place, to friend and foe alike, that the torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans—born in this century, tempered by war, disciplined by a cold and bit-

Senate Groups Ok Nominees For Cabinet

By Willard Shelton

Coupling a pledge to enforce existing laws "without fear or favor" and a call for a sharp look at problems of automation, "emergency" labor disputes and so-called "right-to-work" laws, Arthur J. Goldberg won a swift vote of confidence from the Senate Labor Committee as Secretary of Labor in the new Kennedy Administration.

In an hour-and-a-half hearing, Goldberg stated his adherence to the Democratic National Convention's platform declaration of party "goals," stating that as a loyal subordinate he was subject to the President's decision on "priorities."

Goldberg's nomination was the first for the 10 Cabinet posts to get favorable action by a Senate committee. His clearance was closely followed by Judiciary Committee approval of Robert F. Kennedy, the President's brother, for Attorney General.

In harmony with the tradition that an incoming President is entitled to his choice of advisers, both Republicans and Democrats treated

AFL-CIO to Present Public Affairs Show

The National Educational Television and Radio Center and the AFL-CIO will present a weekly half-hour public affairs program, "Briefing Session," it has been announced by John F. White, NET president, and George Meany, AFL-CIO president.

Primary outlet for the series will be the 49 educational television stations affiliated with NET spread over 28 states and Puerto Rico. It will also be available to non-competing commercial stations on a public service basis.

In format, "Briefing Session" will present outstanding national and international issues through a combination of exposition and discussion. Each program will open with five to 10 minutes of film and narration, defining the issue to be treated and pointing up the questions and controversies involved in it. The remaining time will be used for a panel discussion among experts representing different viewpoints.

The host, who chairs the discussion, and the briefing officer, who does the opening, are permanent members of the program. The panelist will vary each week.

"Briefing Session" was produced in 1959-60 by NET and the National Broadcasting Company.

'Step Forward'

In announcing the new series, White said he was "very pleased" that the AFL-CIO was joining in the venture.

"I am certain that with this assistance, this year's 'Briefing Session' series can make a considerable step forward in bringing to the American public the kind of informational background

Union Leaders Renew Pledge To Kennedy

On the eve of his inauguration as the nation's 35th chief executive, Pres. John F. Kennedy received renewed pledges of support from organized labor as he faced domestic and international challenges in the White House.

Kennedy met with members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, presidents of national and international unions and other labor officials at Washington's Sheraton-Carlton Hotel in what AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany described as a "purely social" get-together.

With the new President at the meeting with the 35 union leaders was Kennedy's choice for Secretary of Labor in his new Cabinet—Arthur J. Goldberg, former special counsel to the AFL-CIO.

Meany told reporters at a press conference following the nearly half-hour-long session that Kennedy had expressed his appreciation for the support labor gave him in the campaign.

The AFL-CIO president assured Kennedy: "We are supporting you,

Joblessness Rockets to 6.8 Percent

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment situation in December—just before the presidential inauguration of John F. Kennedy—was the worst for the month in the entire postwar period, the government has reported.

Unemployment jumped 509,000—three times the normal increase—to a December record of 4.54 million.

The key seasonally-adjusted rate of unemployment climbed from November's 6.3 percent to 6.8 percent—also a record high for postwar Decembers. This meant 68 of every 1,000 workers were both looking for jobs and could not find them.

The Kennedy Administration is "inheriting a very serious recession," declared Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D.-Ill.), outgoing chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, when the figures were released.

Dr. Seymour Wolfbein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, told reporters that if the jobless rate held at 6.8 percent, the total unemployed would be 5.5 million in January, 5.6 million in February, 5.4 million in March and 4.9 million in April.

Factory Workers Hardest Hit

"The real brunt of this (unemployment) is taken by the factory and production worker," Wolfbein said.

He pointed out there has been a decline of 639,000 production workers between December 1959 and December 1960, with the

Democrats Back Plan To End Rules Blockade

The House moved toward ending the dispute over its potent Rules Committee as Democratic members, meeting in closed-door caucus, overwhelmingly approved a plan to make the conservative-dominated committee more responsive to the leadership.

The plan—devised by veteran Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.) to eliminate a major blockade toward enactment of Pres. Kennedy's legislative program—is subject to approval by the full House the week of Jan. 23.

Under the resolution the committee would be increased in membership from 12 to 15. The party ratio—now eight Democrats and four Republicans—would be changed to 10 Democrats and five Republicans.

The move would put in a minority the coalition of four conservative Republicans and two southern Democrats which in the past has succeeded in blocking, or seriously watering down, liberal economic measures of the same type which are expected to be the basis for Kennedy's "New Frontiers" proposals to the 87th Congress.

The outcome of the fight was uncertain as House Republican leaders, moving to preserve the coalition, took a unanimous stand against the addition of members to the committee. The GOP Policy Committee, comprising 27 key Re-

Follow-up to Parley on Aging:

Delegates Launch Health Care Drive

By Don Gregory

Groups favoring health care for the aged through the social security system intend to build on the gains made at the White House Conference on Aging in an effort to get action from the 87th Congress.

This was the pledge made by more than 200 spokesmen for these groups who gathered in the final hours of the conference to set up a special follow-up committee. Representing social welfare, labor, educational, religious and community groups, the delegates had been in the forefront of the conference fight on the health care issue which resulted in a policy declaration advocating use of the social security mechanism.

The groups authorized Joseph P. Anderson, executive director of the National Association of Social Workers, and Nelson Cruikshank, director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, to proceed with formation of the committee.

The enthusiastic delegates attending the windup session heard Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), former Rep. Aime Forand (D-R. I.) and Wilbur J. Cohen, newly-appointed Health, Education and Welfare Dept. assistant secretary for legislative matters, commend them on their accomplishments at the White House Conference.

"You've won a magnificent victory," Douglas told the group. "Very frankly, I thought the lobby of doctors, insurance companies, NAM and chambers of commerce would be so strong that the ultimate resolution passed would be opposed to caring for the needs of the aged under social security."

Douglas emphasized the conference results show how public opinion is moving, but he warned the delegates not to underestimate the political obstacles still to be overcome.

Expect More GOP Votes

Commenting on the health care issue and the current session of Congress, Douglas said: "We're going to get more Republican votes this year." He said a number of liberal Republicans had told him personally that they expect to support the social security principle.

"This time we have the advantage of having a President who will be working with us," Douglas stated.

Forand, who received a last-minute invitation from White House Conference officials after having been overlooked in the pre-conference planning, won a standing ovation from the delegates attending the "victory" meeting.

"We have won a skirmish, but we still have the war to win," Forand said, cautioning that the AMA, insurance and business interests "are not going to take this lying down."

He urged the delegates to "keep on the firing line" in their respective communities because "the voice of the people back home is even stronger than the pressures of the AMA."

He said he will remain in Washington "continuing to fight this battle."

Cohen, who headed Pres.-elect Kennedy's special task force on medical problems of the aged, said the task force reached the conclusion that the problem cannot be met unless the social security mechanism is used.

He called for the "broad national pooling of funds on a nationwide insurance basis for present and prospective beneficiaries." He said the financing of aged health care through social security "can be administered feasibly and economically — cheaper as a matter of fact — than any health plan in operation in the United States today."

He predicted the plan would win approval in the coming year.

Although the medical care issue dominated major sections of the aged parley, scores of other recommendations were forthcoming from the 20 conference divisions.

Among these were:

- The need for expanding public housing programs and attention paid to the building of homes suited to the needs of the aged.
- Establishment of a federal grant-in-aid program that would help states develop rehabilitation programs for older people.
- A hike in appropriations for older citizens under the public assistance program.
- Increased federal funds for hospital and nursing home construction.
- Creation of federal minimum standards for nursing homes.
- Elimination of age discrimination in government contracts.

Unemployment Hits 6.8 Percent As Recession Crisis Deepens

factory job plunge having "practically no impact" on the non-production work force.

Wolfbein also noted that the number of workers drawing unemployment compensation hit a record high for the last week in December, rising to 3 million. This was 900,000 higher than a year earlier. The industrial states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, California, Michigan, New York and Illinois accounted for two-thirds of the rise, he added.

He also stressed that while steel employment has plummeted by 200,000 jobs since February, the job declines now embrace the entire manufacturing area.

Each of the 21 industry groups making up the durable and non-durable goods divisions of manufacturing indicated job declines between November and December, the report showed. In all, the manufacturing sector lost 288,000 jobs to decline to a total of 15.9 million.

Wolfbein observed this was the first month in several years that non-farm employment actually dropped below the year-earlier figure. In December, it was 53.3 million, down 440,000 from the same month in 1959.

Total employment fell by 1.2 million over the month to 66.0 million for December. The report called this a "sharper than usual" drop even after allowing for a normal seasonal decline of 700,000 in agriculture and the termination of jobs for some 250,000 election workers.

Of the total 4.5 million jobless, some 2.1 million, or 46 percent of the total, were unemployed less than 5 weeks.

The long-term jobless—those out of work for 15 weeks or longer—rose slightly from 987,000 in November to 1.01 million. This was 200,000 higher than December a year ago, however, and was exceeded in the entire postwar period only by the 1.3 million of the 1958 recession.

The worst-off of the long-term jobless was the group of 499,000—one-half of the total—who have been seeking work in vain for 27 weeks or longer.

Of this worst-off group, 71.5 of every 100 are men. Of these men, 24 are in the 25-to-44 age bracket and 32 are 45 years of age and older.

Occupationally, of every 100 in the worst-off group, 34 are semi-skilled; 20 are white-collar; 16 are in service industries; 15.5 are unskilled and 12.5 are craftsmen.

The December report disclosed a worsening trend for breadwinners. Speaking of the overall jobless figures, the report said:

"The unemployment rate for married men reached 5.1 percent in December 1960, as compared with 3.6 percent a year earlier. These workers constituted a little over one-third of the unemployed a year ago but they have accounted for three-fifths of the increase since that time."

The December report also showed a drop in the factory workweek of 24 minutes, to 38.8 hours. Hours usually rise that month, the report said, but failed in December 1960—chiefly because of heavy snowstorms in the northeastern region.

A rise in factory hourly earnings to $2.32 offset the decline in worktime, so weekly earnings remained almost unchanged at $90.02, the report added.

Film Unions Spur Fight on Runaways

Hollywood, Calif. — Intensification of a nationwide campaign to curtail "runaway" foreign production by American film makers has been announced by the Hollywood Film Council, composed of unions and guilds representing more than 24,000 employes in the American motion picture industry.

In a resolution sent to all AFL-CIO affiliates throughout the U.S. the film council charged that "runaway" production is taking out of this country American dollars that should be spent here, and is "depriving American film workmen of jobs at wages to sustain the American standard of living."

Council Sec. H. O'Neil Shanks said that linked with the drive on "runaways" would be a campaign to boost patronage of motion pictures made in America. The council currently is doing voluntary promotion on the film "Spartacus" made in this country, and has hailed it as an example of how big-budget films can be made profitably in the U.S.

Nation's Production Index Drops Another 2 Percent

The output of the nation's mines, mills and factories fell again in December, hitting the lowest point since the 1959 steel stoppage.

The Federal Reserve Board announced the industrial production index dropped nearly 2 percent to 103, the fourth decrease in five months.

The index hit a record 111 in January 1960 with the industrial spurt which followed the steel settlement. It held at 110 and 109 through midsummer, then slumped to 108 in August, 107 in September and October, 105 in November and 103 in December. The base of 100 is 1957.

The board said the latest decline reflected sharp cutbacks in steel, auto and other production. The report also took note of job cutbacks, of a 500,000 rise in unemployment and a slight drop in retail sales.

Mitchell Enters Race For N. J. Governorship

Trenton, N. J.—James P. Mitchell, for more than seven years Secretary of Labor in former Pres. Eisenhower's Cabinet, has announced here that he will run for the Republican nomination for governor of New Jersey.

Mitchell, the first member of the Eisenhower Cabinet to seek elective office since the late Douglas McKay, onetime Secretary of the Interior, will have the powerful backing of Republican Sen. Clifford P. Case and most of the GOP delegation from New Jersey in the House of Representatives.

He will apparently be opposed in the Apr. 18 Republican primary by State Sen. Walter H. Jones and possibly others. Jones commented sardonically that Eisenhower was not successful in eight years in building a Republican Party strong enough to elect a GOP successor.

Case last year beat off an all-out attempt by New Jersey Republican Old Guardsmen to defeat him in the senatorial primary. He handily defeated Robert Morris, former counsel for the Senate Internal Security subcommittee in the GOP contest, and went on to win re-election in November by a record-breaking plurality of 332,000 votes, despite the fact that in the presidential race New Jersey was won by Democratic Nominee John F. Kennedy.

Mitchell in his announcement of candidacy called for a broad program of tax reform, civil rights, better school systems and housing.

"If we are to maintain the integrity of our state governments, we must prove that we can meet the needs of our citizens," he said.

New Role Proposed for Tripartite Group:

Steel Union, Kaiser Invite Public to Bargaining Table

Fontana, Calif.—In a major innovation in labor-management relations, the Steelworkers and Kaiser Steel Corp. have agreed to authorize a permanent committee, including spokesmen of the public, to advise them on collective bargaining matters.

The agreement, subject to ratification by the USWA executive board and Kaiser Steel trustees, grew out of the successful discussions of a nine-man committee representing management, labor and the public.

The committee, established by an agreement ending the steel strike of 1959, met here to find methods of avoiding future work stoppages and to acknowledge the public interest in labor-management negotiations.

The heart of its recommendation is that the three public members of the committee be invited, when and if necessary, to "sit in" at collective bargaining sessions and give advice. In effect, that would give the public a seat at the bargaining table.

Dr. George W. Taylor, committee chairman and University of Pennsylvania professor, announced the recommendation after a meeting here of the nine-member Committee on Long Range Problems. USWA Pres. David J. McDonald and Kaiser Board Chairman Edgar F. Kaiser praised the plan and said they would refer it to their executive boards for approval.

Plant Subcommittee Praised

Saying he spoke for the committee, Dr. Taylor praised the work of a six-man plant level subcommittee which has whittled down a backlog of plant grievances from 500 to less than 200, and has reduced by two-thirds the number of new grievances filed monthly.

Under the recommended new procedure, the company and the union would invite the public representatives of the committee to sit in on future contract negotiations and take steps, if necessary, to break deadlocks.

The nine-man committee recommended that labor and management meet no later than 60 days before contract expiration to bargain collectively, and that the committtee meet to review the status of negotiations 30 days before the contract expires.

Public members of the committee then would be authorized to take any or all of the following steps:

- Decide to take no action, or to postpone action while the negotiations continue;
- Attend the bargaining sessions as observers;
- Engage in mediation efforts, including private consultations with each side;
- Issue a private report to both sides summarizing their position, defining the issues in dispute, and making recommendations for settlement;
- Issue a public report before or after the contract expiration date. The public members "shall not release a public report until the company and the union have had every reasonable opportunity" to agree.

Dr. Taylor pointed out that neither the company nor the union would give up its responsibility to reach agreements independently of the committee and that neither side would be bound by the recommendations or suggestions of the public members. He said the recommended agreement would not change the original goal of the committee to pioneer a plan to "insure proper sharing of the company's progress among stockholders, employes, and the public."

Public members of the committee are Taylor, John T. Dunlop of Harvard University and David L. Cole, former director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Union members are McDonald, Marvin J. Miller, assistant to the president, and Charles J. Smith, West Coast USWA district director. Company representatives are Edgar Kaiser, Board Vice Chairman Eugene E. Trefethen, Jr., and C. Fred Borden, executive vice president.

Continuity Emphasized

Taylor said he believes the agreement, if finally approved, would be "contractually unique" in U.S. labor-management relations.

"It would," he said, "provide meeting between union leaders and company executives on a continuing basis, and provide a procedure by which the company and the union are inviting the help of the three public members when it may be needed in future contract discussions.

"Experience in recent steel disputes demonstrates that constructive innovations are called for to assist the collective bargaining process in furthering the peaceful resolution of differences."

The committee's statement pointed out that up to now, the only alternative to bargaining has been governmental intervention, often "resented by one or both parties" to the interrupted bargaining.

Other developments at the committee meeting were these:

- The committee announced the resignation of Arthur J. Goldberg, former USWA legal counsel, as one of its union members and congratulated him on his appointment as Secretary of Labor in the President's Cabinet. Goldberg said the committee's new plan has "great possibilities for industrial peace" and promised to follow its development with interest;
- McDonald announced the appointment of Miller, his assistant, to the committee. Miller has been union coordinator for the Human Relations Research Committee;
- A subcommittee of three members—Cole, Smith and Borden—said progress has been made in establishing an "improved climate" between the parties at the Fontana steel plant. It praised a six-man plant level committee for speeding grievance handling—Keith Geisert, George Sirolli and D. A. Vallecorsa for the union; G. E. Balsley, Charles M. Heath and R. J. Wayne for the company.

Steel Walkout Furore 'Unwarranted'--Mitchell

Despite former Pres. Eisenhower's use of a Taft-Hartley Act injunction to halt the 1959 strike in the steel industry, James P. Mitchell conceded just before leaving office as Secretary of Labor that steel strikes "do not warrant the public consternation and outcry that have occurred in the past."

Mitchell based his conclusion on a special report on the impact of steel shutdowns and negotiations on the economy prepared by a study group headed by Prof. E. Robert Livernash of the Graduate School of Business of Harvard University.

The actual adverse effects of steel strikes "have not been of serious magnitude," Livernash declared in the summary to his 327-page report. He added that collective bargaining settlements in the industry have not had a "predominant independent influence" either on wages or prices in the economy.

The report to the Labor Dept., culminating 14 months of study, criticized the "exaggerated interpretation of the national emergency dimension of steel strikes"—the yardstick by which the Eisenhower Administration measured the record 116-day dispute in 1959 in seeking a Taft-Hartley injunction to force 500,000 members of the Steelworkers back to the mills.

Although Mitchell issued a statement declaring that the report's findings "lead inevitably" to the conclusion that "public consternation and outcry" over steel disputes have been unwarranted, a Labor Dept. spokesman said the former secretary did not believe the report challenged the Administration's injunction action in 1959.

Pressures Blocked

Livernash contended that government intervention under the national emergency provision of T-H usually came at the same point in the dispute that the pressures upon both labor and management to settle the strike were "substantially irresistible." He said this resulted from the economic pinch felt by both strikers who have been without normal income for an extended period and management's desire to handle mounting unfilled orders from steel users.

In the event a steel strike poses a threat to supplies of specialty steel needed for national defense purposes, Livernash said, the government should give consideration to "partial operation" of the steel industry to fill such needs. This could be done, he said, by ordering selected plants to reopen and sending steel workers back to work at these plants.

The report expressed opposition to proposals that would give the President an arsenal of weapons to deal with national emergency disputes as opposed to the present single weapon of injunctions against the union.

Livernash proposed, instead, that the government abandon its plan for "intervention" in these strikes, declaring that such action "tends to frustrate and hinder the process of negotiation."

In place of formal action, he said, the government should confine itself to "late, informal and mediatory intervention" which he said would be "least harmful in achieving a pattern" of free collective bargaining.

Meyner Urged to Sign Anti-Strikebreaker Bill

Trenton, N. J.—New Jersey unions have urged Gov. Robert B. Meyner (D) to sign a bill sharply restricting the use of strikebreakers and outlawing professional "scab-herders" whose business is to furnish replacements for striking workers.

The bill, passed by the Democratic-controlled lower house of the legislature last spring, was dislodged from a Senate committee pigeonhole and won unanimous approval of the GOP-controlled upper house after the Senate Republican caucus voted endorsement.

Despite reservations by some unions about a section of the bill restricting pickets from outside the state, both New Jersey central bodies—the State Federation of Labor and the State Industrial Union Council—strongly urged the governor to sign the bill.

Meyner, who has until Feb. 24 to act, told a union delegation that his legal advisers have raised questions regarding the constitutionality of some sections of the bill. A conference between labor attorneys and state lawyers has been called for Jan. 25 to discuss the legislation.

Strongest Curb

The New Jersey bill would provide the strongest curb on strikebreakers enacted by any state.

It bans importation into the state—by anyone, including the struck employer—of replacements for any employes "who are lawfully on strike or who have been locked out."

The bill also makes it unlawful for third parties to a dispute to recruit or furnish strikebreakers, even when the operation is conducted entirely within the state.

Licensed employment agencies are also prohibited from knowingly referring an applicant to a struck employer.

Passage of the bill climaxed a two-year campaign, sparked by unions in the printing trades and newspaper industry, where professional strikebreaking agencies have been used in many areas of the nation by union-busting publishers.

4 Dominican Locals Lose ILA Charters

The Intl. Longshoremen's Association has revoked the charters it had granted to four locals in the Dominican Republic, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced.

Revocation of the charters was ordered by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last Aug. 26. At that time, in a letter to Capt. William A. Bradley, ILA president, Meany said the AFL-CIO's "traditional opposition to all dictatorships . . . would be ill-served and indeed undermined by having any one of its affiliates grant a charter in a country where a vicious and condemned dictatorship makes impossible the existence of a genuine autonomous labor movement."

Meany said he had received copies of the revocation notices from Bradley. The ILA notices call for the return of the charters and direct the Dominican groups to stop using the ILA name.

"We hope the time will come soon when democracy is restored to your country and it will be possible to again re-establish fraternal relations between your labor movement and the American labor movement," the notices conclude.

Cleveland News Guild Elects Ad Salesman

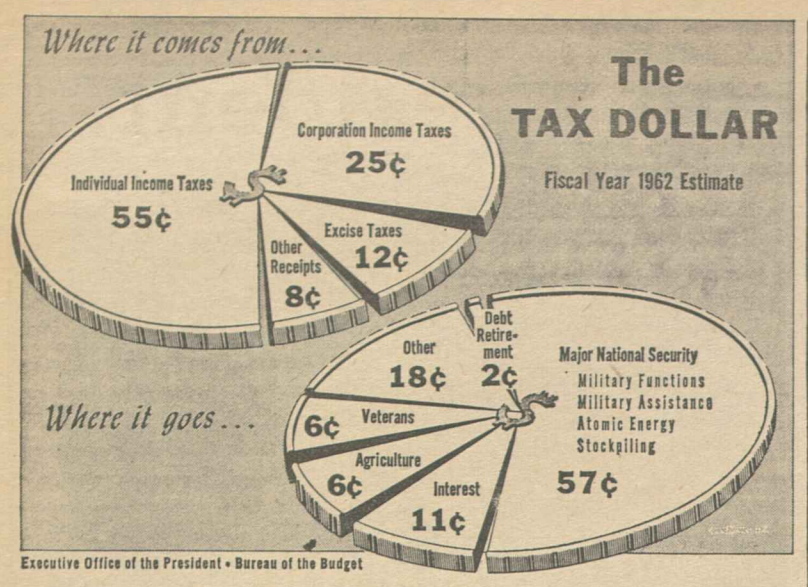
Cleveland—Jack F. Weir, advertising salesman for the weekly Catholic Universe Bulletin, has been elected president of the Newspaper Guild's 560-member Cleveland local. He is the first commercial department worker to accept nomination as president in ANG Local 1's history.

Civil Rights Report Hails Major Gains

New York—The record of steady civil rights advances in 1960, and over the past decade, indicates that second-class citizenship based on extraneous factors such as race, religion and national origin is on the way out.

Pres. Herbert B. Ehrmann of the American Jewish Committee came to that conclusion in "The People Take the Lead," the committee's annual report on civil rights. The report was distributed by National Labor Service, 165 E. 56th Street, New York 22.

Ehrmann noted these advances in 1960: Congress passed the second Federal Civil Rights Law in 85 years; Delaware joined 16 other states by passing an enforceable fair employment practice law; 17 new southern school districts began to desegregate their public schools; the political platforms of Democrats and Republicans emphasized our "continuing commitment to civil rights" in the years ahead. Student sit-ins caught the headlines, but many other unspectacular advances did not, he said.



PRES. EISENHOWER, in his last Budget Message to Congress, gave these estimates of where the money will come from and where it will go in fiscal 1962, beginning next July 1. These figures are subject to revision by the new Kennedy Administration, both in terms of revenue and expenditures.

publican leaders, approved without dissent a resolution charging the plan was an effort to "pack" the committee.

The action on diluting the power of the Republican-Dixiecrat axis came after Dwight D. Eisenhower, in the final days of his GOP Administration, sent Congress his lame-duck Budget and Economic Messages.

Eisenhower forecast a slim $79 million surplus for the fiscal year which ends June 30—but the surplus was predicated on congressional enactment of a postal rate increase by Apr. 1.

For fiscal 1962, Eisenhower's last budget called for record peacetime spending of $80.8 billion and receipts of $82.3 billion—but a gain achievement of the $1.5 billion surplus forecast by the outgoing Administration rested on hikes in postal rates and gasoline taxes plus continuation of excise taxes scheduled to expire June 30.

Neither the Budget nor Economic Messages paid anything but passing reference to the current recession and the 6.8 percent of the work force idled by the downturn in the economy. Outgoing Budget Dir. Maurice Stans said there were no anti-recession measures built into the budget "because we don't feel they're needed."

Stans told reporters at a press briefing that the Eisenhower Administration felt the economy was in good shape and added that "a few statements of confidence on the part of the (Kennedy) Administration will do more for the economy than billions of dollars of fast spending."

Eisenhower called on the nation's new President to maintain what he said was the "fiscal responsibility" practiced during the eight years of GOP leadership, and strongly advised his successor against running the government "by credit cards."

In a farewell radio and television address to the nation, Eisenhower—at 70 the nation's oldest chief executive—cautioned that the U.S. faces a long struggle against Communism, warned against seeking "miraculous solutions" to either international or domestic problems, and wished the new President and his Administration "Godspeed."

Senate Considers Nominees

While the House was working to speed enactment of Kennedy Administration measures, the Senate was involved in a round of hearings on nominations to high Administration posts. The Senate was scheduled to meet on Jan. 21 to give quick approval to Kennedy's official family.

The move to enlarge the Rules Committee was put forward by Rayburn as an alternative to a more drastic proposal which called for the "purge" of Rep. William Colmer (D-Miss.), one of the two conservative Democrats in the coalition, who bolted the Democratic Party in November and campaigned against the Kennedy-Johnson ticket.

Rayburn did not immediately indicate who the two additional Democrats on the Rules Committee would be, but pledged to the caucus that they would be Democrats "who support the Democratic position in and out of Congress."

Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), the other Democrat in the right-wing alliance, dropped his opposition in the party caucus to the proposal, declaring he knew there were too many votes against him. Smith indicated, however, that he might oppose the move on the House floor.

Kennedy Supports Jobsite Picket Bill

A bill to permit building trades unions to picket jobsites where several contractors are working has been introduced in the 87th Congress with the backing of the new Kennedy Administration.

Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) said the bill has the approval of Pres. Kennedy and is designed to remove "present inequitable restrictions upon the rights" of building trades unions to engage in peaceful picketing at construction sites.

The situs picketing measure varies only slightly from one Kennedy sponsored as a Senator last year. It would require a 10-day cooling-off period before any work stoppage could take place during construction of a military base or a missile launching site.

E. C. Hallbeck Elected New GEC Chairman

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Post Office Clerks has been elected chairman of the AFL-CIO Government Employes' Council. He succeeds Letter Carriers Pres. William C. Doherty who was not a candidate for re-election.

Other officers elected were Jerome J. Keating, Letter Carriers, vice chairman; Orrin A. Burrows, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, secretary-treasurer; and James A. Campbell, Government Employes, Russell M. Stephens, Technical Engineers, W. H. Ryan, Machinists, Paul A. Nagle, Postal Transport Association, William D. Buck, Fire Fighters, and James F. Bailey, Carpenters, trustees.

As New Administration Begins:

World Problems Stressed By Kennedy Task Forces

Pres. John F. Kennedy assumed office as the nation's 35th chief executive armed with the last of a series of reports from special task forces he had assigned to study problems facing his new Administration.

In the week preceding his inauguration, Kennedy announced a series of new selections for his official family, closed his temporary Palm Beach, Fla., headquarters where he had worked on his inaugural address, and flew to Washington for his second meeting with Dwight D. Eisenhower, the man he succeeded in the White House.

Earlier, Kennedy became the first chief executive to divest himself of all personally held stocks and securities in a move aimed at averting any question of possible conflicts of interest.

In advance of taking office, Kennedy announced he had reinvested the funds from the stock sales in federal, state and municipal bonds and said that any additional money accruing from irrevocable family trust funds would also be put into government bonds during his occupancy of the White House.

Policy Need Emphasized

Three of the final task-force reports presented to the new President in advance of the inaugural dealt with crucial matters in the international arena, while the fourth was geared to meeting the nation's needs in the field of natural resources.

A disarmament task force warned against early arms negotiations with the Soviet Union until a basic U. S. policy had been defined. The group cautioned that Russian pressures for disarmament talks would intensify in mid-March when the United Nations reconvenes. The report was critical of the Eisenhower Administration for never having developed a "basic" arms posture.

Another foreign affairs task force, devoted to studying the U.S. Information Agency, urged that its new director be designated as "principal adviser" to the President and the Secretary of State on international cultural and information matters, and that the director be made a member of the National Security Council.

Africa Spotlighted

A study group on Africa urged that Kennedy move swiftly to ask Congress for supplemental funds to enlarge diplomatic staffs in the newly emerging African nations. It urged also that the President develop an "integrated, coordinated policy" toward these new republics.

In the natural resources field a committee headed by Rep. Frank E. Smith (D-Miss.) urged "vigorous new leadership" to speed action on flood control, water pollution control, national parks expansion and harbor and waterway development.

Chief among the new appointments announced by Kennedy were:

- Dr. Glenn T. Seaborg, 48, Nobel-prize-winning chemist and chancellor of the University of California at Berkeley, to be Atomic Energy Commission chairman.
- George W. Ball, 51, a Des Moines, Ia., lawyer, to be Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs.
- Edward Gudeman, 54, Chicago investment banker, to be Under Secretary of Commerce.
- Elvis J. Stahr, Jr., 44, president of the University of West Virginia, to be Secretary of the Army.
- Former Gov. George Docking (D-Kan.) to be a member of the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank.
- Former Gov. Herschel C. Loveless (D-Ia.) to be a member of the Defense Renegotiation Board.
- John S. Gleason, Jr., 45, past national commander of the American Legion, to head the Veterans Administration.
- John E. Horne, administrative assistant to Sen. John Sparkman (D-Ala.), to head the Small Business Administration.
- Prof. Wilbur J. Cohen, 47, of the University of Michigan, to be Assistant Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare for legislative matters.
- Former Rep. James M. Quigley (D-Pa.), 42, to be Assistant HEW Secretary for federal and state matters.
- Alanson W. Willcox, 59, general counsel of the American Hospital Association, to be HEW's general counsel.
- Dr. Luther L. Terry, 49, assistant director of the National Heart Institute and faculty member at Johns Hopkins Medical School, to be Surgeon General.

Extend Drive on Bias, Contracts Group Urges

Discrimination is America's "most destructive social and economic problem," declared the government's Committee on Government Contracts in making recommendations in its final report to Pres. Eisenhower.

The committee, with alternate labor members in attendance, presented its report to Pres. Eisenhower at the White House. Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon has been chairman in recent years.

The report recommended that "the federal government, through legislation, executive order or administrative ruling, as may be appropriate, extend the principle of equal opportunity" to three broad areas.

The principle should be applied, the report said, to grant-in-aid programs to the states, especially those involving education, training, recruitment or referral; to federally-aided housing and to federally-aided state and local programs.

The group renewed its recommendation that Congress pass legislation creating a statutory commission, even while noting Congress rejected such a proposal three times in the past two years.

Lack of Funds Cited

Statutory authority might overcome one of the committee's greatest handicaps, the report stressed—a lack of adequate funds to enlarge its staff and establish "badly-needed" regional offices.

Attending the final meeting of the committee were the following alternate labor members: Boris Shishkin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Victor Reuther, administrative assistant to Auto Workers' Pres. Walter P. Reuther, and George L-P Weaver, assistant to Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers' Pres. James B. Carey.

Eisenhower reorganized the committee in 1953 and charged it with responsibility for administering the non-discrimination clause in government contracts.

In its report, the committee said its progress could be measured by the fact that the percentage of government contractors hiring Negroes at the professional and technical level rose from 14 percent in 1957 to 38 percent in 1959; the number of plants with Negroes in supervisory capacities rose from 19 percent in 1957 to 36 percent in 1959.

Shop Chairmen Get AFL-CIO News

Brooklyn—An executive board proposal to subscribe to the AFL-CIO News for all shop chairmen of Local 325, Hotel and Restaurant Employes, has been approved by the membership.

Pres. Harry Dalles and Sec.-Treas. Abe Silverstein have advised the chairmen that it will be considered part of their education to read the paper regularly and communicate pertinent news to union members.

Local 325 represents cooks, countermen, soda dispensers, food checkers, cashiers and assistants in Brooklyn and Queens. Members are scattered over a wide area, and getting a regular flow of authentic information into their hands is a continuous problem.

"We believe," said Silverstein, "that the AFL-CIO News has done a wonderful job of informing its readers on the issues that confront labor and the American people. The program of the AFL-CIO encompasses nearly all of the basic issues confronting the American people."

'Pop' Woolls Leaves Staff After 51 Years

A career of 51 years of service to the AFL-CIO and the former AFL has ended for Seymour B. (Pop) Woolls, 67, who retired Jan. 13 from his post as head of the mail room at the federation's national headquarters.

Woolls went to work for the former AFL on May 1, 1910 at the age of 16, starting as a messenger and winning promotion to the post of mail room head two years later.

When Woolls joined the federation staff, Samuel Gompers, founder of the AFL, was its president, and Woolls recalled that whenever he had occasion to take a message to Gompers' home, the labor official would insist that he stay for a meal.

In 1910 when Woolls started working for the labor movement, the AFL mailing list numbered only a few thousand. In 1960, he said, the department which he headed used 5.3 million sheets of paper to help carry labor's message.

Woolls has 10 children, including a son, Leo, who is comptroller for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Washington.

Named to succeed Woolls as head of the mail room was Edwin Schmidt.

The Cabinet: Advisers to the President...

DEAN RUSK

THE TASK of shaping a vigorous new foreign policy to meet the challenge of Communist imperialism will fall to Dean Rusk, 51, selected by Pres. Kennedy for the key post of Secretary of State.

Rusk, a Democrat, has been president of the Rockefeller Foundation and served as Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs during the Truman Administration.

Born in Cherokee County, Ga., the son of a Presbyterian minister-farmer, he attended Davidson College at Davidson, N. C., and later was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University.

To Rusk will be assigned the task of formulating foreign policy based on the concept of continued support of peace and freedom.

In the area of immediate problems facing the Secretary of State-designate will be the Communist penetration of the Western Hemisphere through the establishment of a Moscow-oriented government in Cuba; tense situation resulting from Communist activities in Laos and the situation in the Congo.

DOUGLAS DILLON

THE VIGOR with which the American economy moves forward during the Kennedy years will be influenced to a great extent, by C. Douglas Dillon, a 51-year-old Republican, chosen as Secretary of the Treasury.

"In all the long sweep of American history," Kennedy declared in announcing Dillon's selection, "I do not believe (that) greater burdens, greater responsibilities and . . . greater opportunities have fallen on the Secretary of the Treasury."

The problems facing Dillon and the new Administration are many; a recession economy with 6.8 percent of the labor force idled in mid-December; further sharp cutbacks facing the steel and auto industries; and the flight of U.S. capital abroad.

For the past three years Dillon has served as Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs in the Eisenhower Administration.

Born in Switzerland, son of the head of the famous investment banking firm of Dillon, Read & Co., he graduated from Harvard University in 1931.

ROBERT S. McNAMARA

DESIGNATED as Secretary of Defense in the Kennedy Administration was Robert S. McNamara, 44, president of Ford Motor Co. and a registered Republican who nevertheless has frequently supported Democrats.

A native of San Francisco, McNamara graduated from the University of California in 1937 and received his master's degree from Harvard University in 1939. For the next three years he served as assistant professor of business administration at Harvard.

McNamara left Harvard to serve in the Air Force from 1943 to 1946, holding the rank of lieutenant colonel at war's end. He joined Ford in 1946, and rose rapidly to head the nation's second largest automotive firm.

McNamara's assignment was summed up by Kennedy, at the time he chose his defense chief, when he said the military establishment "must be so strong that it cannot merely defend the nation in the event of war but, rather, so strong it can maintain the peace."

ROBERT F. KENNEDY

CHIEF law enforcement officer for the country during the new Administration will be 35-year-old Robert F. Kennedy, selected by his brother for the post of Attorney General.

Kennedy gained nationwide fame during the three years of the McClellan special Senate committee, which he served as chief counsel. Prior to that he had been an attorney in the Justice Dept. which he will now head, and later was a member of the Democratic staff of the Senate Committee on Government Operations during the McCarthy era.

A graduate of the University of Virginia law school, Kennedy went from his post with the McClellan committee into the political arena, managing his brother's successful drive to win the Democratic nomination. He continued as the Kennedy campaign manager for the November election.

Kennedy has said that one of the main targets of the Justice Dept. during his tenure as Attorney General will be to stamp out organized crime in the nation.

J. EDWARD DAY

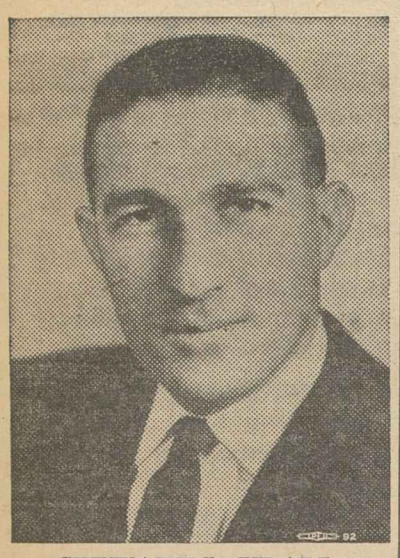
RUNNING the nation's Post Office Dept.—the world's largest business—is the assignment Kennedy has handed to California insurance man J. Edward Day.

The 46-year-old Postmaster General-designate, a Democrat, is vice president in charge of Western operations of Prudential Life Insurance Co.

Day, a native of Jacksonville, Ill., received his degree from Harvard Law School in 1938, and served as a lieutenant in the Navy from 1940 to 1945. From 1950 until 1953 he was Illinois insurance commissioner under then Gov. Adlai Stevenson.

In his new post, Day will take over operations of the postal system which last year spent more than $3.8 billion and employed more than half a million people.

The duties assigned to the new Postmaster General by Kennedy, at the time the appointment was announced, were to see that the Post Office Dept. be "run in the most efficient way possible, that it have the best possible service, that its employes enjoy the best possible working conditions."



STEWART L. UDALL

A BROAD RANGE of problems—running from public power to reclamation—will face 40-year-old Stewart L. Udall in his post as Secretary of the Interior.

Kennedy spelled out his views on the Interior Dept.'s function when, in appointing Udall, he said he would be "concerned with the orderly and effective development of the resources of the U.S. in order that the people now living in the country and the people who will come later may enjoy the heritage which nature has provided for all of us."

Udall, a native of St. Johns, Ariz., brings to his new assignment the experience of six years as a congressman from Arizona, during which he served both on the House Interior Committee and the House Education and Labor Committee.

During his service in the House, to which he won re-election easily last November, Udall was regarded as one of the ablest of the young liberals.

A graduate of the University of Arizona law school in 1948, he served in the Air Force during World War II.

ORVILLE L. FREEMAN

A MIDWESTERN governor—42-year-old Orville L. Freeman of Minnesota—was tapped by the Kennedy Administration for the post of Agriculture Secretary.

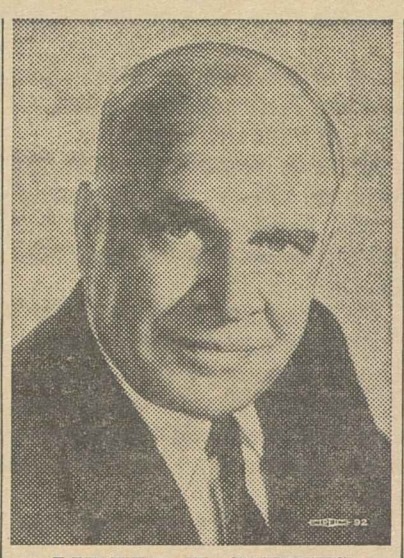
The job outlined by Kennedy for the new head of the Agriculture Dept. is a major one.

The nation's agricultural problems are numerous: farm income is down; prices farmers pay for everything from feed to equipment are up; the farmer's share of the consumer's food dollar has fallen steadily over the past eight years; huge surpluses of farm products have piled up despite programs to limit production; and migration from the family farm has increased.

Handling these problems will be the duty of Freeman, three-term Democratic governor of Minnesota.

A graduate of the University of Minnesota law school in 1946, he served with the Marine Corps in the Pacific during World War II.

He served as assistant to Hubert Humphrey, then mayor of Minneapolis, from 1945 to 1949, and was chairman of the Minnesota Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party from 1948 to 1950.



LUTHER H. HODGES

THE COMMERCE DEPT. "will be in the forefront of the battle" to maintain employment and help the American economy move ahead again, Kennedy declared in announcing the appointment of North Carolina Gov. Luther H. Hodges, 62, as Secretary of Commerce.

Specific assignments of the department under the new Administration, Kennedy said, will include "maintaining our position in international trade, developing and encouraging new markets, providing some degree of assurance and protection for those who trade with us, dealing with the problems which are raised in Western Europe by new trade structures, as well as trade with under-developed areas of the world."

The oldest of the 10 men selected to serve in the Kennedy Cabinet, Hodges has been Democratic governor of North Carolina since 1955.

A native of Pittsylvania County, Va., Hodges graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1919 and joined Fieldcrest Mills, a division of Marshall Field & Co. in the 1920s and rose to the post of vice president.

ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG

A VETERAN labor lawyer, Arthur J. Goldberg, special counsel to the AFL-CIO, has been chosen by Kennedy to be his Secretary of Labor.

Kennedy praised Goldberg as "one of the country's leading experts" in the complex field of industrial relations and paid particular tribute to the 52-year-old Chicago-born lawyer for having devised the "effective and successful procedures" under which Communist-led unions were expelled from the former CIO.

Goldberg, who attended Northwestern University, won his law degree in 1929. He served as an Army major with the Office of Strategic Services during World War II.

He has spent his entire professional career in the field of labor law, becoming general counsel of the former CIO in 1947. At the time of his selection for the Cabinet post, Goldberg was also serving as general counsel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., general counsel of the Steelworkers.

In his new post Goldberg will be concerned particularly with measures for reducing the current high level of unemployment.

ABRAHAM A. RIBICOFF

RESPONSIBILITY for framing the Kennedy Administration's proposals to Congress in the fields of medical care for the aged under the social security system and federal aid to education will fall to 50-year-old Abraham A. Ribicoff, who will take over as Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

Born in New Britain, Conn., and a graduate of the University of Chicago law school, Ribicoff served in the Connecticut legislature from 1938 to 1942, spent two years as a municipal judge in Hartford, and was a member of Congress from 1949 to 1952.

Ribicoff has served as governor of the Nutmeg State since 1955, and has been traffic safety chairman of the National Governors Conference.

The wide scope of activities of the HEW Dept., concerned as it is with stimulating better health and education for the American people, were cited by Kennedy in announcing his choice of Ribicoff for the Cabinet post.

Ribicoff's post will be in the forefront of the social progress envisioned by the Kennedy Administration.

The President

SHORTLY AFTER NOON on Jan. 20 John Fitzgerald Kennedy became the 35th and youngest elected "Mr. President" in the nation's history. In that moment of solemn oath-taking Kennedy was celebrating not only a personal triumph but the triumph of a system of government.

The system was put on full display at historic Capitol Plaza—as it is once every four years—with all the ceremonial touches and flourishes in keeping with a republican form of government. The legislative branch, the judicial branch and the executive branch—old and new—and the citizens fortunate enough to squeeze into the restricted area witnessed the ultimate demonstration of democratic strength—the peaceful transfer of power to a new Administration.

At this moment in 1961 the presidency is surely the most powerful temporal office in the world. The President of the United States is also the leader of the Free World—the world that believes and is ready to fight for the system of democratic freedoms.

It is within the power of the President to influence the course of democracy over the next four years, to extend its time-tested strength and dedication to help bring about peace, freedom and social justice or to fall back to a narrow, limited base while an oppresive totalitarianism spreads its dark shadow over the globe.

The inauguration of Pres. Kennedy demonstrates to a watchful world that an opposition party can present its case to the citizens in a democratic system and emerge victorious at the polls; that on a designated day an Administration that has held power for eight years peacefully and in an orderly manner turns over the reins of power to the victor.

This is a potent testimonial to the strength of the democratic system, to the maturity of the democratic process in the United States. It is of extreme importance in terms of the newly emerging nations searching and groping for an effective system of government to meet the critical problems of nationhood.

And as if to underscore the solemn nature of this quadrennial rededication to democracy, the dancing and the parading, the gala and endless round of receptions and parties are the seasoning that gives zest and verve to American democracy.

Pres. Kennedy has given meaningful proof of his understanding of the democratic spirit, of the basic principles of the democratic system, and has pledged to strengthen and expand it, to give it new meaning to those Americans whose rights have not been redeemed.

In the spirit that this inauguration marks—the rededication to democracy—the nation will unite as it has in the past behind a new President.

As the only nationally elected public official, he speaks for America.

As the inheritor of a great democratic tradition, he speaks to the world in the basic terms of democracy:

"That all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

An Example to the World:

Peaceful Transfer of Power Great Moment of Inauguration

TO ONE VETERAN Washington reporter, the most impressive moment of the inauguration ceremonies comes when the outgoing President of the United States and the new President of the United States ride up Pennsylvania Ave. from the White House to the Capitol.

Of this tradition, he writes:

"There is something about that moment in American history that is deeply moving, the peaceful transfer of immense power from one President to another as the result of democratic elections."

Americans can be grateful for that moment. They can be particularly grateful this year as John F. Kennedy, victor by a razor-thin margin of some 100,000 votes out of almost 70 million, takes over the world's most powerful office in an atmosphere of national friendship and good will.

In a world torn by revolutionary strife, the world's oldest modern democracy is still setting an example of how free men can govern themselves through the ballot box and can make huge transferrals of power without bitterness or recrimination.

The story of American inaugurals is a dramatic one that might well play a greater role in American folklore than it does now.

THERE WAS THAT FIRST inaugural in 1789 when General Washington traveled the muddy roads between his home in Mount Vernon to the new nation's temporary capital, New York City, determined to make the then tottering nation survive. After the long and triumphal trip, Washington took the first oath of office on the balcony of Federal Hall on the site of today's Subtreasury.

Irascible John Adams was openly annoyed because the inaugural crowd was clearly more interested in the retiring President than it was in the new. Other retiring presidents haven't looked too happy, and one even skipped out the night before the inaugural, but by and large, our Presidents have shifted the presidency with grace and good will.

Jefferson's inauguration in 1801 was the first to take place in Washington, then a muddy, shabby town that drew the laughter of European aristocrats.

History is not quite clear whether Jefferson rode alone on horseback up that "long mile" that separates the White House from the Capitol or whether he walked with a band of his admirers trailing alongside, but it didn't matter. Retiring John Adams, in political pique, wasn't there, but the people were, and a new era in America history had begun.

The Jackson inaugural carried the American story forward another huge step as the man from the West and his rag-tag supporters overwhelmed the capital, stormed the White House on inaugural night, stood on the damask-covered chairs and settees, broke furniture and could only be lured out when the punch barrels were set on the White House lawn. It was a crude moment in American history, but historically represented the triumph of the common folk and a new day for the nation.

THERE WAS ANOTHER historic inaugural to come some 30 years later when Abraham Lincoln stood gaunt and awkward on the platform outside the Capitol to take over a nation, bitterly torn and divided, with seven states already in secession.

Woodrow Wilson's second inaugural in 1917 was another moving moment as the world thundered to the guns of World War I, the war that eventually was to engulf and place our feet as a nation on the path of international leadership.

FDR's inaugurals are vivid in the minds of millions of Americans still alive. "The only thing we have to fear is—fear itself" was the ringing call to national courage that FDR sounded in his first inaugural, and the people rallied overwhelmingly to the challenge of a nation plunged into its worst depression.

Today as the international sky grows blacker and the Communist threat grows bolder, as our own economy, vast as it is, is in stagnation and our jobless rolls steadily grow longer, the Kennedy inaugural takes on a meaning dramatically similar to some of those crucial inaugurals of the past.

It will be a moment that will begin, not at the Inaugural Ball or the Inaugural Gala or in the "white tie" gatherings of "Very Important Persons," but at the moment when President Eisenhower steps into the car with President-elect Kennedy to escort him to the Capitol for that peaceful and immensely significant transfer of power.

As our veteran and blase Washington journalist has put it, "This is the moment of triumph of our American democracy." (Washington Window—PAI)

Morgan Says:

School Segregation Takes Toll In Both Money and Morality

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THE CAREFULLY GUARDED calm maintained at the University of Georgia may be ruptured again before steady adjustment is made to the presence of Negro students on a campus reserved exclusively for whites for 175 years. But now, in the interval of quiet when minds are less bloodshot with passion, this might be an appropriate time to absorb the fact that the violation of civil rights is costing us money.

Morgan

Impatient idealists may be inclined to brush aside this finding as irrelevantly crass or at least not so important as the moral aspects of the issue. History has often shown, however, that a tweak of the taxpayer's pocketbook can do more than a twinge of conscience in arousing the public to action. When morality and money are favorably combined, the cause may go a long way.

Take for instance, the inequalities in public education. Figure the problem this way: more than 10 percent of the American population are Negroes. All but the smallest handful of them are getting inferior education if they are getting any schooling at all. So 10 percent of the country's most precious resource, people, is being wasted at a time when we need to exploit our human talents to the utmost.

No business could long endure with such extravagance; a society can afford it even less. In a detailed report on discrimination in public higher education, the U.S. Civil Rights Commission reveals what an expensive vicious circle this unconstitutional practice has become.

"The over-all effect of segregation in public education at both the college and the public school levels," says the report, "has been to give a substantial portion of the population the opportunity to obtain only an inferior education. Moreover, the effects of such deprivations are self-perpetuating; that is, students from inferior schools can attend only inferior colleges, where they are often trained as inferior teachers, and from which they return to teach in the same inferior schools."

With such consistently inferior treatment, what a wonder it is that any Negroes have been able to break through that barrier to any recognition at all; in fact, not just a few but many have.

The commission makes the legitimate point that northern and western institutions of higher learning are by no means free of racial prejudice but it emphasizes that the trouble is concentrated in six hard-core "resistant" states, so-called—South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Louisiana and Georgia. Written, obviously, before desegregation came to Georgia U. at Athens, its report said the basic problem lay in the South's "overt official resistance to any desegregation at all."

DESPITE the 1954 unanimous Supreme Court ruling that segregated public schooling violates the constitution, nearly half the state universities and colleges in Southern and border states are still open to whites only. Where barriers have come down, mere token desegregation exists. State-supported Negro schools are consistently inferior in programs and poorer in funds.

And here the Rights Commission puts a prodding finger on the federal government, indicts it as a "silent partner" in the perpetuation of these inequities by continuing to allow most U. S. government education aid funds to go to all-white institutions.

What with all the strident opposition to the principle of federal aid to education it may seem unbelievable, but the fact is that Washington has been helping states with schooling tasks almost since the founding of the Republic. Th federal government now puts out between 1.5 and 2 billion dollars a year to the states for general support of universities and colleges, loans for dormitory housing, aid to students and teachers in scholarships, scientific and other research.

In the Deep South, federal funds now provide about 15 percent of the revenues for state budgets for college education. And state legislatures divert nearly all this money to white schools. Here is a monstrously unpretty and insupportable paradox: the federal government subsidizing the unconstitutional segregation of higher education in the South. This can and must be corrected. The Commission's remedy: by executive decree or, if necessary, by act of Congress, withhold all aid from public universities and colleges which bar or otherwise discriminate against Negroes.

This is sound theory but brusque, clumsy application of it could be ruinous. The University of Georgia saga has revealed hidden pools of good will and respect for the law and the courts, and these moderating springs must exist on many other Southern campuses too.

Care must be taken against their being poisoned or dried up. Schools threatened with loss of federal funds should be allowed the opportunity to demonstrate good, sincere and "performable" intent before the axe falls.

Washington Reports:

Productive Legislative Session Predicted by Humphrey, Kuchel

SEN. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY (D-Minn.), new majority whip of the 87th Congress, predicted that Congress will accomplish more and argue less in the current session, as he was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), minority whip, pointed out on the same program that the Republican and Democratic platforms agree that action is needed on a number of issues, such as aid to education.

Humphrey said Congress will pass medical and hospital care for the elderly under social security, raise the minimum wage to $1.25 and extend coverage to 6 to 8 million more workers, pass a new farm program, housing and urban renewal legislation and area redevelopment, and forecast executive action on civil rights.

"One of the advantages we have," the majority whip asserted, "is that we have had hearings on practically all these subjects. All we need to do is to bring them up-to-date, and then move. We have a President now that will exercise the powers of his office and give us leadership."

KUCHEL STRESSED the need of passing a housing bill "which will give a stimulus to the construction of homes and also give an incentive to the people who buy homes. I hope," he said, "that the difficulties which prevented enacting of housing legislation in the last session may be overcome and we can make progress in a field that has laid considerably barren in the last two years but which is most important to the economy of the country."

In talking about the need for reform of the Electoral College system for electing a President and Vice President, Kuchel said "we need to give some attention to the possibility of a direct primary by the people."

The California senator said delay in enacting reform in the system may come from "small states jealous of the advantage they have under current procedures. But with insistence by the American people, I believe Congress can provide, in the next few years, a means of improving the present situation."

Humphrey, advocating a stronger and more efficient national defense, said: "The only way you can get disarmament is to go to the conference table strong enough to command respect. We have been unilaterally disarming in the name of a balanced budget."

He predicted executive action on civil rights in the areas of government defense and public works contracts and in the field of housing.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

"IT'S A VERY HARSH RULE," acknowledged Chairman Richard B. Russell (D-Ga.) as his Senate Armed Services Committee forced Defense Sec.-designate Robert S. McNamara to pledge that neither he nor the managers of his trust fund would invest in so-called "defense" stocks while McNamara held his post in Pres. Kennedy's Cabinet.

"Harsh" is the correct word for a policy that allows members of Congress to apply one standard of ethics and principle to members of the executive branch of government while applying an entirely different and lax standard to themselves as policy-making members of the legislative branch.

McNAMARA TOOK the initiative immediately on designation for his Cabinet post to eliminate the financial holdings that tied him to the Ford Motor Co. Perhaps warned by the experience of Charles E. Wilson of General Motors, eight years ago, he sold his Ford stock promptly and moved to set up his trust fund, under which his money would be managed by professionals and he would have no voice in the buying and selling that might go on.

He also renounced the stock option agreements under which he would have been enabled to buy Ford stock cheap and sell it high—a common arrangement of corporations to give their top executives deferred income at reduced tax rates.

The Russell committee nevertheless insisted on two changes: An agreement that if he should revoke the trust while still holding office, the Senate would be notified, and the further provision that the trustees could not acquire any stock in a company having government contracts with the Pentagon.

Despite its stringency, this was not an unreasonable requirement. It imposes, as did McNamara's renunciation of the stock options and his corporation salary, a serious financial loss, potential if not actual. But McNamara is a public official and the conflict-of-interest statutes should be observed in spirit as well as in letter.

THE DIFFICULT THING is to understand how senators can impose such standards while leaving themselves free of either rule or custom that might make them applicable to members of Congress.

A decade ago, Sen. Robert S. Kerr (D-Okla.) was sponsor of a natural gas bill that would have freed his own Kerr-McGee company, as well as others, from certain types of regulation by the Federal Power Commission. The bill was passed but then Pres. Truman vetoed it.

Former Sen. John W. Bricker (R-O.) maintained his connection with and income from his back-home law firm, representing among other clients the Pennsylvania Railroad, while functioning as chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee with jurisdiction over the laws and regulations covering railroads.

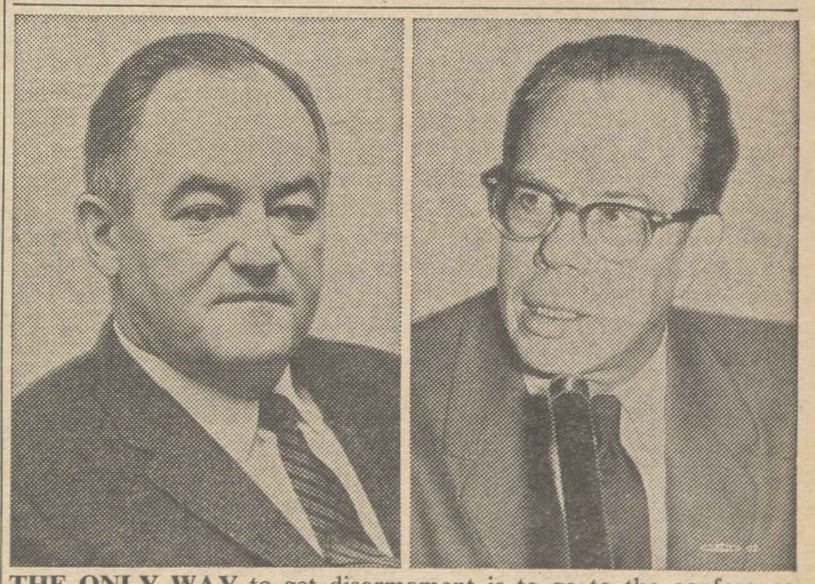
Sen. Harry S. Byrd (D-Va.), as chairman of the tax-writing Finance Committee, has great influence over tax policies affecting both his large apple-marketing business and his personal income.

Byrd and other members of Congress have a personal financial interest in the exemption of agricultural workers from coverage of the minimum wage law, the unemployment compensation system, the old-age and survivors and disability sections of the social security laws. But they do not hesitate to vote for the exemptions.

Suggestions have often been made that members of Congress would be well advised to make public reports of their financial operations and of their net worth. The late Sen. Richard L. Neuberger was a sponsor of bills to require it. But the proposal never gets to first base.

Perhaps it would be too stringent a rule. Russell very quickly rejected an offer by McNamara to let the committee publish his statement of holdings and net worth.

Nevertheless, there is a difference between proper representation of the interests of farming, labor or business constituents and the use of official legislative power for personal financial advantage. A sensitivity to ethical standards would seem desirable in the legislative field as well as in the executive departments of government.



THE ONLY WAY to get disarmament is to go to the conference table strong enough to command respect, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), new majority whip in the Senate (left), declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), minority whip, noted on the same program that Congressional action is needed on many matters, including education and housing.

How to Buy:

February Sales Offer Chance To Save on Home Furnishings

By Sidney Margolius

FEBRUARY IS THE MONTH to shop for furniture, rugs, drapes and housewares. The semi-annual home-equipment sales offer reductions of 10-30 percent on most furnishings, including those of well-known designers and manufacturers which are price-maintained most of the rest of the year.

Other sales this month which give you a chance to replenish your needs are nylon hosiery sales, notions sales offering reductions on sewing needs and household accessories, and the final clearances, at sharply - reduced prices, of men's and women's winter coats.

Even though winter is half over, midwinter is a good time to get low quotes for storm windows and doors. This is a slack season for installers. Prices of aluminum storm windows and doors have dropped sharply. A few years ago families were paying exaggerated fees of $800-$1,000 for typical installations. Now the average home can be equipped with aluminum combination storm windows for under $400; even less if you install yourself. Most satisfactory type is the three-channel tilt windows. But now two-channel tilt windows also are available, for about 20 percent less. These are self-storing and can be cleaned from inside like the three-channel type.

If the winter has been hard on your tires, you can get help from the recently-reduced prices. Most manufacturers have cut tire prices $1 to $4.

In home-repair and expansion needs, plumbing, lumber and heating equipment have dropped in price in recent months.

In food, beef's the buy this month. Boneless beef chuck generally is a better buy than chuck with the bone in, if the price is not more than 50 percent higher. For example, boneless chuck at 89 cents is better value than chuck with bone in at 69.

Lamb also is relatively reasonable this month, but pork is expensive. In pork, Boston butts are relatively reasonable. The Boston butt is the upper part of the shoulder. It has a higher percentage of lean than any other pork cut, the New York State Extension Marketing Service points out. The picnic, also often called Cala ham, is the lower part of the shoulder. It has more bone per pound than the Boston.

HERE ARE TIPS for getting your money's worth in February furniture sales:

Manufacturers have not reduced list prices this year, but business is lagging, and there are some sharp price cuts in this month's furniture sales. If you're planning to buy furniture soon, this is the time to do it.

But inspect the quality with great care, especially if buying vinyl plastic-upholstered chairs. Much moderate-price furniture now is covered in plastic. But a leading manufacturer, Morris Futorian, president of Futorian-Statford Furniture Co., recently charged that vinyl manufacturers were "permitting the wide use of inferior grades in upholstered goods today."

This manufacturer indicated that his own firm was being forced to use "inferior vinyls" because of "charlatans" in the trade, Home Furnishings Daily reported. He urged that some government quality grades be established.

Plastic upholstery covering has obvious advantages in ease of cleaning. It's in increasing use for everything from living room chairs to dinette sets. But how can you, the consumer, know whether you are getting good-quality plastic covering? The problem is that low-grade plastic coverings have the surface appearance of good grades.

First fact to know is that any plastic fabric used on chairs with springs, especially coil springs, should be the cloth-backed type called "supported plastic." Non-supported plastic may be satisfactory for flat surfaces, such as dinette chairs which have no springs. But it can't take the constant flexing of deep-spring upholstery.

The retailer should be able to tell you whether a plastic fabric is supported or not. You yourself can look at the end of the fabric underneath the chair to see whether it is cloth-backed.

But there are different grades even in supported plastic fabrics. One indication of quality is the gauge or thickness. The thicker the plastic fabric, the better it will withstand gouges, abrasion and flexing.

Actually, good-quality, cloth-backed plastic covering is not cheap. It costs as much as good-quality cotton fabric.

If you buy furniture covered in cotton or other cloth fabric, our advice is to choose pieces that have zippered covers for easy cleaning, and easy recovering later.

Actually one of the best ideas is to buy furniture "in the muslin." Some better-quality sofas and chairs are sold this way. Then you select the fabric you want and the store covers it for you. The smart idea is to buy pieces in the muslin, and then have them slip-covered right over the muslin. This way you save the double expense of putting slip covers over expensive upholstery fabric.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Jingle Bells, Get Your Turkey, Halloween Will Soon Be Here

By Jane Goodsell

HOW I KEEP TRACK of the seasons:

When department stores put up Christmas decorations, and children start writing letters to Santa Claus, and disc jockeys haul out records of "Jingle Bells" and "White Christmas," it's about time for Thanksgiving.

When candy stores feature heart-shaped boxes of chocolate creams, and greeting card racks are filled with Valentines, and Cupid is all over the place, it's time to take down the Christmas tree.

When I do my spring cleaning, it's October.

When the children get their Christmas thank-you letters written, it's time for the Easter bunny to arrive.

When the children dress for school in sleeveless cotton dresses and lightweight sweaters, it's a blustery day in March.

When my husband takes down the window screens, it's January.

When store windows display new fall coats and suits, it's time to take our August vacation.

WHEN THE CHILDREN spend the day playing in the basement, it's a lovely day in June.

When I get all the Christmas candles and decorations put away in the attic, it's February.

When I remember Aunt Minnie's birthday, which is May 8, it's July.

When newspaper advertisements caution me that Easter is just around the corner and I'd better hurry up and buy a new hat, it's St. Patrick's Day.

When my five-year-old starts telling me I'd better make her Halloween costume right now, it's the second week in September.

When store windows are filled with sun dresses and bathing suits and tropical beach scenes, it's January and it's snowing.

When the kids in our neighborhood start shooting off fire crackers, it's the day after school lets out in June.

Good Shows Can Be Exciting:

Quality Emphasized By Educational TV

THE NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL Radio and Television Center, with which the AFL-CIO will join in presenting the new television series, "Briefing Session" (see Pages 1 and 9), is a "fourth network" devoted to quality instead of commercials.

NET, as it's generally called, is the headquarters for 49 independent, non-commercial TV stations scattered across the country. The number of such stations is growing fast, and would grow faster if enough TV channels were made available by the Federal Communications Commission.

During the morning and early afternoon, NET stations primarily broadcast classroom material for local schools and colleges. In the late afternoon and evening they devote themselves to programs of general interest.

Although NET viewers don't see such commercial programs as Marshal Dillon, Michael Shayne and Jack Paar, what they get is by no means dull. Critics have described NET music and dancing programs as the best ever produced. A basic principle of the network is that good shows can be exciting, too.

NET currently supplies its affiliates with 10 hours of programs a week, with the remainder of the schedule being filled by the individual stations. Some NET shows are developed and produced by a member station and made available to the network; some are obtained from top independent producers, here and abroad; others, like "Briefing Session," originate with NET itself.

IN THE ABSENCE of commercials, the costs of educational television are met by foundations (such as the Ford Foundation), units of government (as with the material used in public schools) and corporations or other organizations that underwrite specific programs. The AFL-CIO's role in "Briefing Session" falls into the last category.

NET devotes all its time to the type of public service to which every commercial TV station, according to the law, is supposed to devote a reasonable part of its time. Unfortunately, as columnist John Crosby and many others have noted, the commercial stations have not fulfilled their obligations, and the FCC has done little or nothing to bring them into line.

The FCC has reserved 267 channels for educational television, but 179 of them are UHF (ultra-high frequency), which can't be seen on the ordinary home TV set without the installation of a converter.

Moreover, the VHF channels (the ones that run from 2 to 13 on your tuning knob) assigned to education are often in small, out-of-the-way places. Such big cities as New York, Washington, Cleveland and Los Angeles have no educational stations at all; others, such as Detroit, Atlanta and Cincinnati, have only UHF outlets.

Thirty-seven of NET's 49 affiliates are on VHF channels that any set can pick up, but they still leave major areas uncovered. The AFL-CIO will try to reach these areas by urging commercial stations to broadcast "Briefing Session" on public service time at an hour that will invite a good audience.

A complete schedule of "Briefing Session" telecasts, with station and time, will be published soon in the AFL-CIO News.

In Social Welfare Field:

Local Union Leaders Saluted For Community Leadership

Eight local trade union leaders have been saluted by the United Community Funds and Councils of America for the contributions they have made to serving community health and welfare services.

The unionists were singled out for praise in the current issue of "Community," the monthly national publication of the agency which coordinates some of the activities of united funds and community chests.

Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, said the unionists cited by the magazine were "outstanding examples of effective community leadership."

Their activities, he said, illustrate the fact that in addition to wages, hours and working conditions, unions are "concerned equally with health, welfare and living conditions."

Here is what the national publication had to say about the labor officials:

Lester H. Thornton, a sub-district director of the Steelworkers, was described as "the first man from organized labor" to serve as president of the United Community Chest in Hammond, Ind. The article quoted Chest Executive Richard F. Devine as saying that in his two years as president Thornton "set an enviable record as an outstanding citizen of the community."

James Pollard, secretary of the AFL-CIO Central Labor Council of Solano County, Calif., served last year as area campaign chairman for the North Bay United Crusade. He has been president of his local school board and one of 11 labor representatives on the United Crusade board.

Emile J. Bourg, secretary-treasurer of the Baton Rouge, La., Central Labor Union, was cited for his service to the United Givers Fund of Baton Rouge and to several other community agencies.

Robert E. M. Shuff, executive vice president of the Akron, O., Labor Council, was described as "the first representative of organized labor to be named United Fund president in a major city." The article gave Shuff major credit for the "long-time unity between organized labor and the community" in the health and welfare field.

Heads Council

Clifford C. Rock, former president of Auto Workers Local 599, Flint, Mich., was saluted for his service as president of the Community Welfare Council. The magazine said Rock has "the wholehearted cooperation of the council board and staff, who say he is doing an excellent job."

John W. Quimby, secretary-treasurer of the San Diego County Labor Council, has been active in the community service field for the past 15 years. Quimby is president of the San Diego County Community Chest and chairman of California's Industrial Welfare Commission. The article noted that he recently was instrumental in establishing minimum requirements for wages and working conditions for the state's agricultural workers.

M. E. Lienard, manager of the Portland, Ore. Labor Temple and chairman of the Multnomah County Community Services Committee, was described by the publication as "one of the reasons" why organized labor in Portland understands and contributes more to the United Good Neighbors campaign than it did in the past.

Herman Groom, president of the Omaha Central Labor Union, "stands out among the many individuals who have helped build labor's broad community services program in Omaha," the article in "Community" stated. Groom is vice president of United Community Services and was chairman of the labor advisory committee to the recent United Red Feather-Red Cross campaign.

ABC-Morgan Essay Winners At Inaugural

Two college students—winners of an essay contest sponsored jointly by the ABC Radio Network and Edward P. Morgan, news commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO—won the opportunity to serve with the ABC news team covering the inauguration of Pres. John F. Kennedy.

National winners in the contest were Susan Higginbotham of Pittsburgh, Pa., a junior at Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Mass., and Andrew Barr of Ft. Worth, Tex., a sophomore at Arlington, Tex., State College.

Their essays were selected from more than 800 entries submitted by students in colleges and universities in all 50 states on the subject: "What do you want the U.S. to do at home and abroad in 1961?"

Prior to helping the ABC news staff cover the inauguration, the parade and the Inaugural Ball, the students met with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at federation headquarters in the nation's capital, lunched in the Senate dining room with members of their respective state delegations, and were guests of honor at a reception at the Broadcasters' Club in Washington.

NEW AFL-CIO TELEVISION SERIES dealing with major national and international issues will be produced by the National Educational Television and Radio Center, whose president, John F. White, is shown with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The half-hour program, titled "Briefing Session," will be seen on the NET network and other stations beginning next month.

AFL-CIO, NET Join In Public Affairs TV

on current affairs so urgently necessary during this critical period of world events," he added.

Meany expressed the AFL-CIO's conviction that "a joint undertaking of this kind is a public service in the best sense.

"We are convinced that 'Briefing Session' can contribute greatly to public understanding of the issues of the day, and stimulate interest in their solution."

Production costs of this series are being split by the two organizations. The series will be produced by Joel O'Brien Productions, Inc., of New York City under the supervision of NET.

Other Series Continue

Meany announced that the AFL-CIO's television series, "Americans at Work," would continue to be distributed to the more than 170 stations now carrying it as a public service, but that no new films would be made. There are 104 films in the series.

AFL-CIO Visited by 1,684 from Abroad

A total of 1,684 overseas visitors toured the AFL-CIO headquarters building in 1960 and asked questions reflecting their knowledge of current American events, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs has reported.

Visiting delegations hailed mostly from Asia, the Middle East, and Latin America. That reflects the change in emphasis of federal exchange programs from European countries to others more in need of U. S. assistance, according to Henry Rutz of the Intl. Affairs Dept. staff.

In 1960 there were 211 visitors from Europe, as against 406 the year before; 909 from Asia and the Middle East, compared with 717 in 1959. Latin American visitors increased from 353 in 1959 to 477 last year, and African visitors from 77 to 87.

Visitors are taken on a tour of the building, from the lobby mural to the Executive Council meeting room on the top floor, and then are given a briefing on the place of labor in American society, and union objectives.

Questions ranged from the steel strike, railroad work rules and the strike against General Electric in early 1960 to automation and the presidential elections later in the year.

Employer delegations usually reflect the briefing they have received a few days earlier from the U. S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

Rutz predicted that visitors from Africa and the Far East will continue to increase while those from Latin America will remain at about the same or higher levels. Many more African visitors are expected in the future he said.

The visiting groups consisted of 679 union leaders, 508 management representatives, 187 political leaders and government officials, 121 editors and educators, and 189 others.

Germany sent 70 visitors, almost half of whom were from the ranks of business; Greece 36, France 27, Italy 24, Sweden 15.

Japan had the largest representation from the East—607, of whom 212 were from unions and 327 from business. The next largest delegation was from India—202.

Steelworkers Fight $4.2 Million Suit Filed Under Quebec Anti-Strike Law

Quebec—Trial is scheduled to resume here shortly in a $4.2-million lawsuit brought by Gaspe Copper Co. against the Steelworkers as an outgrowth of a seven-month strike against Gaspe's Murdochville mine and smelter in 1957.

The company brought suit against the international, but not against USWA Local 4881 or any of its members, charging the union with responsibility for Gaspe's alleged loss of profits during the strike and for a three-month period after the dispute before the company resumed full production.

Gaspe originally claimed $5.2 million in damages, but scaled the figure down by $1 million on the basis of pre-trial admissions by the company's accountant.

In most Canadian provinces unions are exempt from suits of this kind, but special legislation in Quebec and British Columbia has left unions open to suit. Quebec law also bans strikes except by locals which have been certified by the provincial Labor Relations Board and which have passed through all stages of negotiation, conciliation, and arbitration.

When Gaspe opened its Murdochville mine in 1954 it signed a two-year agreement with a directly affiliated local union of the Trades & Labor Congress of Canada. Following merger of the TLC and the Canadian Congress of Labor, jurisdiction was transferred to the Steelworkers, which holds contracts with Gaspe's parent firm, Noranda.

Company Blocked Proceedings

USWA Local 4881 applied for certification June 6, 1956. The company demanded that the Labor Relations Board supply information on the union's records and membership and when the board, following its usual policy, refused to comply, Gaspe obtained a writ of prohibition stopping all board proceedings.

The board contested the prohibition, but it was not until Sept. 24, 1957 — more than a year later and over six months after the walkout began—that the courts quashed the prohibition.

The result of the delay was that steps taken by Local 4881 to become the legally certified bargaining agent were suspended from August 1956 to February 1958, at which time the board held the local had disqualified itself by the 1957 strike.

In the court suit the company has accused the international union of planning, organizing and declaring the strike. It charges that the local was a "creature of the international and entirely subject to its control." The damage claim is based on a contention that the company had been making a net profit of $210,000 a week prior to the walkout.

The USWA has contended in its defense that the company deliberately provoked the strike by discharging Local Pres. Theo. Gagne without just cause at a time when an "atmosphere of tension and exasperation" had been created by the company's tactics in delaying certification.

Denying that the international ordered the strike, the Steelworkers contended that the workers walked out by their own decision, adding that the local was an autonomous body which, under Quebec law, had applied for certification to act as bargaining agent.

Mrs. Beatty to Serve On Defense Dept. Unit

The appointment of Mrs. Marcella S. A. Beatty, special representative of the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries, to the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services has been announced by the Dept. of Defense.

Mrs. Beatty is one of 50 representative women who work with the department to help increase public acceptance of military service as a career field for women. Leaving the committee after three years of service is Mrs. William F. Schnitzler, wife of the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer.

Karson Named By ACWA to Education Post

New York—Marc Karson, college professor since 1949 and a writer and commentator on trade unionism, has been appointed by the Clothing Workers as director of the union's National Education Dept.

Karson, 41, took over his new duties Jan. 2. Connie Kopelov remains as associate director of the department.

The new director has been an associate professor of government at Southern Illinois University and assistant director of its labor institute. Before that he was an associate professor at Washburn University in Tokepa, Kans. Reactor Blast Study Ordered By Meany

Organized labor is "vitally concerned" with knowing the "true facts" surrounding the recent explosion of an atomic reactor which claimed the lives of three workmen at the National Reactor Testing Station in Arco, Idaho.

"The serious implications of the tragedy touch upon the whole field of safety in peaceful nuclear development," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in assigning Fred MacGowan, chairman of the radiation subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Staff Subcommittee on Atomic Energy & Natural Resources, to investigate and report on the accident.

Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the federation's Industrial Union Dept., in releasing a report of 40 reactor accidents in the past, warned that this study and the Arco disaster "cornfirm the validity" of union opposiiton to a fast-breeder reactor near Detroit, Mich.

"It is clear," Reuther said, "that said, "that thousands of people would have been over-exposed to radiation" if the Arco plant had been placed in a populated area.

Meany said MacGowan's report would be the basis for the federation's recommendations to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy for "needed statutory and regulatory corrections" in the atomic energy program.

In a letter to MacGowan, an international representative for the Boilermakers, the AFL-CIO president said labor's concern arises out of the fact that "thousands of our workers are involved in nuclear development and have a vital stake in its safety operations."

Meany said the Atomic Energy Commission "tacitly admits the seriousness of this accident," adding that "information we have obtained, while incomplete, raises many fundamental questions concerning not but the whole matter of safety procedures in the facility."

Tugmen Term Strike Key to Rules Issue

New York—Eleven major U.S. railroads have been accused by a union spokesman of planning to break a strike of harbor tugmen here as a prelude to reducing jobs on every railroad in the nation.

A victory for the railroads would be hailed by management as "proof" that it alone should have the right to decide the size of crews, said Vice Pres. Claude Simmons of the Seafarers in a statement issued for 660 striking members of the SIU, Marine Engineers and Masters, Mates & Pilots.

Simmons said management would cite such a victory as a precedent in support of its "featherbedding" claims before a Presidential Commission on Work Rules, headed by retiring Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell; a New York State legislative inquiry, and other study groups.

Three unions called a walkout on railroad tugs, barges and ferries in the port of New York after 13 months of futile negotiations. When the strike dragged on without a settlement, strikers picketed Grand Central Terminal and Pennsylvania Station and talked about extending picket lines.

The New York Central and New Haven railroads withdrew all commuter trains from service to Grand Central. Long-distance trains were halted at Albany or Buffalo when railroad unionists refused to cross the marine workers' picket lines. That cut off service for 100,000 commuters and 2,000 long-distance passengers.

Speaking for the unions, Simmons said he regretted that the strike had been made necessary "because a genuine desire for settlement" on the railroads' part "could have settled these issues 15 months ago" when the contracts ran out.

"The issue," he said, "is a simple one."

15-Month Effort

"We have been attempting for 15 months to negotiate a contract that would involve a wage increase, welfare plan patterned after existing plans on other tugs, and improved working conditions. We also sought to incorporate in the contract the manning scale which has been long in practice.

"The railroads have seen fit to make this a key issue, and are insisting they will not write the manning scale into the contracts unless we agree in writing that they have the right to arbitrarily abolish jobs at any time after a specified waiting period."

The unions have offered to write a contract provision that future technological changes may be referred to arbitration in the event of disputes, Simmons said.

Precedent Sought

"The reason the strike is not settled," he said, "is that the railroads are seeking to use this situation to establish a precedent, in the hope of employing the same tactics with railroad workers across the country.

"With the U.S. government presently conducting a survey of railroad work rules through the Mitchell Commission . . . the railroads feel they can strengthen their hand by having such a precedent established before these reports are issued.

"The issues can be settled tonight if the railroads would have no ulterior purpose in their bargaining."

NLRB Upholds Union:

Embattled Strikers Bolstered at Peyton

The embattled Meat Cutters picketing the Peyton Packing Co. in El Paso, Tex., for the past 22 months won what may be a breakthrough as the National Labor Relations Board unanimously found the company guilty of unfair labor practices.

The board action foreshadowed these developments:

- A second NLRB decision was imminent, involving Peyton's firing of a group of workers, allegedly on grounds of union activity.
- The Labor. Dept. disclosed that neither Peyton nor William Kilgore, its industrial relations consultant, had filed reports under the Landrum-Griffin Act and an inquiry was begun to determine if they are covered and in violation.
- The union will seek an order at a U.S. District Court hearing Jan. 23 to compel enforcement of an earlier ruling by Judge Luther W. Youngdahl which said Mexican aliens commuting across the border to work as strikebreakers must be barred.

The NLRB, adopting almost all the findings and recommendations in the report issued 16 months earlier by its trial examiner, ordered Peyton to offer reinstatement and pay lost earnings to Julio Hernandez; pay a December 1958 bonus to its employes and rescind a rule barring workers from union activity on non-working time.

Hernandez, fired Sept. 15, 1958, long has been a symbol of the Peyton battle. NLRB Trial Examiner Martin S. Bennett concluded in his report that "Hernandez was selected for discharge because of his known union sympathies and in order to coerce the other employes."

The Meat Cutters won the right to represent some 500 Peyton workers in a Sept. 25, 1958, election and were certified Oct. 3, 1958.

The trial examiner found that in pre-election propaganda the company used the semi-annual bonus tradition as an argument to keep out the union. It was withheld in December 1958, he found, "as punishment and retribution" against the workers for having voted union.

The bonus which Peyton now will have to pay will total an estimated $300,000, according to union sources. The board in addition ruled that Peyton hereafter must bargain collectively on bonuses if the union so requests.

Negotiations for a contract took place intermittently and finally broke down in early March 1959. The strike began Mar. 3, 1959, and Peyton has been picketed since that time in the face of the large-scale use of Mexican aliens who, the union charges, use El Paso addresses and commute from their homes in Juarez, Mexico.

Last July, Youngdahl ruled against a Justice Dept. motion to dismiss the union complaint on the use of commuting Mexican aliens.

Youngdahl lashed the department's Immigration & Naturalization Service for resorting to "an 'amiable fiction' to justify a wholesale evasion" of a ruling by then Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell. Mitchell had certified that alien strikebreakers "adversely affect" domestic wages and conditions. Immigration authorities regarded commuting aliens as new entrants each day.

The Office of Compliance & Enforcement in the new Bureau of Labor-Management Reports in the Labor Dept. reported it will ascertain whether Peyton and Kilgore should have filed reports under Landrum-Griffin.

They may be covered by L-G's Sec. 203 (b)(1), which is concerned with activities where an object, directly or indirectly, is "to persuade employes to exercise or not to exercise" their organizing and bargaining rights.

Airline Pilots Demand Strikebreaker Ouster

Southern Airways pilots have moved on three fronts to win back their jobs from strikebreakers hired seven months ago by a union-busting management.

At a Civil Aeronautics Board hearing in Washington, the Air Line Pilots argued that the company had forfeited its rights to an operating certificate through violations of the Railway Labor Act and by expenditure of unnecessary funds, including government subsidies, to operate with strikebreakers. The union presented 17 witnesses and 58 exhibits to substantiate its charges.

In Memphis, Tenn., the ALPA has sued in federal district court for an injunction directing Southern to reinstate its pilots with full seniority and to recover $1 million in lost wages and damages.

In the 52 cities served by Southern, picketing continues and passenger traffic reportedly has dropped to a new low. In December, the ALPA reported, Southern's loadings fell to 26 percent and 18 cities had so few passenger boardings that they have been notified by the CAB of a possible discontinuance of local air service.

Adding to the company's financial headaches is an involuntary bankruptcy action brought by a group of creditors.

The airline was struck June 5 after 10 months of fruitless negotiations over wages, rules and working conditions. A settlement recommended by the National Mediation Board was accepted by the union and agreed to by the company. But the company flatly refused to give its regular pilots their jobs back.

Strikebreakers hired, the union has charged, include persons with criminal records, and pilots dismissed for cause by several airlines including, in one case, by Southern itself in pre-strike days.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a letter to the CAB, has sharply denounced the use of government funds to finance "a strikebreaking and union destruction program." In 1959, 41 percent of the airline's gross revenue came from federal subsidy.

CWA Bargaining Policy Session Set for March

The executive board of the Communications Workers has set March 13, 14 and 15 for a meeting of the union's collective bargaining policy committee in New York City.

At a meeting in Washington board members said committeemen will prepare for 1961 reopeners of current CWA-Bell System agreements on wages and related items only.

The CWA board approved a recommendation to the next CWA convention that an airlines council be set up, with representatives of all CWA locals having airlines members, to set a bargaining policy consistent with existing CWA policy. It also authorized application for affiliation with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. on behalf of the 25,000 CWA members engaged in construction work.

Legislation Urged

In a resolution approved unanimously, board members urged Congress to bolster a "sagging economy" by passing legislation for a minimum wage of $1.25 a hour, with expanded coverage of workers now excluded by law; health care for older persons, financed through the social security system; aid to depressed areas, elimination of filibustering, overhauling the tax structure and establishing new government bureaus on automation and consumer problems.

In a resolution on the Henderson, N. C., strike in which eight Textile Workers were jailed for an alleged conspiracy, the board called for the release of these "unjustly imprisoned trade unionists."

It said: "We reaffirm our faith and belief in the innocence of these men, and pledge to pursue every available means to obtain their release and remedy the injustice which has been done to them."

The board voted to send full information on the Harriet and Henderson struggle to every CWA member to the end that they may "take action to assist in bringing about justice" for the strike leaders.

On the proposed memorial to former Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt in Washington, the board called for quick action, now that the design for the memorial has been approved. It said that "as a prime mover in the project, CWA wants to see the memorial completed in the foreseeable future" and millions of Americans given the opportunity to contribute financially to its completion "in their lifetime."

Meany Denounces Retrenchment Proposals:

'Gold Crisis' Seen Pretext To Slow Nation's Progress

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has accused "the enemies of progress in America" of using the current unfavorable balance of international payments, including the so-called "gold crisis," as a "pretext" for opposing social legislation and wage gains.

Meany's charge was contained in an editorial written for the upcoming issue of the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine, the American Federationist. It was accompanied by a report of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee, adopted by the recent meeting of the Executive Council.

Involved in the monetary problem is the fact that in the last three years the U.S. has spent or invested in other nations $11 billion more than they spent in this country. Of this amount, $5 billion has been taken away as gold and the balance is held by foreign investors in the form of short-term securities easily converted into gold.

The AFL-CIO president acknowledged that the balance of payments and withdrawal of U.S. gold posed a problem, but assailed those who have called for domestic retrenchment as a solution. Right-wing forces, he said, are using this issue to oppose a higher minimum wage and negotiated wage increases, as well as the whole range of social legislation from housing to health care for the aged.

"These spokesmen for reaction have built a false premise into a catastrophic solution," he said. "Their program would not only fail to achieve its stated objective, but would be a disaster for America."

The accompanying statement from the Economic Policy Committee declared that these "negative" proposals would "endanger the U.S. economy" in the same manner that "the false anti-inflation weapons . . . confused the complex price problems in the 1950s and helped cause the three recessions of the last seven years."

The EPC charged that "slogans have already distorted" the balance of payments issue "into a fear symbol" to oppose needed social legislation and wage increases in the name of "restoring confidence in the U.S. dollar."

"But confidence in the United States and its dollar depends on a strong, expanding economy, not on slick sloganized policies that have repeatedly led to recessions," the committee said.

Trade Not to Blame

Meany took particular exception to the charge that wages should be held down because Americans have "priced ourselves out of the market." He noted that in terms of trade alone, the U.S. sold $4.5 billion more goods abroad in 1960 than it imported.

"The trouble lies elsewhere than in foreign trade," he said.

The chief source of the difficulty, the AFL-CIO president maintained, is "our own domestic economy, drugged into lethargy by the same policies now urged to meet this new problem—policies then advanced in the name of 'fighting inflation,' but which produced only unemployment and recession."

The solution, Meany said, is a "healthy, growing economy in the U.S. that will attract investments from abroad and stimulate American capital as well. We cannot create such an economy by obliterating progress and perpetuating economic stagnation."

Meany directed the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research to study the balance of payments problem, in consultation with "recognized monetary authorities," and to propose the short-range, technical steps required to meet the situation. This report will be presented to the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting.

"Meanwhile," he wrote in the Federationist editorial, "we shall resist to the utmost any effort to use international finance as a cover for domestic reaction. No new solutions can be found by going backward. We must move ahead to fulfill the promise of the Sixties."

The EPC said a "growing domestic economy is indispensable" to solving the balance of payments problem since it would offer "the strongest possible inducement for foreign capital to retain and increase its investments in America, and for American capital to remain at home."

By contrast, it said, the right-wing proposals to limit economic growth in the name of a "sound dollar," would "extend the balance of payments 'crisis' into a genuine economic crisis for the nation."

Labor Salutes Murphy, New Bricklayers' Head

Boston—"The fullest support of the working men and women of this country" can be counted on to help Pres. John F. Kennedy "move America forward," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared here.

Schnitzler addressed a testimonial dinner honoring Bricklayers' Pres. John J. Murphy. Pres.-emeritus Harry C. Bates of the Bricklayers and Gov. John A. Volpe (R), recently sworn in as the Bay State's chief executive, led the list of notables.

Schnitzler drew a parallel of dedicated service between Kennedy and Murphy, who served his apprenticeship here in the local which sponsored the testimonial.

He said both agree on the priorities of legislative action: federal aid to depressed areas, housing and urban renewal, federal aid for school construction and teachers' salaries, a $1.25 federal minimum wage and expanded coverage, and health care for the aged under social security.

Labor has sought these objectives for years, Schnitzler said.

"For the first time in almost a decade," he added, "we are going to get cooperation instead of obstruction from the Administration. And once more our faith in fighting for a better America, even when our cause is unpopular, is restored."

Schnitzler paid tribute to Murphy's long service to organized labor and his sense of public service. He traced Murphy's career in the former AFL, where Murphy rose to the post of director of organization.

Murphy also served, he recalled, on the regional War Labor Board here, War Manpower Commission, Regional Wage Stabilization Board, Construction Industry Stabilization Board and other labor-management groups.

Murphy now enters "his broadest field of service" as head of the Bricklayers, Schnitzler said.

Ohio Labor Blasts Jobless 'Dole' Proposal

Columbus, O.—Ohio labor has urged the state legislature to extend the duration of unemployment compensation to 39 weeks and to make the additional 13 weeks of benefits immediately applicable to some 70,000 jobless workers who have already exhausted their 26 weeks of benefits.

The State AFL-CIO executive board, meeting here, sharply criticized a bill backed by the leadership of the Republican-controlled legislature which they described as a "cruel joke" on long-term unemployed and substitution of a "dole" for the insurance principle of unemployment compensation.

The GOP bill, introduced in the House by Rep. William W. Milligan (R), contains a so-called "trigger clause" which would extend benefits an additional 13 weeks whenever statewide unemployment reaches 6.5 percent of workers covered by the law. At present, 8.6 percent of covered workers are unemployed.

The extra 13 weeks of benefits, however, would be payable only to workers with dependents. Workers who have already exhausted their benefits would not receive the additional coverage.

Denouncing the injection of a "needs test" into the law, the state labor body declared it will fight to preserve the insurance principle and said labor is "unalterably opposed to current efforts in the legislature to convert the compensation system into a dole."

Refusal of Republican leaders to back passage of an unemployment compensation bill as emergency legislation to take effect immediately—an action requiring a two-thirds vote by the legislature—was deplored by labor as showing "lack of concern for a pressing human problem." Without the emergency clause, a law does not become effective until 90 days after it is signed by the governor.

Labor's proposals, in addition to permanently extending benefits to 39 weeks for all workers, would also cover those who exhausted their benefits during 1960 and who would not receive additional payments under the GOP proposal.

Rail Merger Called Threat To Northwest

Great Falls, Mont.—A rail union officer has charged that a proposed merger of four railroads serving the Northwest would seriously impair the growth of the region and destroy the jobs of more than 19,000 workers.

Vice Pres. M. W. Hampton of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen told a Farm-Labor Institute here that the planned merger of the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Burlington & Spokane, and Portland & Seattle railroads is "diametrically opposed to the public interest."

Describing the merger as "a classic example of monopolistic empire building," Hampton declared:

"The combined railroads would have a free ticket to serve only areas where high-profit bulk commodities predominate. Instead of competition-inspired expansion, the area would be affected with retrenchment of rail transportation services."

He warned that "to reduce or eliminate service over thousands of miles of railroad inevitably is to create depressed communities, disrupt established homes and ways of life and place obstacles in the way of industrial development."

Arnow to Direct Rail Study Staff

The Presidential Railroad Commission, set up to seek a solution to the work rules dispute between rail labor and management, has announced the appointment of Philip Arnow as executive director.

Arnow, a career government employe, is U.S. assistant commissioner of labor statistics and will be on leave from the Labor Dept. during his service with the presidential commission.

During World War II, Arnow served as wage stabilization director and vice chairman of the War Labor Board's Detroit regional board. During the 1959 steel strike, he was on the staff of the emergency fact-finding board established under the Taft-Hartley Act.

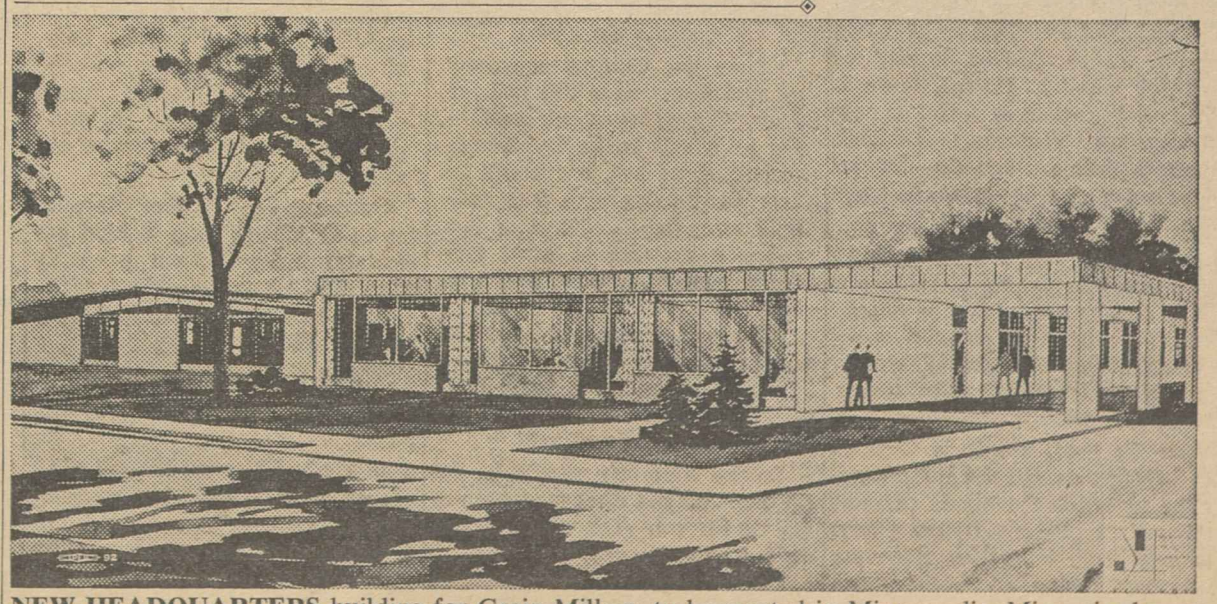
Grain Millers To Build New Headquarters

Minneapolis — Plans for construction of a $175,000 headquarters building to house the international offices of the Grain Millers here have been announced by the union.

The union, which currently operates out of rented offices here, has acquired a site for the 8,400-square-foot, one-story structure and ground-breaking is scheduled to begin shortly. The union expects completion of the new structure by June 1961.

Pres. Roy O. Wellborn and Sec.-Treas. Harold Schneider said the decision to build the union's own structure was made several years ago, but the plan was put into effect now because of the impending demolition of the present headquarters site as part of an urban redevelopment program.

The building will contain offices for the union's four top officers and will accommodate a staff of 10.



NEW HEADQUARTERS building for Grain Millers, to be erected in Minneapolis, Minn., is shown here in artist's sketch. The 8,400-square-foot, one-story structure will include offices for the union's four top officers and a staff of 10. Cost of building is estimated at $175,000.

Kennedy Calls U.S. to Fight for Survival

Names War, Tyranny As 'Common Enemies'

ter peace, proud of our ancient heritage—and unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today.

Bearing the Burden

"Let every nation know, whether it wish us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend or oppose any foe in order to assure the survival and success of liberty."

Kennedy's 1,300-word inaugural address was the climax to the solemn and traditional swearing-in ceremonies before the Capitol, where the oath of office was administered to Vice Pres. Lyndon Baines Johnson by veteran House Speaker Sam Rayburn, a fellow Texan; while Kennedy was sworn in by Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Heavy snow fell on the bunting-bedecked nation's capital on the eve of the inaugural, a day marked by a feverish round of activity which saw Kennedy confer for the second and last time at the White House with Dwight David Eisenhower, his predecessor, who at 70 was the oldest man ever to occupy the presidency.

A colorful panalopy, which included selections by the U.S. Marine Band, the invocation by Richard Cardinal Cushing, a prayer by Archbishop Iakovos and the reading of a special inaugural poem by Robert Frost, preceded the administration of the oath of office to Pres. Kennedy.

The ceremony, Kennedy declared, symbolized "an end as well as a beginning—renewal as well as change. For I have sworn before you and Almighty God the same solemn oath our forebears prescribed nearly a century and three quarters ago."

New Kind of World Seen

The world today, as contrasted with that in the days of the founding of the nation, Kennedy said, is "very different," for "man holds in his mortal hands the power to abolish all form of human poverty and to abolish all form of human life."

And yet, the President added, "the same revolutionary beliefs for which our forebears fought are still at issue around the globe—the belief that the rights of man come not from the generosity of the state but from the hand of God."

Americans, Kennedy said, "dare not forget today that we are the heirs of that first revolution." Then, on behalf of the nation, he issued this series of five pledges:

● "To those old allies whose cultural and spiritual origins we share, we pledge the loyalty of faithful friends. United, there is little we cannot do in a host of new cooperative ventures. Divided, there is little we can do—for we dare not meet a powerful challenge at odds and split asunder."

● To the new nations "whom we now welcome to the ranks of the free, we pledge our word that one form of colonial control shall not have passed merely to be replaced by a far more iron tyranny."

● "To those people in the huts and villages of half the globe struggling to break the bonds of mass misery, we pledge our best efforts to help them help themselves, for whatever period is required—not because the Communists are doing it, not because we seek their votes, but because it is right. If the free society cannot help the many who are poor, it can never save the few who are rich."

● To the nations of Latin America "we offer a special pledge—to convert our good words into good deeds—in a new alliance for progress—to assist free men and free governments in casting off the chains of poverty."

Coupled with this pledge was a blunt warning that the "peaceful revolution of hope" in Latin America "cannot become the prey of hostile powers." On behalf of the nation, Kennedy pledged to "oppose aggression or subversion anywhere in the Americas," and warned "every other power" that the Western Hemisphere "intends to remain the master of its own house."

● To the United Nations, "our last best hope in an age where the instruments of war have far outpaced the instruments of peace, we renew our pledge of support—to prevent its becoming merely a forum for invective—to strengthen its shield of the new and the weak."

In a clear reference to nations of the Soviet bloc, which he did not mention by name, Pres. Kennedy offered "not a pledge but a request: that both sides begin anew the quest for peace, before the dark powers of destruction unleashed by science engulf all humanity in planned or accidental self-destruction."

Two great and powerful groups of nations, the President said, cannot take comfort from their present course, when both sides are "overburdened by the cost of modern weapons, both rightly alarmed by the steady spread of the deadly atom, yet both racing to alter that uncertain balance of terror that stays the hand of mankind's final war."

He called on both sides to "begin anew" to explore the problems which unite them "instead of belaboring the problems that divide;" working to formulate "serious and precise" proposals for arms inspection and control; and joining to "explore the stars, conquer the deserts, eradicate disease, tap the ocean depths and encourage the arts and commerce."

'Success Rests with the People'

Kennedy addressed his closing remarks to the people of America, declaring in a paraphrase of language Abraham Lincoln used in his first inaugural address 100 years ago:

"In your hands, my fellow citizens, more than in mine, will rest the final success or failure of our course. Since this country was founded, each generation has been summoned to give testimony to its national loyalty. The graves of young Americans who answered that call encircle the globe.

"Now the trumpet summons us again—not as a call to bear arms, though arms we need—not as a call to battle, though embattled we are, but a call to bear the burden of a long twilight struggle . . . against the common enemies of man: tyranny, poverty, disease and war itself.

"Can we forge against these enemies a grand and global alliance . . . that can assure a more fruitful life for all mankind? Will you join in that historic effort?"

To the American people he declared: "Ask not what your country will do for you—ask what you can do for your country."

To the people of the world he said: "Ask not what America will do for you, but what together we can do for the freedom of man."

Cabinet Appointees Cleared by Senate Units

Kennedy's appointees with a maximum of sweetness and light. The formal nominations were scheduled to be sent to the Senate shortly after Kennedy was sworn in as chief executive Jan. 20 and the Senate was expected to vote confirmation on Jan. 21. (See sketches of new Cabinet members, Page 5.)

Robert S. McNamara, Kennedy's choice for Defense Secretary, ran into questions in the Senate Armed Services Committee that involved the trust fund arrangement he had executed for funds received from the sale of his Ford Motor Co. stock.

Questioned on Conflicts

McNamara, who had served briefly as Ford president, said he was sensitive to conflict-of-interest issues and pointed out that he had given up lucrative stock-option advantages in addition to selling his holdings after his selection for the Cabinet. He said he thought he had "gone farther" than any previous Defense Dept. nominee to meet the requirements of the conflict-of-interest statutes.

Under questioning, McNamara agreed to revise the trust fund to prevent acquisition by his financial managers of defense stocks and agreed that the trustees would notify the committee if the trust should be revoked.

Robert F. Kennedy sailed through the Judiciary Committee hearing with only a few references to what some Republicans have charged was his lack of experience in courtroom work and almost no trouble from southern Democrats on his proposed policies in enforcement of civil rights laws.

Questions in the Labor Committee to Goldberg, long a legal adviser to unions, came primarily from Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.).

Resigned from Law Firm

Goldberg made the following points:

● He had divested himself of all clients, resigned from his law firms and will not return to them. His divesting included voluntary abrogation of a deferred-income arrangement, in the nature of a pension, that would have brought him substantial sums beginning at age 60. He will not return to the practice of labor law.

● He has obviously not "brainwashed" himself and "departed from all the views and convictions" developed in 23 years of association with the labor movement, but he will give the Labor Dept. the most "objective leadership" and the President the most "objective advice" at his command.

● He will state his own long-held views and then "loyally support" the President's determination of the priorities to be given legislation.

● Subject to this reservation, he "personally" feels as he has in the past that the Denver building rule—prohibiting job site picketing by building trades unions—should be reversed. He declined to speculate on whether Kennedy, as sponsor of a 1960 Senate bill to repeal the rule, might renew this campaign, but suggested that Congress itself should be sensitive to "curtailment" of free-speech rights in any prohibition of peaceful picketing.

● On Sec. 14-B of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits the states to prohibit the union shop, he continues to favor federal law that allows labor and management to "establish the form of union security which is best suited to their needs."

Worker Protections Cited

Addressing himself specifically to the decline in jobs and reports that industry may still need to replace some $75 to $90 billion in worn-out machinery, Goldberg was emphatic in urging both greater modernization and also greater protection of displaced workers.

"It is imperative that we replace outmoded equipment," he said, to retain our industrial preeminence, afford jobs and meet competitive forces in the cold war.

We must nevertheless "devise programs so that human values are preserved" and build safeguards "against hardships that happen to individuals, to families, when automation takes place," Goldberg said.

"We cannot go through the hardships and the misery that accompanied the first industrial revolution," he said.

Management, labor and the government, too, must play a role in the retraining of workers in the changing labor force, Goldberg said.

Dinner Group Hails Goldberg In Chicago

Chicago—"I cannot be impartial about poverty and distress in our country and in many areas throughout the world," Labor Sec.-designate Arthur J. Goldberg declared here at a testimonial dinner sponsored by the Combined Jewish Appeal of Chicago.

Goldberg, being saluted on his selection for the Cabinet post, told the 1,500 guests that he had been asked "if I can be impartial in view of my background of service to labor," and recited a long list of areas— including mounting unemployment, denial of civil rights and the lag in America's prestige—in which "I cannot be impartial."

William L. McFetridge, AFL-CIO vice president and Executive Council member and president-emeritus of the Building Service Employes, was chairman of the dinner.

Steelworkers' Pres. David J. McDonald, one of the principal speakers, paid tribute to Goldberg's "imaginative help" in pioneering collective bargaining advances made by the USWA since its founding 25 years ago.

McDonald, also a vice president and member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, said Goldberg "helped implement the basic philosophy of organized labor which emphasizes that we are not an island unto ourselves; that we must heed the general welfare."

Union Leaders Renew Pledge To Kennedy

you have our complete cooperation, and what is probably more important, you have our prayers, too."

Meany quoted Kennedy as saying that the major problem facing America is to maintain U.S. standing in the free world. The AFL-CIO leader added that "basic to that" problem is the economic situation, adding that he was confident Kennedy's Administration would give the economic problem "its first attention."

"We told the President," he said, "that we are citizens first and trade unionists second."

The AFL-CIO president predicted that unemployment — which stood at 6.8 percent of the labor force in mid-December — would soar past the 7 percent mark by the time the January figure are made public.

Meany told the press conference that Goldberg had talked to the labor leaders about the problems he would face in his new post as Secretary of Labor. He said Goldberg cited in particular the Landrum-Griffin Act, adding that he intended to enforce the law "with common sense as long as it is on the books."

Jobless Rate Skyrockets, Two-Pronged Attack Set

Kennedy Steps into Rules Fight

By Gene Zack

Pres. John F. Kennedy has stepped into the raging House battle to end conservative control of the powerful Rules Committee, declaring that "a small group of men" should not be permitted to keep the majority of House members from voting on controversial measures.

In response to a question at his first press conference since taking office—a conference televised live for the first time in White House history to an audience of between 30 and 40 million viewers—Kennedy conceded that the progress of his legislative program hinges on the rules fight.

Kennedy's plea for liberalization of the committee came as the House postponed until Jan. 31 a showdown vote on breaking the coalition's quarter-century-old control by adding three new members to the committee.

The formula for ending the alliance between conservative Republicans and southern Democrats—who in the past have succeeded in blocking or watering down liberal economic measures—was put forward by veteran Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.).

Close Vote Seen

There were strong indications that the vote would be extremely close and that it could still go either way.

At his press conference Kennedy reiterated his earlier stand that he would not "infringe" on the right of the House to be "the judge of its own rules" and said that Rayburn "has been extremely anxious that the House be permitted to settle this matter in its own way."

But, the President said, "it is no secret" that he believes "strongly" that all of the House members should have an opportunity to vote on "programs which are put forward for the benefit of the country."

"This is a very difficult time in the life of our country," Pres. Kennedy said. "Many controversial measures will be presented," he went on, including housing, aid - to - education and farm legislation.

The President expressed the hope that the House would have a chance to exercise its will on these and other key measures and that "a small group of men will not attempt to prevent the members from finally letting their judgments be known."

Under existing rules a majority vote on the committee is needed to clear legislation for floor action. In the 86th Congress there was a constant pattern under which two conservative Democrats—Chairman

Kennedy, Goldberg Pledge Aid

By Willard Shelton

A double-barreled federal attack on the unemployment problem was promised by Pres. John F. Kennedy in his first news conference, with a program for "quick aid" to be included in his State of the Union message on Jan. 30.

The President said that additional proposals to protect the jobless and stimulate the economy would be made in a special message to follow closely.

Kennedy outlined this schedule in the wake of disclosure by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg that unemployment compensation claims for the first week of January had climbed to an all-time high, with 8.1 percent of the protected labor force filing for insurance benefits.

In a conference with Kennedy, Goldberg said, he had warned the President that the situation was "very grave."

Jobless Pay Studied

Goldberg also said that he favored speedy federal expansion of the jobless insurance program to help workers whose state benefits have been exhausted but that the Kennedy Administration had not yet decided on the nature of the assistance to be offered.

The President's promise of "quick federal aid" came during a 38-minute news conference in which he also moved directly into the bitterly-fought House Rules Committee contest with support of Speaker Sam Rayburn's drive to

Labor Asks Support Of Area Aid Bill

Organized labor has thrown its weight behind the area redevelopment bill sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and 43 other senators, and has urged prompt passage of this "long overdue" legislation.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, testifying before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, described the Douglas bill as "the kind of comprehensive attack on the cancer of area blight which the (Kennedy) Task Force on Distressed Areas has recommended" and said it should command bipartisan support.

Auto Workers' Pres. Walter P. Reuther, also testifying, praised the Douglas bill as "a first important step" toward realizing a "dynamic economy . . . in which our productive capacity will again be mobilized to the full."

The Douglas bill is similar to

N.Y. Tugmen End 14-Day Harbor Strike

By Gene Kelly

New York—Tugmen for 11 railroads ended a 14-day strike with a settlement giving them basically the economic benefits won last year by railroad workers and submitting the dispute on the size of tug crews to a presidential commission now studying rail work rules.

Agreement was reached two days after Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg entered the dispute at the invitation of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) and with the approval of Pres. John F. Kennedy. Goldberg met here with negotiators for unions and management and worked out the strike-settling formula with the aid of Rockefeller, Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) and the National Mediation Board.

The settlement gives 664 members of three harbor unions—the Seafarers, Marine Engineers, and Masters, Mates & Pilots—wage increases of 2 percent retroactive to last July 1; another 2 percent next Mar. 1; incorporation of living cost increases up to July 1, 1960, into the base rates; and improvements in vacation pay, holiday pay and other contract fringes.

It also provides payment of an additional 45 cents a day to tug engineers and mates to help close a wage differential between those groups in New York and Philadelphia ports. It sets up a bi-

President's First Executive Order Doubles Food Distribution to Needy

The Kennedy Administration has moved quickly to bolster the federal program of surplus food distribution to 3.5 million Americans, primarily those living in areas of chronic unemployment.

Less than 24 hours after taking office, Pres. John F. Kennedy in his first executive order directed the Agriculture Dept. to make available as soon as possible "a greater variety and quantity of food" for needy families.

The action, which a White House spokesman said would 'virtually double" the amount of food being distributed, was a fulfillment of a campaign promise to make improvement of the program a top priority item in the new Administration.

On the heels of the executive order, Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman announced that canned pork and gravy, dried pea beans and dried eggs would be added to the surplus food program. These would supplement the present diet of flour, corn meal, dried milk, rice and lard—a diet to which the preceding Administration had added butter in its final weeks in office.

'Taking Prompt Action'

"We are taking prompt action to carry out this first executive order of Pres. Kennedy to improve and supplement the diets of those receiving surplus foods under this program," Freeman declared.

"We are providing essential food for those who need it and at the same time assisting American farmers by action that will help to decrease our agricultural surplus."

The Agriculture Dept. said the broadening of the types of commodities being distributed would add a "significant amount" of protein to the diets of the 3.5 million persons in 42 states now receiving aid.

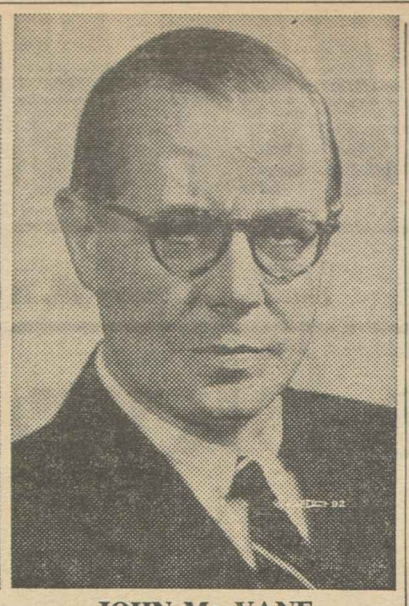
Meany, Cruikshank On CBS-TV Report

The skyrocketing cost of medical care and proposals to place health assistance for the aged under social security will be explored on the CBS television network Thursday, Feb. 2, in a special "CBS Reports" program on which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will appear.

Narrated by CBS News Correspondent Howard K. Smith, the filmed program will also include interviews with Nelson H. Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; former Rep. Aime J. Forand (D-R. I.), sponsor of last year's health care measure defeated by a right-wing coalition; former Gov. Herbert H. Lehman (D-N. Y.); and representatives of the American Medical Association, health care plans and hospital groups.

EDWARD P. MORGAN



JOHN MacVANE

Morgan, MacVane Take 'Briefing Session' Roles

Two of the nation's top news commentators, Edward P. Morgan and John MacVane, will be regular participants in the new public affairs television program, "Briefing Session," to be presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Radio and Television Center.

Morgan will be host for the series of half-hour programs, and will act as moderator of the panel discussion. MacVane will be briefing officer, presenting the introductory material that sets the stage for the subject at issue.

Morgan's nightly news broadcast over the ABC radio network has been sponsored by the AFL-CIO, and previously by the former AFL, since 1955.

Morgan began his newspaper career in Seattle in 1932, and for the next 15 years was primarily a reporter, editor and foreign correspondent. He began giving full time to radio and TV in 1951; by 1955, when he joined ABC, he was director of news for the CBS network.

Morgan received radio's highest honor, the George Foster Peabody award in 1957. He was given a citation by the National Education Association in 1959, and the School Bell Award in the same year, for his contributions to education. He was recipient of the Sidney Hillman award in 1960.

MacVane also began as a reporter, in his case with the Brooklyn Eagle and New York Sun. He was a foreign correspondent when France fell to the Nazis, and entered radio work as chief combat correspondent for NBC with the allied forces in Europe. He established NBC's United Nations bureau in 1946, and has conducted regular news shows for the UN since then. He is also seen and heard frequently over ABC and the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

Production of the first "Briefing Session" program will start immediately. The initial schedule of broadcast times and stations will be published shortly in the AFL-CIO News.

Meat Cutters Challenge NLRB Peyton Ruling

The Meat Cutters Union has asked the U.S. Court of Appeals to reverse a second National Labor Relations Board decision in the Peyton Packing Co. strike, charging that the ruling "resulted from internal warfare between board members" and NLRB General Counsel Stuart Rothman.

The NLRB, while holding the El Paso employer guilty of a series of unfair labor practices, ruled that these practices neither caused nor prolonged the strike which began 22 months ago.

A few days earlier, the board found Peyton guilty of illegally firing a worker because of union activity and of illegally withholding a bonus estimated by the union at about $300,000.

The board, in the second decision, held that its "general counsel proceeded improperly" in twice litigating the bonus withholding and twice litigating the cause of the strike. The board ordered the company to stop illegal practices and to bargain in good faith even as it reversed the finding of Trial Examiner William E. Spencer that these acts caused the strike.

"This is a fantastic procedure," charged Meat Cutters' Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman. "It stems from the continuing intramural warfare between the board members and the general counsel."

The union leaders pointed out that failure to designate the strike as an "unfair labor practice strike" may be crucial to the rights of some 200 strikers.

Lloyd and Gorman promised to fight the latest NLRB decision through the courts "until justice is done."

In a parallel move, the Meat Cutters pressed a suit in U.S. District Court in Washington, D. C., to compel the U.S. Immigration Service to carry out a court finding against the Peyton Co.'s use of alien strikebreakers.

Former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell last summer issued a certification which said Peyton's use of Mexican workers who cross the border daily to work in the strike-bound plant undermined American wages and working conditions. U.S. District Judge Luther Youngdahl later issued a finding that the Justice Dept.'s immigration authorities were evading the Mitchell ruling.

Mural Available In New Ashtrays

A reproduction of the famed AFL-CIO building lobby mural in the form of a 7-by-9-inch glass ashtray is now available.

The ashtray is available at $2 each and can be ordered from the AFL-CIO Purchasing Dept., 815 16th Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C. Checks should be made payable to William F. Schnitzler, secretary-treasurer.

Also available from the Purchasing Dept. are oval, rhodium-finished cuff links with a gold-plated, three-color enameled AFL-CIO emblem. The links are available at $3.25 a set.

At Los Angeles Conference:

New Bargaining Goals Urged To Meet Age of Automation

Los Angeles—This nation faces the worst unemployment crisis in its history unless it learns to understand and control automation, the presidents of two unions warned 350 California union representatives here at a Conference on Automation.

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers said the U.S. labor movement is, with a few "brilliant" exceptions, guilty of "pure, old-fashioned ignorance" on the subject of automation and its "revolutionary impact on our society."

Beirne challenged his listeners to understand that automation is a "dazzling new force" that can change the human race and the world. He told them society has to make a choice of "challenge or catastrophe."

Pres. Ralph Helstein of the Packinghouse Workers advised delegates to study the problem of a "guaranteed income" instead of following present-day ideas about X dollars for Y hours of work.

"We have a little time to avoid chaos" from the effects of automation, said Helstein. "A little longer may be too late." Both speakers called for action now in the fields of collective bargaining and legislation.

The weekend conference, sponsored by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO, brought together experts from federal and state governments, universities and colleges, and AFL-CIO unions.

15 Percent of Jobs Lost

The CWA president said studies have shown that, in a typical plant, the coming of automation cuts the number of jobs by 15 percent.

"What we have at stake," Beirne said, "is the whole concept of work in America. For automation is far more than mere technological advancement.

"It alters both the size and composition of the work force. In the crafts, it can create havoc. Its effects reach deep into the service trades. It shakes up the status quo—more white collars, fewer blue collars. It can wipe out most first-step and step-and-a-half management jobs, thus killing aspirations many workers still hold to climb to the top."

Beirne listed these labor goals for automation in the area of labor-management contracts:

- Cushioning improvements—shorter workweek, longer vacations, earlier retirement with full rights;
- Transfer rights, with costs paid by larger companies as an operating expense;
- Retraining to provide new in-company opportunities for workers with obsolete skills;
- Advance notice of changes planned by management;
- Vocational guidance and placement offices for those who must be terminated.

In the field of legislation, he said labor wants a federal bureau or commission on automation; a strengthened public employment service; redevelopment of areas hard hit by technological dislocation; federal aid for workers forced to leave distressed areas; vocational training; early retirement under social security for workers permanently unemployable due to age; a higher minimum wage; unemployment insurance for those seeking work but technologically unemployed.

After viewing a 90-minute film on "Automation, Woe or Weal," produced by Edward Murrow and the Columbia Broadcasting System, delegates heard Helstein on the collective bargaining and social implications of automation.

Ted Silvey of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research spoke on three phases of automation.

The conference was a key goal for almost a year of the county's labor federation and its 800,000 members in this area, where automation has made heavy inroads into the aircraft, missile and electronics industries.

Planning was done by a 30-member subcommittee, Vice Pres. Leonard Levy's education committee, and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and Dept. of Research. Heads of subcommittees and panels included Peter J. Remmel, Photo Engravers; Ruth Miller, Clothing Workers; Glenn Buell, Printing Specialties Joint Council; Aileen Hernandez, Ladies' Garment Workers; Jack Maurer, Retail Clerks; Justin McCarthy, Newspaper Guild; William Pollard, Dining Car Employes; George Smith, Bookbinders; William Stutts, Chemical Workers; and Hank Zivetz, Teachers.

Labor Dept. to Probe Settlement with Cross

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has ordered an investigation into reported arrangements under which James G. Cross has agreed to resign as president of the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

The union's executive board announced agreement had been reached with Cross on his resignation but added that "complete details of the settlement agreement must await court approval."

It was reported that the terms included dismissal of a pending court suit brought by union members charging that Cross had "systematically plundered" the union's treasury. The agreement was also said to call for payment of a quarter of a million dollars to Cross to "liquidate" his pension rights.

The second constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO, held in Atlantic City in December 1957, voted to expel the B&C from the united labor movement on the grounds that it was under corrupt domination. The convention also authorized the chartering of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers to replace the expelled union.

In announcing the probe of the resignation plan, the Labor Dept. said Goldberg had directed the Bureau of Labor-Management reports "to determine if the Landrum-Griffin Act or any other law administered by the Labor Dept. is being violated."

The suit pending in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C. charges, among other things, that over $100,000 in B&C funds has been used to pay various legal costs in defending Cross and that union money was used to buy and maintain his Palm Beach, Fla., home.

The suit also charged that various personal expenses for Cross and his wife—including food, automobiles and entertainment—were paid for out of the expelled union's funds.

AUTOMATION was the discussion topic that drew these four labor officials to a three-day conference sponsored by the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO. Left to right are Conference Chairman Peter Remmel of Local 32, Photo Engravers; Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, Communications Workers; Exec. Sec. W. J. Bassett, Los Angeles County AFL-CIO; and George O'Brien of Local 11, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, vice president of the central body.

TWUA Proposes Amendments:

NLRB Accused of Making T-H Worse

The Textile Workers Union of America, accusing the National Labor Relations Board of undermining the unionizing efforts of southern mill workers, has assailed the board's administration of the Taft-Hartley Act and called for specific amendments.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock at a press conference released a 77-page report of the union's 14-year experience under Taft-Hartley and a supplementary documentation of specific cases.

Pollock and TWUA Sec.-Treas. John Chupka charged the NLRB has "deprived hundreds of thousands of American textile workers of their right to organize, unless they are willing to risk all-out economic reprisals and even physical punishment."

The TWUA report accuses southern employers of resorting to "espionage, race hate, denial of freedom of association, intimidation through pressure by workers' creditors, discharge of union sympathizers, violence and gunplay, mill closings, mobilization of entire communities for anti-union activity, denial of free speech and assembly to union members in the South, the stalling of legal procedures and the refusal to bargain even where the union has surmounted all of these obstacles and won an election."

These tactics, Pollock said, were encouraged by the climate of Taft-Hartley and the board's "distorted" administration.

TWUA called for these T-H amendments:

- Repeal of Section 14 b which permits states to go beyond T-H in enacting laws restricting union security. The Democratic platform calls for repeal.
- Revocation of employer immunity which permits management "to coerce and intimidate" employes under the guise of "free speech."
- A change in the rule of "agency" so an employer can be held responsible for the conduct of those acting in his behalf.
- Restoration of pre-hearing elections to speed cases.
- Adequate penalties against employers who "persistently and deliberately" commit unfair labor practices.

Pollock stressed there was no lack of organizing efforts by TWUA—he said the union spent $1 million a year on organizing—and no lack of desire by southern workers for union support.

The union low point in its southern organizing was hit in 1959, according to its documentation, when it entered nine NLRB elections involving 4,702 workers. TWUA won just one election involving seven workers.

Won 2 of 9 Elections

In 1960, TWUA entered nine elections involving 4,396 workers. It won two elections involving 131 workers.

Overall, TWUA won 58 percent of 260 southern elections in the five-year period preceding Taft-Hartley. In the 1947-60 period after Taft-Hartley, TWUA won 33 percent of 255 elections.

Pollock, asked to comment on the trend, said TWUA had 450,000 workers under its contracts in 1947 and today has about 225,000. For the South, there were some 120,000 under TWUA pacts then and about 60,000 today.

The textile industry has declined from 1,250,000 workers to about 880,000 now, he said, with the South's proportion of the industry rising from 50 percent in 1947 to 60 percent today.

CSA Shuns Issue Of Cancer Drug

New York—Local staff members of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities have been advised not to become involved in the current controversy over the so-called cancer drug Krebiozen.

In letters to local community service representatives, CSA Dir. Leo Perlis declared that at the time the drug was first announced he requested the American Cancer Society and the National Cancer Institute to "test it under impartial, qualified, professional controls."

Perlis said the question is "largely a matter for professional consideration," and said that the best role for the trade union movement to follow would be to continue to press for "professional consideration" of the drug.

78TH ANNIVERSARY of Civil Service Act was marked by Government Employes union with a banquet in Washington, D. C., attended by nearly 1,000 members. More than a score of other AFGE civil service anniversary observances were held at centers of federal employment throughout the nation. Pres. Kennedy, in a message, praised the union's "notable" record in strengthening the merit system.

Government Employes Pledge Full Support to New Administration

Career civil service employes, through their union, have pledged "full support" to the new Administration and, in return, received a ringing endorsement from Pres. John F. Kennedy.

In a message to the annual Civil Service banquet of the Government Employes, Kennedy praised the AFL-CIO union for the "notable part" it has played in strengthening the civil service merit system and added: "I look forward to working with your members as I take on my new responsibilities."

House Majority Leader John W. McCormack (D-Mass.), principal speaker at the banquet marking the 78th anniversary of the Civil Service Act, told the AFGE members that Kennedy's message was the first sent to any organization by the new President. The banquet was held the day after the inauguration.

AFGE Pres. James A. Campbell announced that the 75,000-member union will launch this year a massive nationwide organizing drive, preceded by a pilot operation in the Washington, D. C., area to be conducted in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

The union, which has more than 50 local lodges in the Washington area where some 10 percent of all federal employes work, will link its organizing campaign to the drive by government and postal employe unions for passage of a union recognition law establishing standard grievance procedures and a form of collective bargaining for the 2 million federal workers.

McCormack, who told the gathering that he was proud to "plead guilty" to having "conspired" with the AFGE and other unions to move the last government pay raise bill through Congress, said he favored extension of the merit system to cover promotions within the government service as well as initial appointments.

Hailing the advent of the new Administration, McCormack said he hoped that any Republican opposition to Kennedy legislative proposals would always be expressed in terms of issues "and never in the form of personal attacks on the President of the United States."

The AFGE presented its annual outstanding achievement awards at the banquet to Navy Capt. Edward A. Anderson, senior medical officer at the Quonset Point, R. I., Naval Air Station, and Gordon Pehrson, a career employe who played a key role in the successful development of the Polaris missile.

Anderson, on assignment from the Intl. Cooperation Agency, has fought epidemics in the U.S., Africa, Asia and South America through the use of a hypospray jet injector, a multi-dose immunization gun capable of giving up to 1,200 inoculations an hour.

Pehrson, a Navy Dept. employe in Washington, was described by Edward R. Murrow in a television report on "The Year of the Polaris" as the "one man responsible for getting together all these incredibly complicated pieces of machinery . . . to see to it that they all arrived at the right place at the right time, and that they fit together properly."

Master of ceremonies at the banquet was Ewan Clague, commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics and a much-honored career official. Guests included John W. Macy, appointed by Kennedy as chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, and a number of congressmen and senators.

Murnane Appointed New Editor of Work

Chicago—Timothy A. Murnane, reporter-columnist for the Catholic Universe-Bulletin, Cleveland church weekly, has been named editor of Work, newspaper of the Catholic Council on Working Life. He replaces Robert Senser, who has become CCWL executive director succeeding Edward Marciniak, former Newspaper Guild vice president and new executive director of the city's Commission on Human Relations.

Murnane was a Cleveland Newspaper Guild vice president and chairman of the Catholic Universe-Bulletin unit. He and Mrs. Murname, who have five children, took up residence here in December.

COPE Sets Sights on State, City Elections

The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education has alerted its branches for action in the 1961 state, county and municipal elections.

The 1961 voting is vital, COPE Dir. James L. McDevitt notified affiliates, because:

- It involves solution of local problems.
- It provides opportunities to broaden labor's political education program.
- It readies the ground for the 1962 national elections.

McDevitt also called the attention of state, county and city COPE organizations to the opportunity of enlisting the support of more housewives and women trade union members and generally increasing labor's political effectiveness.

A COPE listing of 1961 elections shows there will be municipal contests, ranging from water board members to mayors, in some 700 cities of 10,000 or more population in 45 states.

State and county elections will take place in Illinois, Kentucky, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Wisconsin. Virginians, for example, will be electing a governor, lieutenant governor, attorney general and the 100-member House of Delegates.

COPE also announced that its 1961 fund-raising campaign—with a goal of a $1 voluntary contribution from each union member—"is now under a full head of steam."

Focusing special attention on the South, the committee noted that nearly all political contests in the South are decided not by the November general elections but by Democratic Party primary elections held from late winter and early spring through the summer.

Whoever wins a southern primary usually is assured of election, COPE added in urging advance preparation.

Day Meets With Chiefs of Postal Unions

AFL-CIO postal employes, after an embattled eight years under former Postmaster General Arthur Summerfield, have hailed the "open door" policy in regard to unions of postal workers announced by J. Edward Day, new head of the Post Office Dept.

Day signalled his policy with action as well as words. Between the time of his designation for the post by Pres. John F. Kennedy and his confirmation by the Senate, Day met with officers of the Letter Carriers, the Post Office Clerks and the Postal Transport Association.

With him at most of the meetings were three top aides, Deputy Postmaster General H. W. Brawley, Assistant Postmaster General Fred Belen, and Administrative Assistant Michael Monroney. Brawley, as former staff director of the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee, and Belen, formerly counsel to the House committee, have worked closely with the postal unions.

More for the Needy

INDICATIVE OF the tone and approach of the Kennedy Administration to the chronic problems of the American economy is the President's first executive order increasing and broadening the allotment of surplus food to help feed the victims of unemployment.

The AFL-CIO has repeatedly called for an expanded surplus food program to prevent malnutrition and hunger, but the budget-oriented previous Administration did not respond.

Providing additional surplus foods for the unemployed is a simple, humanitarian step to erase the spectre of hunger in our "affluent society." Until broad programs designed to wipe out the pockets of poverty and joblessness are enacted, the government has an obligation to prevent suffering and near-starvation.

The President's first executive order discloses a concern for the problems of Americans unable through no fault of their own to provide for their families. The next step is to restore their dignity and self-respect by shaping a program to put America back to work.

No Conflict

AT THE SENATE LABOR COMMITTEE hearing on his nomination to be Secretary of Labor in the Kennedy Administration, Arthur J. Goldberg replied to a question from Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.) on a possible conflict of interest because of Goldberg's long association with the labor movement.

Goldberg told the committee that "in all candor" it is difficult to say "that at the moment I have brainwashed myself and have departed from all of the views and convictions which I had throughout the years. It would not be honest if I said that to you."

It is this honesty and forthrightness that have contributed to Goldberg's successful role in the American labor movement, that have gained him the respect and admiration of management representatives and of leading public figures, the press and the courts.

He brings to his new post the tradition of American labor—that union members are citizens first and trade unionists second, that the public interest always comes first. In this tradition there can be no conflict of interest.

Congratulations, Mr. Secretary.

The Common Enemies

THE THEME of the new leadership that Pres. Kennedy has brought to the White House is perhaps best set out in the passage in his moving and eloquent inaugural address in which he declared:

"Let the word go forth from this time and place, to friend and foe alike, that the torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans—born in this century, tempered by war, disciplined by a hard and bitter peace, proud of our ancient heritage—and unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today."

This new rendezvous with destiny which Pres. Kennedy eagerly anticipates is the basic theme to reawaken America to the unending struggle against "tyranny, poverty, disease and war itself."

In this struggle the American labor movement will as always be in the vanguard and it pledges anew its determination to join in the struggle to secure for all men bread, peace and freedom.

Making Use of the Surplus

Wisconsin Governor Addresses Chamber:

Nelson Blasts Business Lobby As 'Shockingly Short-Sighted'

(The following is excerpted from an address by Wisconsin Gov. Gaylord Nelson to the Pre-Legislative Conference of the Wisconsin State Chamber of Commerce at Madison.)

SINCE YOUR ORGANIZATION professes to speak for business in Wisconsin, it seemed worthwhile to re-examine your patterns of thought about government, and to find out what you can mean when you speak of the so-called "business interest" in government.

Therefore I read carefully your "Governmental Affairs Bulletin" for the period of the last two years.

What I found out from this reading of your bulletins was that the "business interest" in government, as conceived and expressed by your organization, is a shockingly short-sighted, selfish and narrow interest.

I found that your idea of the "business interest" meant all-out opposition to any kind of public regulation of any kind of business, opposition to almost any kind of tax program, and opposition to almost any kind of public "spending," however desirable the goal or urgent the need.

Although it wasn't an issue on the state level, I discovered that you are still at war with the concept of social security, that you are committed to a last gasp determination to hold this humane and universally acclaimed program to a "minimum level." I think this indicates how far out of step with the public and the needs of our times your organization has become.

I found, in your bulletins, an astonishing lack of attention to and concern for the urgent problems facing the state—the problems of educating our children, caring for the mentally ill and the elderly, building highways, conserving our natural resources, and other challenges that confront us.

These are the urgent and necessary needs that require the "spending" that you condemn so indiscriminately.

Is it possible that you consider it unnecessary for the state to provide adequate education facilities, good teachers, safe highways, welfare institutions and recreational facilities for our people?

Do you really believe that it is good business to neglect and ignore these needs?

I for one can't accept that viewpoint. I don't really believe you do either. I am convinced that as individuals you must be concerned about these matters in your roles as parents, as travelers over our highways, as hunters and fishermen, and most important of all, as good citizens.

I do not think that the businessmen of Wisconsin are as narrowminded as your bulletins would make you appear. I know hundreds of businessmen personally whose interests are broader and deeper than the professed interests of your organization.

YOU WILL NOT LIKE my saying this, but it is something that needs saying. As I read the bulletins of the Wisconsin Chamber of Commerce I could not help but contrast this expression of your official views with the expressed views of labor unions.

Labor organizations have shown keen and affirmative interest in a much wider range of legislation. They are concerned with such issues as education, civil rights, welfare and world peace, as well as what they call the "bread and butter" issues of higher wages and better working conditions.

But what you do by confining your legislative interest solely to money and the pursuit of profit is to make your efforts ineffective. Not even the Republicans whom you support for public office take you very seriously.

I note that the Republican state chairman urged you, as businessmen, to get involved in politics. I join him in that plea to you, but I urge you to become involved to the point that you take something more than a negative attitude toward the creative functions of government.

Government is much more than a necessary evil. Government is the instrument by which the will of the people is advanced. There is sound and solid reason for almost everything that is done by your government, and that reason ranges far beyond a politician's whim to spend your money. It is the well-being of the people of the state in which you do business with which we are concerned.

Businessmen can contribute much to politics and government. You can exercise a great deal of influence. You can even influence Democrats, believe it or not. But you aren't doing it now and you won't do it in the future unless you broaden your horizons and deepen your concerns.

I have spoken to you tonight in all seriousness, without pulling any punches. I ask you to respond in that same spirit by thinking over what I have said, whether you agree or not.

If, in fact, you are expanding your horizon, there is much we can do together. For I believe deeply that what is good for the people of Wisconsin is good for business in Wisconsin.

Morgan Says:

Official Washington Is Jumping With Kennedy Setting the Pace

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THE KENNEDYS are still opening doors and peering into closets in their new home. The first lady is already consulting with a New York expert in interior design, Helen Parish, on new colors and curtains and other changes in the living quarters of the White House. And she is going to discuss with Director John Walker of the National Gallery and Artist William Walton the possibility of borrowing some pictures from various museums to hang on the walls at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue to augment or temporarily replace the standard works already there.

Morgan

Taxpayers of conservative tastes need not write their congressmen in outrage yet, however, over the prospect of finding a Salvador Dali next to the portrait of Martha Washington in the East Room or an Alexander Calder mobile dangling from the ceiling. For the word is that Mrs. Kennedy doesn't propose to change the paintings and sculpture in the public rooms of the White House. It is doubtful that she could anyway without the permission of the Fine Arts Commisson.

But other changes of habit, of manner, of approach are bursting all over the place, like popcorn over hot coals.

The day after the inauguration a young man bolted through the lobby off the White House press room and out into the snow without hat or overcoat to meet a limousine coming up the drive. It was Mr. Kennedy himself out to welcome a prior occupant of his home, Harry S. Truman. That Sunday before church the new President went back to his Georgetown house on an errand and then, unannounced, made a call on an astonished neighbor down the street.

While two or three reporters were lounging in the White House press room enjoying a fleeting respite from an exhausting inaugural schedule, who should show up on an inspection tour of the premises but President and Mrs. John F. Kennedy, both looking outrageously refreshed and fit.

In a time of transition like this, small things often assume large proportions. One of the most vital questions raised at News Secretary Pierre Salinger's post-inaugural briefing was whether Mr. Kennedy did or did not have his hand resting on the family Bible while Chief Justice Warren was administering the oath, that frigid Friday. Salinger was sure he did but no news picture had been found to show his left hand anywhere but at his side. Queried, the President recalled he had placed his hand on the Bible at the beginning, conceded it might have slipped when he was concentrating on the oath which he emphasized was the important thing.

Before change swirls us too far away from the event, this particular layman would raise a respectful prayer that supplications to the Almighty during official ceremonies could be shortened slightly without damaging their sincerity or their heavenly impact. It took the four eminent clergymen a combined total of 22 minutes to render their prayers at the inauguration, eight minutes more than it required President Kennedy to deliver his entire 1,300-word inaugural address. In these days of instantaneous communication it would seem to me presumptuous, even irreverent, to assume that the Supreme Being would need more time than an IBM machine to absorb the needs and merits and weaknesses of His children.

IF THERE WAS some ponderousness in the program, however, it would appear that the Kennedy Administration itself has got off to a running start, its movements swift and purposeful.

With a recession threatening or here, depending on which economist you follow, there was more than timeliness in the President's executive order number one to double the rations and improve the quality of surplus federal food now going to the nation's needy.

Obviously Secretary of Labor Arthur Goldberg won't have time to intervene personally in every strike but his settlement of the tugboat walkout in New York may be taken as symbolic of the Administration's intention not to sit by until labor-management disputes deteriorate into paralyzing deadlock.

Some critics may complain there is a danger of paternalism in these first acts of the Kennedy Administration. Admittedly, the country won't "get moving again" if it is conditioned to look to Washington for everything. But if the capital is pointedly busy, some of the effort, hopefully, may be contagious.

At the moment the joint is jumping. Symptomatically, two important sub-cabinet officers were called away from a diplomatic luncheon to attend departmental meetings. When a reporter for a morning newspaper complained that 5 p.m. briefings might be too late for his first edition, Pierre Salinger replied that the President would be staying around the office longer than his predecessor.

Whether the pace and the purpose can be sustained remains to be seen but nobody doubts that Washington has already undergone a change.

Washington Reports:

McCormack Warns of Perils, GOP's Halleck Scoffs 'Baloney'

PRES. JOHN F. KENNEDY is "inheriting the worst situation from an international angle that has faced our country in its entire constitutional history," Rep. John W. McCormack (D-Mass.), House majority leader, asserted in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

On the other hand Rep. Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.), minority leader, declared on the same program that, "We had eight pretty good years under Pres. Eisenhower. We got the war stopped in Korea and we haven't been in any new wars."

McCormack, replying to the claim that the Eisenhower Administration maintained peace, said: "I don't know what they mean by peace. That's a strange way of interpreting that word.

"We see what's going on in Laos, in the Congo, in Cuba. We see the West Berlin situation temporarily calm, but with the heat likely to be put on there again any time. We have constant threats from Red China and the Soviet Union. We see the great progress made by international communism in the last eight years."

The majority leader expressed confidence in the way Kennedy would meet the international challenge.

Halleck said he expected the Democrats to determine the program for congressional action. He expected bills on depressed areas, social security health care for the aged, minimum wages, housing, civil rights and "oh, a lot of other things."

HALLECK SAID there is "no quid pro quo" between the House Republicans and the southern Democrats. "We Republicans have a line of action that we think is good," he asserted, "and if some Democrats have good sense enough to join us, we are glad to have them."

Asked about unemployment, Halleck remarked that unemployment was much worse when he came to Congress in 1935. He added: "All this attempt to make it appear Pres. Eisenhower has left office with the country in some sort of a big depression is a lot of baloney."

McCormack said: "Everybody knows we have an unusually large amount of unemployment and that we have a recession that is pretty well advanced."

Immediate means of aiding the situation, he said, would be action on depressed areas, school construction, housing, minimum wages, acceleration of the interstate highway program, and reduction of interest rates.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IN HIS FIRST news conference, Pres. Kennedy revealed that he had brought to the White House a concept of presidential responsibility vastly broader than that of former Pres. Eisenhower.

It is easy to remember from eight years ago Mr. Eisenhower's repeated refusals to comment on pending legislative matters. He said that constitutionally there was a separation of powers between the executive and Congress, and he would not interfere with a "coordinate" branch of the government.

Sitting in the news conference, one often wondered when the President would begin to recognize that he, too, represented a "coordinate" branch that had its own powers and responsibility.

MR. KENNEDY plunged directly into the bitter battle in the House over reconstruction of the all-powerful Rules Committee. He did it with carefully chosen words, acknowledging the constitutional right of each branch of Congress to determine its own rules. But he clearly threw his prestige behind Speaker Sam Rayburn's drive for enlargement of the Rules unit so that actual control will be vested again in the official Democratic leadership—not in the Republican-Dixiecrat conservative coalition.

The President has served in both the House and Senate, and he knows that executive intervention in their organizational affairs involves a certain risk. He also knows that a President who intends to use his constitutional powers effectively has the right to take those risks.

Franklin D. Roosevelt intervened directly in a Senate leadership fight when the late Sen. Alben Barkley (Ky.) and Sen. Pat Harrison (Miss.) were rival contenders for the post of Democratic floor commander.

Conservative forces rallied behind Harrison, and the President was belabored by all New Deal enemies for an unseemly intrusion in the Senate's private affairs. This was merely a tactical argument, and the only real issue was who had the votes.

Roosevelt had the votes—by a margin of exactly one in the Democratic caucus—and Barkley became the leader. There is no doubt that without the powerful White House intervention, Harrison would have won, and the New Deal could have been at the mercy of an official Senate leader out of sympathy with many of its proposals.

MR. KENNEDY moved in a comparable situation very early in his Administration, and the effect of a possible defeat would obviously be serious. It is also obvious that he felt compelled to move.

The House battle between the Rayburn-led Administration forces and the conservative coalition hitherto controlled by Republican Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) and Rules unit Chairman Howard W. Smith (Va.) is extremely close.

The Rules Committee is the instrument through which Halleck and Smith last session blocked a jobsite picketing bill, a school-aid bill, a comprehensive housing bill, a minimum wage bill. Through Halleck's control of four conservative Republicans and Smith's control of two Democratic votes, the 12-member committee repeatedly was deadlocked in tie votes that had the effect of keeping such bills from the floor.

Rayburn wants to enlarge the committee by two more Democrats and one Republican, thus keeping the party ratio but allowing appointment of Democrats in sympathy with the Administration.

Halleck used his full powers in the House Republican caucus to get a party-line vote to block Rayburn's attempt to regain control of the House. Smith is trying to line up southern Democrats, and flatly predicted that he would defeat the Speaker.

Kennedy clearly felt that a victory for Rayburn was needed for the progress of his Administration's program. He boldly asked that the House give all members a chance to vote on this program and said he felt such a chance ought not to be claimed solely by a "small group of men," meaning Smith & Co.

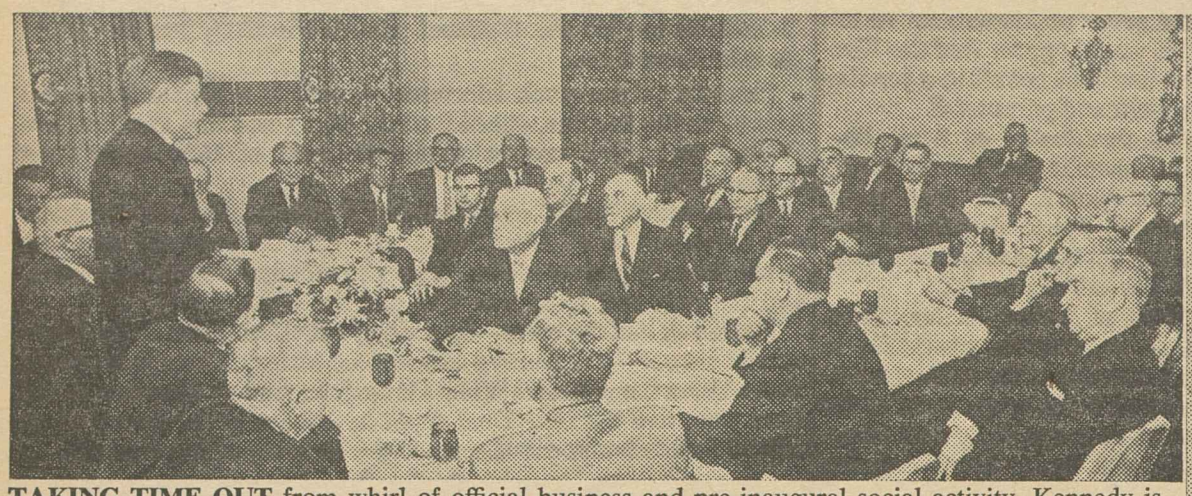
It is a political battle—and the President has revealed that his concept of his office is one that includes a sense of responsibility.

REP. JOHN McCORMACK (D-Mass.), House majority leader, left, said that Pres. Kennedy comes into office facing a recession well advanced and one of the worst international situations in history. Rep. Charles Halleck (R-Ind.), minority leader, said the charge of recession "is a lot of baloney." Both were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO radio program.

PAYING TRIBUTE to Pres. John F. Kennedy, Communications Workers' float entered in mammoth inaugural parade passes reviewing stand in front of White House. CWA display won first prize for originality in the parade. It was keyed to the "Four Freedoms" made famous by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

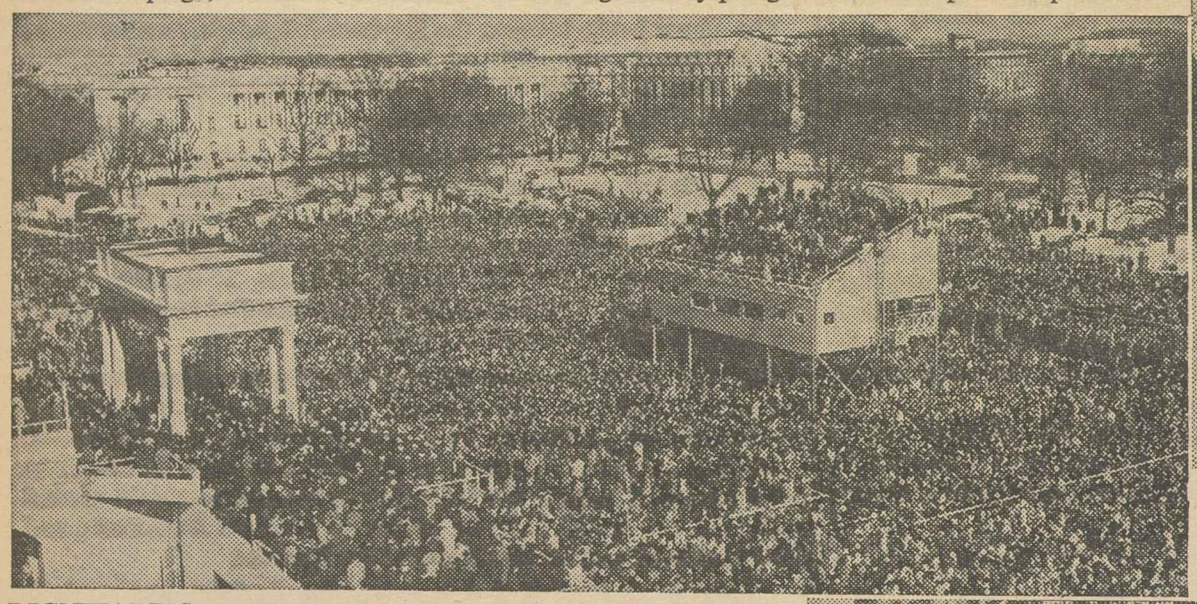
MEMBERS of Letter Carriers' band from Minneapolis step out smartly as they pass dignitaries in presidential reviewing stand, despite biting cold wind which whipped down Pennsylvania Ave., in wake of eight-inch snowfall on inaugural eve. Crews labored throughout night to clear parade route.

Labor Joins Nation's Salute to Kennedy



TAKING TIME OUT from whirl of official business and pre-inaugural social activity, Kennedy is shown addressing meeting of AFL-CIO leaders. He expressed gratitude for labor's support in presidential campaign, and heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledge labor's "complete cooperation."

ONE OF THREE inaugural cakes presented to Pres. Kennedy by American Bakery & Confectionery Workers is cut by new chief executive at inaugural ball at Mayflower Hotel. ABC commissioned Cake Bakers Local 51 in New York to make cakes.



DIGNITARIES, newsmen and private citizens—40,000 of them—stand shivering in East Front Plaza of nation's Capitol at historic moment when John Fitzgerald Kennedy takes oath of office as nation's 35th chief executive. Oath was administered by Chief Justice Earl Warren.

FLOAT entered in inaugural parade by Railway Labor Political League is shown passing by some of the million people who turned out to line triumphal parade route from Capitol Hill to the White House. Float is a reproduction of proposed Franklin Delano Roosevelt memorial which spells out "Four Freedoms" enunciated by FDR and Winston Churchill in World War II.

Inaugural Address Sets the Tone:

'A New Generation' Summons American People to Greatness

The biting cold wind whipping across the East Plaza in front of the nation's Capitol on Inauguration Day seemed to match, in part, the sober and often Spartan tone struck by John Fitzgerald Kennedy in his first address as President of the United States.

But neither the sub-freezing temperature, nor the raw gusty wind, nor the serious tone of the Inaugural Address could dim the spirits of the 40,000 private citizens and public dignitaries gathered to witness the ceremonies marking the peaceful transfer of power.

Nor could the weather dampen the ardor of the million people who lined the parade route from Capitol Hill to the White House to pay an exuberant tribute to the new President.

The wet, eight-inch snow which had all but paralyzed Washington on inaugural eve sparkled brilliantly in the midday sunlight as Kennedy stood bare-headed, repeating after Chief Justice Earl Warren the pledge to "preserve, protect and defend" the Constitution of the United States.

Kennedy took note of the fact that he had sworn the same solemn oath "our forebears prescribed nearly a century and three quarters ago," and taken in turn by each of the men who had preceded him in the presidency.

Former Presidents Watched

The threads that make up the fabric of American democracy were everywhere in evidence. Sharing the platform with the new President were two of the nation's three living ex-Presidents—Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower, the man Kennedy was succeeding in the White House, and Democrat Harry S. Truman. The only other living ex-President, Republican Herbert Hoover, was kept from attendance by the inclement weather.

The widows of two other former Presidents—Mrs. Woodrow Wilson and Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt—also were on hand for the ceremonies.

Serving further to underscore the peaceful process of the transition of power was the presence on the Capitol portico of former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, the man Kennedy defeated by the narrowest of margins last November, and former Vice Pres. Henry A. Wallace, who served in Franklin D. Roosevelt's third term.

At many points in the inaugural address—as if to stress the continuity of government in the United States—Kennedy seemed to invoke the spirits of some of America's great Presidents.

'The Many Who Are Poor'

There was an echo of Franklin Roosevelt's ". . . the test of our progress . . ." in Kennedy's assertion that "if a free society cannot help the many who are poor, it cannot save the few who are rich."

There was the spirit of James Monroe's famed doctrine of independence for the Americas in Kennedy's warning to "every other power" that the Western Hemisphere "intends to remain the master of its own house."

There was a hint of Theodore Roosevelt's admonition to "speak softly—but carry a big stick" in Kennedy's declaration that "only when our arms are sufficient beyond doubt can we be certain beyond doubt that they will never be employed."

There was a memory of Harry S. Truman's "Point Four" program in Kennedy's call for East and West to join together to "explore the stars, conquer the deserts, eradicate disease, tap the ocean depths and encourage the arts and commerce."

There was a harking back to Woodrow Wilson's pleas following World War I in Kennedy's plea to create "not a new balance of power, but a new world of law, where the strong are just and the weak secure and the peace preserved."

There was a paraphrase of Abraham Lincoln in Kennedy's admonition that "in your hands, my fellow citizens, more than mine, will rest the final success or failure of our course."

Kennedy laid down the basic tenets to guide the new generation of Americans—"born in this century, tempered by war, disciplined by a hard and bitter peace, proud of our ancient heritage—and unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today at home and around the world."

The youngest man ever elected President took over from the oldest man ever to serve in the White House with the solemn assurance that "we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty."

The applause swelled as Pres. Kennedy stepped back from the rostrum, the Marine Corps Band played the stirring measures of "Hail to the Chief," and in the background came the muffled reports of the first official 21-gun salute to the new chief executive.

And not all of the gooseflesh at the East Front Plaza came from the wind and the cold.

Work Rule Study Plan Ends Tugboat Strike

partisan commission with a neutral chairman to explore pension provisions for tug crews.

The issue of tug crew sizes will be submitted to the 15-man Mitchell Commission, named by former Pres. Eisenhower to make recommendations about railroad work rules by next Dec. 1. Kennedy has agreed to name to the commission one more union representative from the maritime industry.

Both employer and union representatives called the agreement satisfactory. SIU Pres. Paul Hall praised Goldberg for his help, saying, "There is no question that if he hadn't entered the picture the strike never would have been settled this soon."

Goldberg personally reported details of the settlement to Kennedy and later told a press conference at the Labor Dept. that he acted because he realized the gravity of the situation.

"The strike," he said, "involved a relatively small number of men but it became the key to deliveries of food to New York, and it was spreading as far west as Chicago and St. Louis. I felt it appropriate to communicate with the governor and the mayor to offer the cooperation of the Administration.

"With permission, we telephoned representatives of the carriers and the unions, and we enlisted the help of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany."

Tug crews walked out after negotiating 13 months in a futile effort to get railroad management to agree in writing to the size of crews.

The strike tied up passenger ferries and tugs hauling railroad lighters. When the strikers picketed railroad stations, rail workers on the New York Central and New Haven railroads respected the picket lines and managements halted trains serving more than 70,000 riders a day.

Hotel Unions Plan Center For Retirees

New York—Hotel workers here have raised $65,000 toward construction of a retirement center in the first of a series of fund-raising activities sponsored by the New York Hotels Trade Council.

The council, bargaining agent for Hotel Workers Local 6 and other unions with membership in the industry, is aiming at establishment of a center equipped to serve the more than 3,000 present pensioners as well as those who will retire in the future.

The initial activity was a testimonial dinner honoring Joseph P. Binns, vice president of Hilton Hotels Corp., who was saluted for his service to the New York Conventions and Visitors Bureau, of which he is president. Binns was also honored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews for fund-raising and educational work in behalf of youth programs.

Pres. Harry van Arsdale, president of the New York City Central Labor Council, headed the delegation of trade union leaders attending the dinner. Coordinator of the affair was Walter Sheering, director of the Hotels Trade Council's pensioners group.

Missouri Labor Defends Its Right To Aid Members Without Legal Fees

St. Louis—The Missouri State AFL-CIO has urged every local union in the state to help finance the appeal of Edward M. Tod, director of community services for the St. Louis AFL-CIO, from a finding that he practiced law illegally when he represented injured and unemployed union members free of charge before state claims boards and commissions.

The state body characterized the charges against Tod by the State Bar Association as "a vicious attempt to legalize extortion." It asked all affiliated unions to contribute at least 5 cents per member to the Edward Tod Defense Fund to pay legal fees of $15,000. Fund trustees are Pres. John I. Rollings of the State AFL-CIO and Sec. Oscar Ehrhardt of the St. Louis AFL-CIO.

"The privilege of serving your members before various boards and agencies—without a lawyer—is in danger," said Rollings in a message to all Missouri unions.

P. M. Marr, named by the State Supreme Court as a special commissioner to hear the facts and report back, advised the court to fine Tod $50 and order him to stop representing unions before state bodies.

The Supreme Court has set no date for acting on Marr's recommendation, which it can accept, reject or modify. Rollings said the Missouri State AFL-CIO will appeal the ruling and ask the court to set it aside.

At the hearings before Marr, attempts by Tod's lawyers to show that appearances had been made before state bodies by other laymen, particularly insurance representatives, were objected to by State Bar attorneys and Marr ruled they were irrelevant.

"It is quite evident," Rollings said, "that the promise of a workman's compensation system and the unemployment compensation law, intended to produce simple justice without litigation and without delays is far from fulfillment, and that the Bar Association in this state, and perhaps others, is intent on compelling the unfortunate unemployed and injured workers to pay legal fees when legal talent is not necessary."

Tod is a vice president of the St. Louis AFL-CIO and labor liaison man for the United Fund. The charge against him arose out of his work for the AFL-CIO Union Referral Center, similar to those operated by local central bodies in many American cities. Tod was president of the former St. Louis Industrial Union Council.

Health Policy Cancelled After 23 Years of Paying

The weaknesses of commercial health insurance have been pointed up dramatically in the current issue of the Machinist, official weekly publication of the IAM, which reproduced on its first page a letter sent to a retired worker cancelling a policy he had held for 23 years.

The letter, sent by the North American Co. of Chicago, advised the retired IAM member of the company's "inability to continue your insurance." It reached him on his 70th birthday.

The unionist—a member of IAM Lodge 48, Chicago—wrote that he had been paying on the policy since 1938 and had never collected a penny in benefits. "If I had paid that amount into social security," he told the Machinist, "I would have something for the future."

The IAM publication said the situation, a typical one facing older people, points up the importance of labor's drive for enactment of legislation providing health care for the aged financed through the social security system.

President's 1st Order Doubles Food Allotment

During the primary campaign for the Democratic nomination in West Virginia—one of the hardest hit of the depressed areas—Kennedy charged the Eisenhower Administration with failure to use its full powers to ease the distress of those in need.

Kennedy's executive order said that one of the most urgent problems confronting the nation was "the development of a positive food and nutrition program for all Americans." It pointed out that a special task force headed by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), which had studied the problem of distressed areas before the Administration took office, had emphasized the need for supplementing the surplus food program.

The Agriculture Dept. has indicated it will take from six to eight weeks for the additional food to reach needy families, since under the program the food is purchased by the federal government and delivered in carload lots to state agencies which assume responsibility for storing and distributing the food and determining the eligibility of recipients.

'Peace and Freedom Imperiled':

Build U.S. Strength, Schnitzler Urges

The first order of business for America, with a vigorous new President in the White House, is to rebuild its strength to a point where no dictator will dare to attack us, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the National Coordinating Committee of the Beverage Industry, in Washington for its annual midwinter meeting.

To achieve the goal, Americans will have to put the country back to work, create more jobs, rebuild our military and domestic strength while at the same time meeting material and human needs, Schnitzler said.

"The peace and freedom of the world is imperiled by the forces of aggressive and godless dictatorship," he told several hundred delegates representing an industry with 1.25 million workers and an annual payroll of more than $4 billion.

"The dictatorships," he said, "have managed to get ahead of us in rockets, missiles and other weapons of mass destruction. Let us look to our defenses."

Americans will have to "revitalize a slipping economy" to strengthen the nation, Schnitzler said, pointing out that the "increasing millions of unemployed are tragic evidence of stunted growth."

The first step in the process, Schnitzler said, is to restore confidence in the future of our country.

"That, I am sure, Pres. Kennedy will do," the speaker said. "Even Wall Street, since his election, is responding to the invigorating promise of his 'New Frontier' program.

"The program dovetails closely with the goals of the trade union movement. It makes the federal government not merely a helpless bystander, but an active participant in the job of putting America back to work."

There is a great deal of unfinished work to be done, Schnitzler said.

"America urgently needs many thousands of new schools, millions of new homes, hundreds of modern airports. Our communities desperately need help in removing hideous slums, in rebuilding crumbling industrial areas, in safeguarding vital water supplies from pollution."

Business is waiting for the encouragement of a "go-ahead" signal to begin development of many new industries and products based on the latest scientific discoveries. Talented young people need help in getting a college education. Senior citizens need insurance, through the social security system, against the high cost of medical care, he pointed out.

Schnitzler praised the NCCBI for opposing those who would "wreck the beverage industry" through prohibition or over-taxation. The organization also, he said, provides an outstanding example of good labor-management cooperation for all of industry.

Meeting Held On ICFTU Reorganizing

The AFL-CIO Executive Committee has been assured by Pres. Arne Geijer and General Sec. Omer Becu of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions that final recommendations for the reorganization of the free world labor group would be presented to a meeting of the ICFTU Executive Board on Mar. 13 in Brussels.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reported after a meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters, that the AFL-CIO representative at the March meeting would be authorized and prepared to notify it as to whether or not the AFL-CIO would participate in the Solidarity Fund of the ICFTU, and if it did participate as to what extent.

The federation president announced that as a result of discussions with ICFTU officials, the final $221,000 payment to the Solidarity Fund for 1957 to 1960 has been earmarked to be spent by the AFL-CIO in Africa in coordination with ICFTU programs there. Meany said the federation would continue independent activities in the world labor field in conformity with policies set forth by the ICFTU.

The reorganization of the ICFTU to make it a more effective force was voted by the last ICFTU Congress in December 1959 and the group's Executive Board, an ad hoc committee and the ICFTU officials have worked since then on plans for reshaping the organization.

Unite! Against the Common Enemies

Jobless Rate Soars, Quick Action Pledged

break control of the committee by a bipartisan conservative coalition.

Five days in office, his Cabinet appointees promptly confirmed by the Senate, Kennedy in tone and by language asserted a clear sense of responsibility and power in executive leadership.

The jobless benefit figures that alarmed Goldberg were given in detail at the Secretary's first news conference by Seymour Wolfbein, the Labor Dept.'s manpower expert.

Wolfbein said that jobless compensation claims in the first week of January jumped by more than a quarter of a million—"to be exact, 229,000"—and that this made a total of 3.3 million jobless workers filing claims.

"This is the highest level of insured unemployment and highest rate for this time of year" since the beginning of the "system" 28 years ago, Wolfbein said.

Workers in the "covered" jobs—those that are protected by the jobless insurance system—make up about two-thirds of the labor force, so that total unemployment indicated during the first week of January clearly was far higher than the 3.3 million drawing insurance.

In the government's most recent report on total unemployment, for mid-December, 4.5 million workers were jobless, and the seasonally adjusted jobless rate was 6.8 percent.

The unemployment compensation claims for the first week in January were about 50 percent higher than usual.

The next report, for mid-January, is slated for release early in February.

Wolfbein pointed out that continuation of the 6.8 percent jobless rate would indicate a total of 5.5 million unemployed, and that if joblessness "moves even more than seasonally, we of course would get higher than that."

The unusually sharp increase in initial claims in January, he said, indicates that the rate will in fact be higher.

Goldberg's comments on his unemployment compensation proposals indicated that the Labor Dept. was already at work on recommendations to Kennedy.

He declined to say whether he favored direct federal grants to the states to extend unemployment compensation benefits or a mere loan program, comparable to that forced through in 1958 when a bipartisan coalition defeated Democratic efforts to supply federal grants.

"There is a deep concern" in his department about the unemployment compensation area, he said, "and a strong feeling that the federal government must extend help."

The President, however, would have to make the decision on the exact nature of the help, Goldberg said, and "I can only advise him."

In answer to other questions, Goldberg said:

- He planned to hold regular news conferences, and all his subordinates and bureau heads also were instructed to make themselves available to answer questions from reporters.
- He would make recommendations to the President "in all areas of concern to this department," but the question of when Taft-Hartley Act amendments might be proposed "should be addressed to the President."
- On whether he considered himself Kennedy's "top adviser on all labor matters," with some responsibility for the National Labor Relations Board and conciliation matters, that was again a question "most appropriately addressed to the President."
- He did not believe he had "intervened" to help end the New York tugboat strike but had lent "good offices" in a dispute that had become of "national magnitude and importance."

Kennedy Steps Into Fight on House Rules

Howard W. Smith (Va.) and Rep. William M. Colmer (Miss.)—teamed up with the four right-wing Republicans to create a 6-6 deadlock. The coalition thus buried housing and jobsite picketing bills and delayed aid to depressed areas and civil rights in the last Congress.

Before the 87th Congress convened, liberal Democrats offered a wide range of proposals to break the alliance—including the "purging" of Colmer, who campaigned against the Kennedy-Johnson ticket in November; adding the Speaker and the Majority and Minority Leaders to the committee; and requiring the committee to report a bill to the floor within a specified period of time.

Rayburn proposed expansion of the committee membership through the addition of two more Democrats and one more Republican as a less painful alternative to the drastic proposal of ousting Colmer, and pledged that the two additional majority party members would be Democrats "who support the Democratic position in and out of Congress."

The plan won overwhelming—but not unanimous—approval in the Democratic caucus. Smith dropped his opposition within the caucus, declaring there were too many votes against him, but planned a last-ditch floor fight.

Supporting Smith in his fight, the Republican caucus followed the recommendation of Minority Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) and voted overwhelmingly to oppose enlarging the committee. Less than 20 GOP members bucked their party's caucus, according to Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.), who spoke against continuation of the GOP-Dixie alliance.

AFL-CIO Urges Prompt Passage of 'Overdue' Area Redevelopment Bill

one the Senate passed last year. It would create an Area Redevelopment Administration in the executive branch, with three revolving funds of $100 million, beginning with $30 million each. These would provide low-interest loans to build facilities to attract new industry. The bill would also provide federal grants of $75 million, limited to $10 million until July 1, 1962.

The bill would provide for vocational retraining and subsistence payments during this period and send technical specialists to the affected areas. It would give special aid to hard-hit rural areas and would deny aid to "runaway" employers.

Congress has twice passed modified area redevelopment bills, but former Pres. Eisenhower vetoed them in 1958 and 1960.

Biemiller raised questions on two aspects of the Douglas bill.

He said the proposed eligibility criteria seemed "too inflexible," because it appeared a community would have to wait at least a year for federal aid, even if the sudden shutdown of a plant primary to the community plunged the area into distress. He proposed that the administrator of the program be given authority "to act promptly."

He also pointed out that some communities may fall just short of being eligible for assistance and urged that these should receive a measure of "preventive" aid. Technical assistance and job retraining aid may help such a community avert a worsening situation, he added.

Biemiller warned that some groups still "clamor" to have an area redevelopment program under the Commerce Dept. and this, he stressed, would be a "catastrophe."

He said that department has demonstrated neither sympathy for nor competence to administer such a program and has been highly influenced by the big-business-dominated Business Advisory Council.

An area redevelopment program belongs in the Dept. of Labor as a matter of "logic and housekeeping considerations," he urged, pointing out that the department reported regularly on problems of distressed areas and joblessness and has been run by secretaries sympathetic to the welfare of such areas.

He said labor nevertheless deemed the placement of the program in an independent agency as a "reasonable" compromise that apparently would win wider support.

Reuther expressed satisfaction that "the atmosphere of complacency and drift has lifted" and that immediate and effective action was at hand.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce appeared in opposition, asserting that federal aid would fail, would be inadequate and would fill "the unfortunate people in these areas with plenty of false hopes."

Brown Chosen President of Texas Labor

Austin, Tex.—H. S. (Hank) Brown of San Antonio has been elected by the Texas State AFL-CIO executive board to fill out the term of Jerry Holleman as president of the state body. Holleman resigned to accept appointment as Assistant Secretary of Labor.

Brown, 40, served as education and research director of the state AFL-CIO until 1959, when he became business manager of Local 142 of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters. He recently was named also executive secretary of the Texas State Building & Construction Trades Council. Brown announced his resignation from both posts after his selection as state AFL-CIO president.

The 22-member executive board chose Brown over Sec.-Treas. Fred Schmidt. The terms of both the president and the secretary-treasurer run until the August convention of the state federation.

Earlier the board had unanimously adopted a resolution praising Holleman's service to the Texas labor movement and hailing his appointment to the Labor Dept.

16-Point Kennedy Message Maps Assault on Recession

Rayburn Wins House Rules Fight

The Kennedy Administration won its first—and perhaps its most important—test of strength in the 87th Congress as the House, by a narrow 217-212 margin, voted to strip a conservative Republican-Dixiecrat coalition of its control over the powerful Rules Committee.

Adoption of a plan to enlarge the committee and thus end the coalition's power to keep liberal economic measures from reaching the floor was a major victory for veteran Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.), who had staked his reputation and leadership on the outcome of the fight.

It was a victory also for Pres. John F. Kennedy who, in his first press conference, had placed his own prestige on the line when he declared that "a small group of men" should not be permitted to keep the majority of House members from voting on his Administration's legislative proposals.

Rallying behind Rayburn's proposal to add two more Democrats and one Republican to the Rules Committee were 195 Democrats and 22 Republicans. Arrayed against him were 148 Republicans and 64 Democrats. Of the latter, 62 were from states of the Old Confederacy, one was from Oklahoma and one was from Missouri. (For the rollcall vote, see Page 10.)

House Becomes Battleground

With the conservatives no longer able to use their power in the Rules Committee to bottle up Kennedy Administration proposals, the House itself will become the main battleground during the 87th Congress, with the closeness of the

Asks Swift Action, Frees New Funds

By Gene Zack

Pres. John F. Kennedy has proposed a sweeping 16-point anti-recession program calling for a "maximum effort" by the nation to "abate the waste and misery of unemployment," and to stimulate economic growth.

The proposals, sent to Congress less than two weeks after Kennedy assumed office, covered a broad range of emergency actions and long-range programs which, he said, were designed to set the nation "firmly on the road to full recovery."

The Administration program included legislative action for temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits and assistance to the children of the jobless. By executive action, Kennedy directed reduction of interest rates on FHA mortgages and local public facilities, and a speedup of approved housing and highway projects as part of the immediate move to inject vigor into the lagging economy.

Among other proposals were recommendations on raising the minimum wage and broadening coverage, special tax incentives to spur investment, and steps to assure job, wage and price stability during the transition to automation in industry.

Some of the details of the program remained to be spelled out, with the President giving Congress a general timetable on when the specifics would be sent to Capitol Hill.

Kennedy pledged that "if these measures prove to be inadequate to the task, I shall submit further proposals . . . within the next 75 days," adding:

"We will do what needs to be done to fulfill the high promise of the American economy."

The nation, he declared, "cannot

Jobless Aid Hike Urged By Kennedy

By Willard Shelton

An immediate temporary extension of unemployment insurance to aid the jobless and fast action to strengthen the basic system as a "permanent reform" have been recommended to Congress by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Promising specific proposals on the permanent system "by the end of March," Kennedy told the legislature that it would be a "tragic mistake" to approve mere "stop-gap" remedies and renew the precedent of gearing such remedies to emergencies.

"The standards of the system have proven inadequate to deal with the recession problem," he declared, and "this time we must establish a permanent system which can do the job it was intended to do."

His proposals for permanent improvement, he said, would be designed "to revise and strengthen the benefit and financing provisions." In a press conference the day before he sent his message to Congress, Kennedy said his proposals would involve improved "standards, duration and benefits."

Over 5-Year Period:

Factory Workers' Buying Power Dips

By Robert B. Cooney

The average factory worker is now slightly worse off in terms of buying power than he was five years ago, the government has reported.

Statistics revealing this fact accompanied a monthly report which showed the nation's cost of living edged upward to a new all-time record in December 1960, last full month of the Eisenhower Administration.

The Consumer Price Index rose by 0.1 percent to 127.5 between November and December. This means the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.75.

A companion report said factory workers' buying power dipped slightly in December. This was explained by a 24-minute drop in the workweek, attributed to snowstorms in the northeastern region, offsetting a 2-cent rise in hourly earnings and then the slight cost of living increase trimming buying power.

Spendable earnings in December —what is left after deduction of federal income and social security taxes—were $80.35 a week for a worker with 3 dependents and $72.81 for a worker without dependents.

"Real" spendable earnings or buying power—what is left after net spendable earnings are reduced by cost of living increases —were $63.02 in December for a

White House to Create Labor Advisory Panel

Pres. John F. Kennedy has announced plans for establishment of a President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy —with members drawn from labor, management and the public— to help "promote free and responsible collective bargaining, industrial peace" and a "smooth" adjustment to technological change.

In his message to Congress spelling out a program for economic recovery and growth, Kennedy said the committee would also work toward development of sound wage and price policies, increased productivity and a higher standard of living.

"I look to the committee," the President declared, "to make an important contribution to labor-management relations and an understanding of their importance to the stability of prices and the health of the economy."

Earlier, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a radio inter-

Social Security Hikes Proposed by President

By Saul Miller

Five major changes in the social security benefit structure have been called for by Pres. John F. Kennedy to increase payments to between 4 million and 5 million persons in the next 12 months.

In his message on economic recovery and growth, the President declared that the benefit increases are necessary to meet "pressing social needs" and provide an "economic stimulus" to the economy. Estimates indicate the program would add about $1 billion annually in purchasing power.

The President's proposals, which he urged become effective Apr. 1, would be financed by a one-quarter of 1 percent increase in employer and employe contributions, to take effect at the next scheduled increase in contributions on Jan. 1, 1963. They include:

- Increasing the minimum monthly benefit for retired workers from $33 to $43 per month. He

Unemployment in Canada Up Sharply for December

Ottawa, Ont.—Unemployment in Canada jumped to 528,000 or 8.2 percent of the labor force in December, an increase of 99,000 over November and the highest for so early in the winter since the depth of the depression of the Thirties.

The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reported that employment showed a greater than average decline during the period in construction, industry and farming. In the last three months of 1960, it said, about 16 percent of all construction workers and 20 percent of all laborers were idle.

Unemployment hit hardest on the two coasts—11.9 percent of the work force in the Atlantic provinces, and 10.9 percent in British Columbia.

'Right-to-Work' Repeal Passes Indiana Senate

Indianapolis—The Indiana state Senate has voted 26 to 24 to repeal the state's so-called "right-to-work" law, but the repeal bill still faces an uphill battle in the Republican-controlled lower house.

The Senate vote closely followed party lines, with all but one Democrat voting for repeal and all but one Republican opposing the measure.

Senate action came after Indiana's Gov. Matthew E. Welsh (D) had urged the legislature to repeal the union shop ban which he described as "a source of controversy and labor unrest without any benefit to the state or its citizens."

Despite the closeness of the vote, the Senate action appeared to have foreclosed any chances of success for right-wing Republican demands that the "right-to-work" law be "tightened" by adding a ban on agency shop contracts, under which workers not joining the union that bargains for them can be required to pay a service fee equal to union dues.

Business Pressures Denounced

Senate Labor Committee Chairman William C. Christy, who steered the repeal bill through a 7-to-2 endorsement in his committee, in a speech to the Senate, sharply denounced "pressures from special interests" which he said had been brought to bear in an effort to block repeal.

While Republican Party lines are not expected to hold so tightly in the House, where some GOP members have come out for repeal, the immediate problem facing repeal supporters is how to pry the bill out of the House Labor Committee, which is heavily dominated by conservatives.

The legislative situation is the reverse of the 1959 session.

At that time, Democrats held the House while Republicans controlled the Senate and the governorship. A repeal bill easily passed the House but was blocked in the Senate.

Issue in 1960 Election

While some of the tension eased after the state Supreme Court ruled that the "work" law did not bar the agency shop, repeal was still a major issue in the 1960 state elections.

Welsh hammered hard at the issue during the campaign and won election over a conservative Republican despite the fact that the GOP presidential ticket carried Indiana by a landslide. While the Democrats picked up the seats they needed to win control of the Senate, they lost the House.

Union Offers 8-Week Class On Retirement

New York—Nearly 100 members of District 65 of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union have started an eight-week course to prepare themselves for retirement.

Experts in the field of problems of the aging have agreed to speak on income sources, mental and physical health, family relations, housing, leisure-time activities, employment opportunities and allied subjects. The final session will bring in retired members of District 65 for a round table discussion of their own experiences.

Several speakers are appearing with the cooperation of the Cornell University School of Industrial and Labor Relations. Classes are being held at union headquarters, 13 Astor Place.

The course was planned by Jack Ossofsky, retirement plan director for District 65, as part of the union welfare program administered by Irving Baldinger. District 65 represents 35,000 employes of major retail stores here.

By Eliminating Special Privilege:

Tax Reforms Could Bring $18 Billion, AFL-CIO Says

"Major reform of the federal tax structure is long overdue," declared the AFL-CIO in asserting that an equitable tax system which eliminates special privilege could bring the government nearly $18 billion in extra revenue.

Labor's Economic Review, publication of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, devoted successive issues to the problem of the lack of consumer demand underlying the business slump and the link between the program of Pres. John F. Kennedy and federal resources.

The immediate pressing need is for a bolstering of the economy, the AFL-CIO stressed.

"At the present time, in the midst of a serious recession," the Review pointed out, "the AFL-CIO has suggested that if unemployment rises above 7 percent of the labor force, a temporary tax cut would be desirable to bolster purchasing power, stimulate recovery and reduce unemployment."

The government has reported there were 4.54 million jobless in December, with the unemployment rate at 6.8 percent. The jobless total for January is estimated by government leaders unofficially at about 5.5 million.

High Tax Rate Needed

Over the long run, the AFL-CIO continued, it is recognized that the "ambitious" domestic and foreign programs of the new Kennedy Administration will require the maintenance of high tax rates.

While some look for tax increases, the Review said, the possibilities of obtaining additional revenue from the present tax structure "are often overlooked."

The Review discussed the main provisions of the tax laws, using the yardstick of equality of treatment and the principle of ability to pay and declared:

Tax Reform 'Overdue'

"There can be no doubt that major reform of the federal tax structure is long overdue. The objective of such reform should be an effective system that will yield adequate revenue based on the principle of ability to pay and which will contribute to the growth and stability of the economy."

The Review pointed out that the individual income tax, which accounts for 45 percent or the largest single portion of federal revenue, has a progressive rate structure and the appearance of fairness.

"Unfortunately, however, it is riddled with special privileges which are corroding its basically fair characteristics. The special treatment for capital gains, the special tax credit for dividend income, the continuing existence of tax-exempt interest are but a few examples," the Review said.

"Similar shortcomings," the Review went on, "have developed in the corporate income tax. Perhaps the most flagrant is the provision for excessive depletion allowances for the oil and mining industries.

Income Treated Unequally

"The effect of these exclusions and deductions both as to individual and corporation taxes is to treat income differently according to its sources. That is, income from wages is taxed at one rate, income from dividends at another and income from oil wells at still another."

Income classified as capital gains, the AFL-CIO added, is taxed at no more than half the rate for wages and much less than this for those in the upper brackets.

The issue of the Review dealing with tax reform listed the main points of the labor-proposed changes. A breakdown of the tax loopholes and special privileges showed that thorough reform could produce $17.7 billion in additional revenue.

'Widening Gap' Cited

The Review which dealt with "Investment and Economic Growth" pointed to a widening gap between productive capacity and the "unmet" needs of millions of families. This issue also proposed an overhaul of tax laws to close loopholes and temporary tax relief to prime the economy.

The Review said there is no need for tax cuts now for corporations and the wealthy and for larger depreciation allowances since "there is no present shortage of savings for capital expansion."

The publication observed that America's "blue chip" corporations —many of them counted among Fortune magazine's list of the 500 giants who produced over half the nation's output in 1959 and took over 70 percent of total profits— have benefited during the postwar years from the new bonanza of "costless capital."

By this, explained the Review, is meant the expansion funds on which neither obligations to new investors nor new interest charges are incurred.

The Review noted that, from the end of 1951 through the third quarter of 1960, there was an increase of $66 billion in stockholders' equity in manufacturing firms alone—the total value of property and cash reserves after subtracting liabilities. This was a two-thirds rise in less than nine years. Yet, the Review added, the actual net new risk capital secured by new stock issues totaled less than $4 billion.

General Motors, for example, the Review said, spent $5 billion for new plant and equipment from 1947-59. Internal funds—$3.4 billion from retained earnings and $3 billion from depreciation set-asides —added up to $6.4 billion in this period. This sum exceeded by $1.4 billion GM's total capital investment.

The AFL-CIO posed the question of how high postwar profit levels were maintained, often at low operating rates, in the face of high taxes and other costs and with the lamentation of a so-called profits squeeze.

Prices Set High

"The answer," said the Review, is a price structure set by industrial giants at a high enough level to cover taxes and other costs as well as dividends and retained profits.

"The American consumer," declared the AFL-CIO, "is actually forced to provide the costless capital to finance investment through the high prices imposed upon him.

"Thus—everybody pays for the tools to expand production, but only a handful get to own them and make profits from them."

The AFL-CIO said there must be a "rigorous" examination of the impact of all public and private actions affecting the economy and which may be retarding the efficient use of physical and human resources.

California Legislature Asked for Farm Dispute Fact-Finding Body

Sacramento, Calif.—A bill to create a California Agriculture Fact-Finding Commission has been introduced in the state legislature.

Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown (D) recommended the fact-finding group in his message to the legislature. He said the $3-billion-a-year farm industry, the state's biggest, was afflicted with "perhaps the most troubled labor-management relationship in California today."

The labor movement has been conducting organizing campaigns among the state's farm workers, who are not covered by protective state or federal legislation and face the large-scale use by grower associations of imported Mexicans.

Brown told the legislators that "despite the occasional work stoppages last summer and fall, very few crops were lost. Few workers and very few farmers were directly affected. Generally, crops were good and wages were up."

"The conflict is continuing, however, and I believe government should be ready to act if necessary to protect the public interest or preserve individual rights."

For this reason, Brown said, he recommended a balanced fact-finding group to make periodic factual reports on disputes. The group also could report its findings if and when it deemed direct government intervention useful, he added.

Assemblyman Leverette D. House (D) introduced a bill at the governor's request. Sen. James Cobey (D) reportedly planned to sponsor a counterpart in the Senate.

The proposed 10-member commission would include labor and farmer representatives as well as a public member as chairman and representatives of executive agencies and the legislature.

A $10,000 appropriation was requested for the commission, whose members would serve without pay. The group's continuing role will be to study problems and make annual reports.

Buying Power Declines As Cost of Living Rises worker with three dependents and $57.11 for a worker without dependents.

Five years ago—in December 1955—real spendable earnings totaled $63.64 for a worker with three dependents and $57.23 for a worker without dependents.

Food Prices Higher

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said that, for the second straight month, the increase in the CPI was due primarily to higher food prices although higher shelter costs helped in the advance. This was the tenth rise in the 11 monthly reports since January 1960.

BLS Deputy Commissioner Robert J. Myers told reporters the outlook for the January CPI was "little or no change."

For the year ahead, Myers said, the cost of living may continue upward by one or two percent.

At 127.5 for December, the report noted, the cost of living was 1.6 percent higher than year-ago levels.

Annual Rates Compared

The 1960 annual average CPI was 126.5, the report said, 1.5 percent above the 1959 average—"an increase well below that of some postwar years."

Average annual increases during the four years prior to 1960 were: 1.5 percent in 1956; 3.4 percent in 1957; 2.7 percent in 1958 and 0.9 percent in 1959.

The December CPI of 127.5 will mean automatic cost-of-living wage hikes for over 150,000 workers whose union contracts have escalator clauses calling for an adjustment at this time.

About 110,000 workers—mainly in metal working and some aircraft firms—will get a 1-cent-an-hour increase. Some 42,000 others will get a 2-cents hike. About half the latter are employed by western trucking companies, the report observed.

Workers Bear Recession Impact:

Steel Profits High Despite Output Cut

The deepening recession has not seriously affected the after-tax profits of the steel industry despite the fact that it has forced the "furloughing" of 125,000 members of the Steelworkers, according to the Wall Street Journal.

The business publication reported that the industry continued last year to pile up net profits at close to the pre-recession rate of nearly $400 million annually in the face of a sharp drop in demand pushing output down close to 50 percent of capacity.

Thus the major brunt of the current economic crisis is being borne almost entirely by USWA members—whose ranks previously had been thinned by more than 40,000 workers in the past seven years because of growing automation in the steel mills.

The current indications, according to the Journal, are that 10,000 of the 125,000 currently laid off "probably will never be recalled, even should output rebound to record levels." It pointed out that after the 1959 strike about 9,000 USWA members never got their jobs back.

Productivity Up Sharply

The key to the bright profit picture of the steel giants, who are realizing a 4 percent return on their $10 billion investment, is the steady introduction of technological improvements in the mills so that a ton of finished steel can now be produced with only 12 man-hours of labor as contrasted with 19 man-hours in 1940, the business newspaper said.

The article quoted an unidentified "top executive in the industry" as saying that it is possible for steel mills to make a profit while running at less than 45 percent of capacity. During World War II the so-called "breakeven point" for the industry was 60 percent.

One of the methods for keeping up industry profits during the current drop in steel demand, the Journal said, is to cut back older facilities, with relatively large numbers of employes, first while letting the newer automated operations run at or near capacity.

The healthy profit picture for the industry is in sharp contrast to management claims during 1959 negotiations that wage increases for USWA members could not be absorbed without raising prices. The Journal reported that the industry has now gone two and a half years "without a general increase in prices and, in fact, scattered small price reductions have been made in recent weeks."

NMU Contract Hikes Pay on Harbor Ships

New York—By a vote of 1,589 to 162, union crews of 700 harbor tugs, lighters and tankers have voted to approve a new three-year contract providing wage increases of more than 12 percent and other benefits.

The agreement was reached a day in advance of a strike deadline. The union, Local 333 of the Maritime Union's marine division, said it provides these benefits for 3,500 workers:

- Wage increases across the board of 8 percent effective Feb. 1, 1961; an additional 4 percent as of Feb. 1, 1962; a third increase on Feb. 1, 1963, based on the rise in the cost of living;
- Pension benefit increases of 40 percent financed by an employer payment of $1 a month during the first year, and an additional $1 a month for each of the last two years of the contract;
- Improvements in living conditions aboard ship and a boost in allowances tied to food price increases;
- No "broken" watches while a ship is under way; those who work part of a day will be paid for the entire day.

The contract also provides that ship's cooks will get time and a half pay for work after supper and before breakfast; deck mates get an extra $1.02 a day; pilotage premiums in certain New York areas will be increased; penalty pay for tank cleaning will be raised to $2 an hour.

Overtime to be Studied

The question of overtime for crewmen waiting to be relieved will be studied for a year and taken to arbitration if no agreement results.

The contract affects about 85 percent of harbor traffic, according to Capt. Joseph O'Hare, Local 333 president. Tugmen for 11 railroads recently settled a 14-day strike by agreeing to accept the railroad wage "pattern" and to submit a dispute on the size of tug crews to a presidential commission studying rail work rules.

Southern Unions Seek Civil Rights Progress

Louisville—The southern trade union movement is pressing its drive for civil rights, members of the AFL-CIO Southern Advisory Committee on Civil Rights reported at the committee's third meeting here.

Reports from all southern states showed that:

- Despite obstacles, unions cited some examples of progress in their own ranks and the community at large.
- Labor's voice was raised in protest against infringements of Negro rights in New Orleans and other localities.
- The climate of prevailing opinion in the South nevertheless continued unfavorable to progress in the civil rights field. Tensions were renewed by incidents in the New Orleans public schools, the University of Georgia, and among Tennessee sharecroppers. These were aggravated by continuing activity of White Citizens' Councils and other segregationist organizations.
- Pressing problems continue to confront the labor movement in the South. Among them is employer use of race hate campaigns against union attempts to win National Labor Relations Board elections.

Those present included Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies, former committee chairman; Pres. Harold B. Boyd of the Virginia AFL-CIO, incoming chairman; Exec. Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle, Kentucky AFL-CIO; Sec.-Treas. Leroy Lindsey and Vice Pres. Ben Gage, Alabama AFL-CIO; Sec.-Treas. J. W. Holder, North Carolina AFL-CIO; Sec. Matthew Lynch, Tennessee AFL-CIO; and Sec.-Treas. S. J. Bourg, Louisiana AFL-CIO.

Also in attendance were Arthur J. Potter, assistant AFL-CIO regional director for Tennessee and Kentucky; Charles Caswell and Richard Carter, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Edward White, Steelworkers; H. L. Mitchell, Meat Cutters; Emanuel Muravchik of the Jewish Labor Committee, representing the Ladies' Garment Workers; Vice Pres. Milton P. Webster, Sleeping Car Porters, member of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee; John Cosgrove, assistant director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Dir. Boris Shishkin and Assistant Directors Theodore E. Brown and Donald Slaiman, AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights.

Canadian Rail Unions Set May 16 Strike Date

Montreal, Que.—The non-operating railroad unions' general conference committee at a meeting here has unanimously selected May 16 as the new starting date for a nationwide walkout which is prohibited before midnight on May 15 by special legislation pushed through Parliament by Prime Minister John Diefenbaker's Conservative Party majority.

An estimated 110,000 members of 17 unions will take to the picket lines on the proposed strike date unless their contract dispute with Canada's major railroads is settled by then, the committee said.

At the same meeting, the committee gave a unanimous vote of confidence to Frank H. Hall, its chairman and a vice president of the Railroad Clerks.

Meantime, Diefenbaker has asked the unions and the railroads to resume bargaining in an effort to reach an agreement.

Hall said the unions would comply with the Prime Minister's request and expressed the hope the railroads would be willing to accept conciliation board wage recommendations.

Diefenbaker's no-strike law was enacted on Dec. 3, just 12 hours before the original strike deadline.

The act barred a strike for six months during which a royal commission on transportation was expected to make a report.

It was enacted although the railroads had turned down a conciliation board's recommendation of a 14-cents an hour wage increase which the unions had accepted. The workers originally asked a 25-cent increase.

Essay Sponsored By Rail Firemen

San Francisco—The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen are sponsoring a contest in seven western states for the best essay by railroad workers on the subject of firemen as necessary helpers on diesel locomotives.

Cash awards of $150, $100 and $50 will be given for the three best entries from the states of California, Oregon, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. The contest closes at midnight March 31 for railroaders working on the Southern Pacific, Northwestern Pacific, and the former El Paso and Southwestern lines.

Area Redevelopment Bill Slowed By GOP's 'Calculated Scrutiny'

The widely-supported area redevelopment bill hit a two-week delay as Senate Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) announced a Republican policy of "calculated scrutiny" of each part of the Kennedy program.

Pres. John F. Kennedy gave a strong push to the measure in special letters to Congress appealing for "prompt" action. Kennedy's appeal went to Vice-Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, presiding officer of the Senate and House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.).

A Senate Banking subcommittee headed by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), sponsor of the bill with 43 other senators, has almost completed hearings, but Dirksen secured delay by insisting that the group hear witnesses from the Administration. House hearings remain to be held.

Puts Off Vote

The Dirksen move pushed Senate consideration of the bill at least to mid-February, after the traditional recess for the Republican Lincoln Day rallies.

The Douglas bill would create an independent Area Redevelopment Administration, operating with three revolving funds of $100 million, starting with $30 million each. It would provide public facility grants of $75 million, limited to $10 million until July 1, 1962.

The bill also would provide for vocational retraining and subsistence payments; technical aid; special aid for hard-hit rural areas and a ban on aid to "runaway" employers.

Congress twice has passed pared-down measures, but former Pres. Eisenhower vetoed them in 1958 and 1960.

Kennedy pointed out in his message that the number of areas of "substantial and persistent unemployment" has risen to nearly 100. This problem, he added, is not confined to urban centers, "but is spread across rural communities and represents a serious handicap to our national economic health."

Private initiative is insufficient to the task, Kennedy said, adding that the problem requires the cooperative effort of the federal government working with state and local governments and private business.

Kennedy said he thought the Commerce Dept. was best equipped to run and coordinate the program.

"However," the President added, "if the Congress should decide that a new agency would be more appropriate, I believe such an agency could also carry out the objectives I have outlined."

Douglas, who strongly favors an independent agency, said he had been informed by Kennedy aides that the White House would not press an objection.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified earlier that, although labor feels the Labor Dept. has the experience and the sympathy to effectively administer such a program, the placement of the program in an independent agency is regarded as a "reasonable" compromise.

Biemiller said labor's opposition to having the program run by the Commerce Dept. is "not based upon our lack of faith in the person who presides over that department"—at present Commerce Sec. Luther Hodges—but rather on the influence which big business is shown to have exercised in the department over a period of years. Business representatives, he said, have been unsympathetic toward a meaningful federal effort to aid depressed areas.

Solomon Barkin, research director of the Textile Workers Union of America, also testified strongly in favor of an independent agency and urged appointment of an administrator of commanding stature.

Safety Awards to Memorialize Read

Chicago — An annual awards program giving national recognition to labor organizations and individuals for outstanding contributions to health and safety has been announced by the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council.

The awards have been established to honor the late Harry Read, former assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, for his service in the safety field.

Elwood P. Swisher, vice president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and chairman of the NSC Labor Conference, said the deadline for this year's nominations is July 1.

ICFTU Raps Dictatorship In Portugal

Brussels, Belgium—The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions declared that "the sensational seizure" of the Portuguese liner Santa Maria should awaken free trade unionists to the need for supporting a democratic opposition to the Salazar dictatorship in Portugal and for speeding the advent of freedom in the country and its African possessions.

Specifying that the ICFTU refrained from commenting on the "propriety" of the ship seizure, the statement pointed out that the act confirmed the existence of an organized anti-Salazar movement.

The cruise ship was seized in the Caribbean by the political opponents of Premier Antonio de Oliveira Salazar. Lt. Gen. Humberto da Silva Delgado, leader of the newly-proclaimed Portuguese Revolutionary Movement, said from his place of asylum in Brazil that the ship's seizure signaled the start of an open effort to topple Salazar.

The ICFTU pointed out that free trade unions are "non-existent" in Portugal and forced labor is practiced in the Portuguese African colonies. It is "shocking" also, the ICFTU added, that there is "no political freedom" within Portugal and almost no "rights" for the nation's colonial peoples.

Union Celebrates At 'Inaugural Ball'

Rochester, N. Y.—There were no top hats or white ties, but 5,000 union members and guests watched a glittering floor show and danced to the music of two bands at an Inaugural Ball here sponsored by the Rochester AFL-CIO Council and celebrating the inauguration of Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Tickets were only a dollar, but with 50 union stagehands, ticket takers, ushers and other workers donating their services, the council expects to turn over a substantial sum to the Rochester Area Committee on Political Education. All profits were earmarked for COPE.

AFL-CIO Reg. 2 Dir. Michael Mann, a guest, hailed the event as a "splendid example of the spirit and imaginative thinking" of the Rochester labor movement.

C., to Franklin Delano Roosevelt, selection of which recently was hailed by CWA executive board as a "step toward the ultimate erection" of memorial to New Deal President. Left to right are CWA Sec.-Treas. W. A. Smallwood, Vice Pres. John Crull and Pres. Joseph A. Beirne. CWA has been for years a prime mover in FDR memorial campaign.

HEW Consultants Ask 25,000 Scholarships

A panel of educators has recommended that the federal government take a first step toward removing the economic barrier to education by providing 25,000 college scholarships a year to needy and qualified students. It was a last-minute report under the auspices of the former Eisenhower Administration.

The consultants, who met during the past year at the request of former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Arthur S. Flemming, urged a five-year extension and wide expansion of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. That law expires June 30, 1962.

The group's recommendations supported the education resolution adopted at the 1959 AFL-CIO convention in San Francisco noting the waste of "America's most precious asset—its young people" in that 50,000 to 100,000 qualified young people each year simply could not afford to go to college. A range of other needs also was cited.

John E. Cosgrove, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education and one of the 20 consultants, strongly supported the group's recommendations.

Vocational Provision Criticized

Cosgrove dissented only in urging a specific removal by Congress of the language in Area Vocational Education Programs which limits the use of funds to training for "highly skilled technicians." The consultants recommended "a broader definition."

Where the group urged the Federal Communications Commission to continue to reserve television channels until the educational effectiveness of the medium could be further tested, Cosgrove said sufficient channels should be reserved to provide the opportunity for broad expansion of educational TV.

The consultants' report, issued for the attention of the executive and legislative branches, professed a basic belief that "the federal government has an obligation to help identify and bring to fruition the full potential of every youth."

Failure to do so, the report said, will imperil the individual, the nation and the free world.

The group urged a scholarship program financed by an initial $25 million and rising to $100 million in four years. It said grants of up to $1,000 should be based on "merit and need" and proposed an extra $500 to such student's school.

The consultants' group included Harvard University Pres.-emeritus James B. Conant, New York State Education Commissioner James E. Allen, Jr., Brandeis University Pres. A. L. Sachar and Princeton University Faculty Dean J. Douglas Brown. A sharp dissent by Illinois University History Prof. Arthur Bestor urged a more selective channeling of aid into "solid learning."

Voting Highest in Idaho, Lowest in Mississippi

More than 80.7 percent of Idaho's voting-age population cast ballots in the 1960 presidential election, the best record of any state, the American Heritage Foundation has announced. Mississippi, where only 25.6 percent of the potential voters went to the polls, had the nation's poorest record.

Idaho has one of the most liberal registration laws of any state, the non-partisan good citizenship organization noted. Mississippi has one of the most restrictive.

In Idaho, there is permanent registration and new voters are allowed to register up to three days before an election. Only six months residence in the state and 30 days in the county are required. There is no precinct residence requirement and absentee voters may register by mail.

By contrast, Mississippi voters must pay a poll tax—and pay it more than nine months before an election. Voters must have resided two years in the state and one year in the election district. Absentee balloting is not permitted for civilians. Beyond these legal handicaps, of course, are the added barriers thrown up that prevent Negroes from voting.

While the national average of voting participation last year was 64.3 percent, nine states—all in the South—had less than 50 percent.

These included, the Heritage Foundation noted, all five states which impose a poll tax—Alabama, Arkansas, Texas and Virginia, in addition to Mississippi. Alabama and South Carolina also require two years of residence and, along with Louisiana, do not permit absentee civilians to vote by mail. The American Heritage Foundation commented: "These states have a high illiteracy rate, but they also have the most formidable literacy tests."

Thirteen states in addition to Idaho had a voting participation score above 75 percent. In descending order, they are New Hampshire, Utah, North Dakota, South Dakota, West Virginia, Minnesota, Connecticut, Indiana, Massachusetts, Iowa, Illinois, Rhode Island and Wyoming.

New York Phone Runoff Vote Due

New York—The Communications Workers will seek again to win bargaining rights for 18,137 plant workers of the New York Telephone Co. in a National Labor Relations Board runoff election within about 30 days.

In an inconclusive election among linemen, cable splicers and other "downstate" plant employes, the result was United Telephone Organizations, unaffiliated, 6,396; CWA 5,684; Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers 2,142; no union 125.

CWA and IBEW both showed a sizeable increase in support since an election in the same unit 14 months ago, when the unaffiliated organization got 10,558 votes. The company is part of the Bell System.

On Away-from-Home Expenses:

Rail Worker Wins Tax Deduction Case

New Orleans—The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has handed down a ruling here that may lead to some liberalization by the Internal Revenue Service of its strict limitation on the right of employes to deduct "away-from-home" expenses from their income tax returns.

The court held that a railroad conductor was entitled to deduct expenses incurred for meals and for renting a hotel room during a six-hour daylight layover at one end of his regular route.

In handing down its ruling, the court rejected the IRS contention that the expense should be disallowed because the conductor was not away from home overnight.

"The 'overnight' gloss was dreamed up" by the IRS, the court declared, adding that "there is nothing in the statute indicating any congressional intent that 'away from home' means either overnight or away from home for a period substantially longer than an ordinary working day."

Confined to Specific Case

The court ruling was confined to the specific case of the conductor, and pointed out that there were "innumerable borderline situations" that could not be measured by any "rule of thumb." In the case of the conductor, it said, the fact that he held a responsibility for the safety of passengers or that he could lose his job if he fell asleep meant that rest on his layover was proper and necessary.

In overruling a lower court, which earlier had upheld the IRS in disallowing the tax deduction, the appellate court spelled out what it called "the correct rule" for allowable deductions in such a circumstance, declaring:

"If the nature of the taxpayer's employment is such that when away from home, during released time, it is reasonable for him to need and to obtain sleep or rest in order to meet the exigencies of his employment or the business demands of his employment, his expenditures (including incidental expenses, such as tips) for the purpose of obtaining sleep or rest are deductible traveling expenses. . . ."

Ore Freighter Local Joins Steelworkers

Cleveland—Members of the unaffiliated Lake Sailors Union have voted in a secret mail referendum to affiliate with the Steelworkers, and have received a charter as USWA Local 7000.

World of Style Hails ILGWU Fashion Film

New York—Union label clothes, in color with sound, were the "stars" of a new film shown by the Ladies' Garment Workers here to 200 fashion editors from all 50 states and Canada, Nassau, England, Belgium, Holland and the Scandinavian nations.

The fashion reporters were guests of the ILGWU Union Label Dept. at a reception in the Hotel Pierre during the fashion industry's National Press Week.

The film was the second produced by the union for showing on television and to selected groups in unions and other organizations. Dealing with fall and winter fashions for 1960-61, it is a 16-mm sound film requiring 28.5 minutes to show.

Julius Hochman, ILGWU vice president and director of its Union Label Dept., met with the visiting writers before the showing.

The movie takes viewers into a union factory to show cutting, patternmaking, dressmaking and other steps in the production of children's wear, sports clothing, evening wear, daytime dresses, coats and suits.

Audience reaction has been so favorable, Hochman said, that the union has authorized the production of a third film showing spring and summer fashions for 1961.

Films for showing may be secured without charge from the ILGWU Union Label Dept., 1710 Broadway, New York 19.

Present were Esther Robinson, center left, the fund's office manager, and Bea Richer, secretary-treasurer of the local union. The RCIA Health and Welfare Fund is associated with the Union Labor Life Insurance Co.

$200,000 Campaign Fund Voted:

Ohio Labor to Publicize Political Facts on Jobless Pay

Columbus, O.—One thousand delegates to an Ohio AFL-CIO legislative conference here, accusing Republican leaders in the legislature of "indifference" to the state's critical unemployment crisis, have launched a drive to raise $200,000 for a statewide publicity campaign "to bring the facts to the voters."

The campaign will tell—through radio and television programs and newspaper advertisements—of employer-backed efforts to re-impose harsh disqualification provisions which were stripped from the jobless compensation law by the previous Democratic-controlled legislature.

It will describe the "delaying tactics" of prolonged hearings being held by the GOP-controlled House Industry & Labor Committee. And it will indict the "means test" which the Republican leadership is supporting as part of any extension of benefits.

To finance the campaign, the State AFL-CIO has asked its affiliates to contribute 25 cents per member. The program was recommended by the state body's executive board.

Ohio AFL-CIO Pres. Phil Hannah accused the Republican leadership of taking a "calloused position" on the state's heavy and growing unemployment and condemned the GOP decision to conduct further hearings.

"There are unemployed Republicans too," he said. "People can't eat hearings."

State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Elmer F. Cope told the delegates that Republican leaders are "listening to and implementing the will of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce and the Ohio Manufacturers Association."

He attacked the refusal of the GOP legislature to consider unemployment compensation extension as an emergency measure, which would enable it to be put into effect immediately instead of the normal 90 days after a bill is signed by the governor. He challenged also the GOP leadership's proposed denial of an additional 13 weeks of benefits to persons who have already exhausted their regular benefits.

The AFL-CIO supported bill which has been introduced would extend maximum benefits on a permanent basis to 39 weeks and would add an additional 13 weeks of benefits for those who have already used up their present 26-week maximum.

Mass Rally Set

Delegates to the legislative conference also approved a plan for a mass unemployment rally in Columbus and proposals for delegations from all sections of the state to visit the capital and contact their legislators.

State Sen. Leo Dugan (D), who is also executive secretary of the Akron AFL-CIO, told the conference that the legislature would be better advised to "study relief lines and unemployment lines" than to "study" the problem in prolonged committee hearings.

Bargaining Vote Backed By New York Teachers

New York—An April date for a collective bargaining election among 40,000 teachers in Greater New York's 856 public schools is the goal of the Teachers' local here under the terms of a proposal by a committee of three prominent union officials named by Mayor Robert F. Wagner after a brief strike last Nov. 7.

The committee made five recommendations for restoring peace to the classrooms. One was for a bargaining election before the end of this school year.

The Board of Education has not yet acted on the committee recommendations. The Teachers voted to approve them, and School Supt. John J. Theobald said he would ask the board to put them into effect and Mayor Wagner to provide the needed funds.

"We want an election in April," said UFT Pres. Charles Cogen and Deputy Pres. Samuel Hochberg. "We hope to win with the support of other classroom teachers."

The UFT walked out Nov. 7 and returned Nov. 9 when assured that members' grievances would be discussed and no reprisals made. A three-man committee consisting of Pres. David Dubinsky, Ladies' Garment Workers; Pres. Jacob Potofsky, Clothing Workers; and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, recommended these steps to preserve peace:

- The Board of Education should call for a bargaining election before the end of the present school term, and name a committee of five prominent citizens to set up rules for conducting the election. Former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell has been suggested as committee chairman.
- Principles should be approved to provide for equalized salary increases and a basic salary schedule of $5,000 to $10,000 a year instead of the present $4,800-$8,300 schedule.
- Substitute teachers should be entitled as of Feb. 1, 1961, to three days of paid sick leave a year. Two days of additional leave should be added to the substitutes' reserve so that by Sept. 1, 1961, they would be entitled to 10 full days of sick leave. At present they have no sick leave.
- Every elementary school teacher should have a full duty-free lunch hour every school day, and additional lunchroom aides should be named to free teachers during their lunch period.
- A Board of Education subcommittee should report on a union dues checkoff proposal.

Strike-Born Portland Paper To Print Daily

Portland, Ore. — The Portland Reporter, born of the 15-month-old newspaper strike against the Oregonian and Oregon Journal, has announced that it will begin daily publication this month.

The Reporter has been publishing twice weekly in its plant in northwest Portland for several months.

Publisher Robert D. Webb said the tabloid newspaper probably will commence full-scale daily operation Feb. 11, the anniversary of its first issue.

The Reporter has signed a contract with the Associated Press. The contract makes the Reporter an associate member of AP and provides the paper with AP's state, national, and international news coverage and sports reporting. It also makes available the worldwide photographic coverage of AP wire photo.

IWA Proposes 4-State Pact to Aid Economy

Portland, Ore.—The Woodworkers have proposed that four Pacific Coast and Northwest states take immediate action to help alleviate economic distress and push toward state and regional economic planning and development.

"Most states have not even clearly recognized their responsibilities for overall economic planning and development, let alone consciously accepting these responsibilities," the union declared.

The Woodworkers' long-range plan proposed that Washington, Oregon, Idaho and California each establish a state planning and development authority and later form a northwest regional planning association.

The union sent copies of its plan to Gov. Albert D. Rosellini (D-Wash.), Gov. Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.), Gov. Robert E. Smylie (R-Ida.) and Gov. Edmund (Pat) Brown (D-Calif.) as well as to congressional representatives of the various states.

The IWA observed that unemployment in the Pacific Northwest was running ahead of the national figures and urged immediate state action to improve unemployment compensation; raise minimum wages toward a goal of $1.25 an hour; undertake housing and school construction programs; develop natural resources and public works and aid in industrial development.

The plan also called for action by Congress in the minimum wage and jobless compensation fields as well as others.

In turning to its long-range plan, the IWA recalled that the 1960 presidential campaign put forward the idea of national economic growth. State governments have been neglecting their own responsibilities in this respect, the union asserted.

In the Pacific Northwest, it said, some industries are operating under capacity and some areas are heavily dependent on a single industry or a single company. When the dominant industry or company has trouble, the union said, the entire locality becomes a distressed area.

"What is needed is a broad program of promoting economic growth and development, sponsored by public authority," the IWA declared in proposing its state and regional planning structure.

Defer Rail Crew Bill, New York Labor Asks

New York—The State AFL-CIO has asked the New York Legislature and Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) to defer action on legislation aimed at changing the state's "full-crew" law for railroads until after the Presidential Commission on railroad work rules completes its study.

Union, Management Join In Chef-Training Plan

The world's largest union of cooks and other hotel and restaurant workers has joined food management in launching a long-range program for the training of skilled professional chefs as teachers of culinary skills.

The executive board of the Hotel and Restaurant Employes voted to contribute $20,000 to the Culinary Institute of America, New Haven, Conn., toward support of the teacher training project. The money will be matched by the Statler Foundation, with other hotel and restaurant groups adding to the fund.

The union's board met at Las Vegas, Nev., which has the highest ratio of members to population of any city on the continent. With 7,000 members in a city of 64,405 the union boasts that better than one resident out of 10 belongs to its two Las Vegas locals.

During its week-long meeting the union also:

- Elected Paul P. McCastland, Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., as vice president for the 4th District, comprising the Deep South.
- Voted to send Vice Pres. Richard Smith on a mission to the "tent city" in Fayette County, Tenn., with a gift of $1,500 for relief of tenant farm families evicted for exercising their right to register as voters.
- Made a grant of $35,000 to Histadrut toward completion of the Ed S. Miller Youth Center, now under construction in the Hatikvah section of Tel Aviv. Miller is the union's president.
- Completed plans for the culinary union's 70th anniversary convention, to begin Mar. 13 in Philadelphia.
- Heard a report from Director of Organization Charles A. Paulsen concerning southern organizing successes in the wake of the long struggle to organize Miami Beach. The union now has 27 local unions in its southern region. In 1955, before the "Battle of the Beach," there were fewer than 10.

The Culinary Institute of America occupies a campus adjacent to Yale University where young men are taught commercial cooking skills, and where professional cooks go for advanced courses in haute cuisine.

In an appearance before the union's board, Mrs. Frances Roth, founder and director of the school, said the average age of European-trained chefs in this country is 63. She outlined plans for a four-year plan of developing texts, curricula and teaching methods in order that "we won't lose the educated palates so essential to really good cuisine."

McCastland, the union's new vice president, has been secretary of Local 339, Ft. Lauderdale, for the past 10 years.

Vagnozzi New Editor Of Michigan Paper

Detroit—Aldo Vagnozzi, assistant editor of the Michigan AFL-CIO News, has been named editor to replace Thaddeus (Ted) Ogar, who has gone on a leave of absence to serve as press secretary to Gov. John Swainson.

Vagnozzi, who has been a member of the publication's staff for more than 12 years, has been active as a Democrat and in community work. He will be succeeded by Mrs. Frances D'Hondt a vice president of the Newspaper Guild and treasurer of the Detroit Guild, who was a staff member of the Detroit Times until it was folded recently.

UAW Urges Jobless Aid Conferences

The Auto Workers executive board has called for a series of regional "Get America Back to Work" conferences in areas of serious unemployment to impress upon Congress the need for immediate action on the Administration's program.

The UAW board said the regional meetings should be preparatory to and lay the groundwork for a broad national conference to fight joblessness. The union called on the AFL-CIO to organize the conferences.

Noting that the Kennedy Administration has "indicated its determination" to restore full production and full employment, the board declared the opposition of the conservative Republican-Dixiecrat coalition was the real problem.

The UAW resolution urged the participants in such conferences to support a series of specific measures to combat unemployment, including the establishment of federal minimum standards on unemployment compensation, standby powers for a moratorium on collection of federal withholding taxes and an increase in the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour.

Realities in Washington

THE DEFEAT of the Republican-Dixiecrat coalition in the fight to enlarge the House Rules Committee has cleared the way for consideration of the Kennedy Administration's legislative program. This is the immediate and the most important result of the bitter contest in the House.

But there is a sharp difference between clearing the way for consideration of the Administration's program for combatting the recession and strengthening the nation's leadership of the free world and actual passage of legislation making the program a reality. This will be the next battle, or series of battles, in the House and Senate.

A reading of the 217-to-212 vote to enlarge the Rules Committee reveals the strength and tenacity of the conservative coalition. In face of severe pressures the coalition rolled up 212 votes—only six short of an absolute majority of the House.

The strength of the coalition on actual legislation is not likely to wane, whereas a number of congressmen who went along with Speaker Sam Rayburn on the specific issue may be tempted to shift on basic economic and welfare issues.

Besides establishing the basic procedural policies for the 87th Congress, the rules vote had some important political effects. It revealed, perhaps more dramatically than ever before, that party tags have only a relative value; that 64 southern and border Democrats have no commitment to the Kennedy program; that there are only a few Republicans who feel strongly enough about the critical problems facing the nation to help defeat a procedural blockade.

The vote reveals also the extent to which the conservative southern Democrats who voted against Rayburn and Kennedy identify themselves with the policies of the conservative Republicans and the links between the dominant forces in the Republican Party in Congress and the throw-back thinking of the Dixiecrats.

The exposure of the coalition on this critical vote—a vote that can only be measured in terms of being for or against democratic procedures—is an important step toward understanding the political realities that shape legislative decisions in Washington.

Repudiating the Drift

PRES. KENNEDY struck a mighty blow in his State of the Union speech at the drift, indecision and self-deception that have characterized the past few years.

In clear and sharp language he gave the American people a painfully honest picture of the state of America and the state of the world.

Emerging clearly from his message was the fact that both the nation and the world are in trouble—a dangerous recession at home and a growing Communist threat to peace and freedom around the globe.

Kennedy's message is a necessary shock therapy for a nation which has indulged itself in a "breathing spell" and brushed too many problems under the rug.

For the past few years the constant refrain of "everything's going to be all right" has lulled the nation into a false security as it contemplated its affluence. Now it's time to wake up and face the urgencies of our problems.

Until America awakens to the state of affairs of the nation and the world, there can be no meaningful solutions despite the myriad of programs and solutions. The recession won't go away nor the Communist threat abate until the American people are first of all convinced of their existence.

Can't Seem to Get Ahead

University Analysis Is Critical:

CofC Charged With Fostering Class Conflict and Disunity

The following is excerpted from the "Labor-Management Panel," published by the Labor-Management School of the University of San Francisco:

THE LABOR RELATIONS LETTER, published by the Labor Relations and Legal Department of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, for December 1960, offers a prime example of a highly partisan press fostering class conflict, causing industrial unrest and dividing America, when we need our greatest unity to meet our commitments at home and abroad. It is disheartening to find such a publication being issued by the highly respectable Chamber—dedicated, as it is, to advancing the economic growth of this country.

The Labor Relations Letter is a four-page sheet. . . . This letter would be expected to make constructive suggestions to its readers on collective bargaining issues; to give a running commentary on court decisions and National Labor Relations Board rulings; and to keep us advised on improved techniques for the daily administration of the bargaining agreement. Many other worthwhile projects could be suggested, but the above are sufficient to indicate the proper use of such a letter.

However, let us look at the December 1960 issue. On page one, column one, under the caption "Unions Push Bill In States To Curb Strike Replacements," the following terminology is found: "AFL-CIO trust . . . union racket . . . blackmail picketing" . . . and the sixth paragraph begins: "There is also no provision to prohibit union officials from importing goons and hoodlums to cause violence and intimidate employes who want to work."

It must be admitted that all unions are not clean, but the clear implication of this article is to incite a feeling of revulsion against the very idea of unionism. It is clearly inflammatory writing and certainly not calculated to clear and calm thinking.

On page 2, column one, under the heading "Right To Work Issue Aids Conservative Candidates" the first sentence reads: "Union officials who fear voluntary unionism were taught a freedom lesson in the state election campaigns." There is an implication that it is management's duty to teach 'freedom' and that unless this is done, union officials will destroy freedom.

ELSEWHERE there are references to "neutral employes" and "neutral employers." It would not do to call them non-union employes and employers because this would give the impression that the editorial policy was anti-union. They are neutral in the sense that they are not against unions as long as they don't exist.

This euphemism, while seemingly harmless, projects the image that the union is hopelessly involved in disturbing the peace.

Another three or four columns of the eight-column sheet is devoted to such headlines as "Plumbers Locals Charged With Rigged Election and Extortion . . . U.S. Court Upholds Extortion Conviction . . . Reign Of Terror In Kentucky Proves Costly To Mine Union . . . U.S. Indicts Kentucky Teamsters . . . AFL-CIO Veep Guilty Of Bribery . . . Other Unionists Paroled Or Jailed . . . Union Ethics Committee Is Silent . . . UAW Slugger Wins Parole . . . Textile Union Boss Enters Prison." It seems as though the editors of the Labor Relations Letter went considerably out of their way to make these items known to its readers, although they were previously reported in the daily press in greater detail. Just what good is achieved by this editorial policy is difficult to comprehend. Is this a part of our national purpose? Is this the way to achieve the national goals as suggested by the committee appointed by the [recent] President of the United States?

MANAGEMENT HAS COMPLAINED from time to time of the class divisive writing found in some of the union papers and it is really saddening to find at this late date the same type of writing in a publication sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. There are still a few union publications that resort to the same type of vilification of the employers, but, for the most part, they are now concerning themselves with the political, economic and social issues of the day.

The official AFL-CIO News of December 17, 1960, a 12-page tabloid, contains only one item similar to those carried in Labor Relations Letter, i.e., on price fixing charges "Electrical Giants Enter Guilty Pleas." If the editors of the News had scoured the newspapers of the country they could have found many cases where management people were found guilty of embezzlement, theft, etc., to fill the pages of their tabloid. To their credit they elected not to do it.

Morgan Says:

Kennedy Breaks Down Apathy But Needs Public's Support

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

NOW THAT the Kennedy Administration has won its first important victory on Capitol Hill, the President's State of the Union message immediately takes on more meaning. It would have been an empty instrument indeed if the House Rules Committee bottleneck had remained unbroken. The key elements of his program could have been stoppered up and never reached the floor. But with the narrow defeat of the powerful right-wing-Republican-Southern-Democrat coalition, Mr. Kennedy's words of yesterday at least have a chance of becoming the deeds of tomorrow.

Morgan

Despite the felicitous setback of the conservative bloc, however, by the enlargement of the Rules Committee from 12 to 15 members, the flow of new legislation will not be swift or smooth. It still will be squeezed in a deep, narrow division in Congress between the activists and the do-littles.

How accurately does this split reflect the mood of the country? My guess is that the image is a fairly faithful one; a projection of the division described by the narrowness of President Kennedy's own victory in the November election. If this is so, he has a hard and heavy fight on his hands to carry the country with him to his new but not necessarily lavishly upholstered frontier.

Yet he walks with the wind of urgency at his heels and he talks with the tempo of a man who has his eye on the clock. This brisk air of aggressiveness and purposeful impatience seems to have activated a magnetic field of excitement among a growing segment of the population.

People visiting from out of town smell the ozone of crackling activity and are stimulated by it, though the more cautious of them remember to raise doubts and reservations until the shape and direction of things to be accomplished can be fixed more clearly. People calling from out of town almost invariably ask before the telephone conversation is finished and with more expectancy than alarm, "what's going on down there in Washington?"

THE ANSWER, I think, is an enormous infusion of energy in a world capital grown somewhat sluggish on a diet of the platitudes of complacency. Observing from a distance the hubbub of the transition from the old administration to the young new one, a New Yorker remarked he thought it was a measure of the country's strength to have survived eight years of such executive inactivity. Historians may find that too harsh an indictment of the Eisenhower years but for the moment it is not unseemly to dwell hopefully on the way things are popping all over town.

The mood of the victorious Republicans in 1953 seemed to be more of immediate vengeance than of candid, careful long-viewing. The tone of Mr. Kennedy's first message to Congress yesterday struck me with what I can only call its tingling gravity. Without belaboring the past in recrimination, he pushed us from the steam room into the cold shower. There is something about such an experience that is bracing, once you get your breath back, and the brisk rub of the towel brings out a certain glow of confidence you didn't know was there.

I suspect this was the kind of mood the president was trying to establish and encourage when he spoke in one short sentence of the "hour of national peril and national opportunity"; when he mentioned that the American economy is in trouble; that our problems around the world are staggering, with crises multiplying every day, but that "we have no greater asset than the willingness of a free and determined people, through its elected officials, to face all problems frankly and meet all dangers free from panic or fear."

The key, I suppose, lies in the strength of our determination. There is no guarantee that the Kennedy leadership won't make mistakes. But even if it were infallible it couldn't cut the mustard alone. He needs public response, not uncritical but not unwilling. As an overworked speech writer might put it, the time for talking is running out and the time for doing is at hand.

Much of the opposition to removal of the Rules Committee roadblock came from non-doers, selfish lobbies that wanted things to jostle along as they were. Such outfits as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Medical Association, the real estate lobby, unreconstructed segregationists and others reportedly besieged congressmen with pressures and even threatening arguments to stand with the status quo on the Rules Committee which in the past had strangled or grievously delayed measures dealing with the housing problem, the education problem, old age medical care, civil rights and other important items.

But the status quo was not enough either in fact or in spirit. The victory in the House against obstructionism was heartening but small. It will grow large only as we the public stand up to be counted with determination to make it grow.

by Willard Shelton

ONE OF THE UNHAPPIEST legacies of the Eisenhower years is the state in which he left his own Republican Party.

As the GOP congressional leaders have heard the first messages and proposals of the Kennedy Administration, they have reverted to the bad habit that became engrained in the Roosevelt-Truman years—the habit of blind opposition.

Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.), the House Republican leader, growled that he couldn't accept as valid the "inherited problems" the President "claims" he has. Sen. Norris Cotton (N. H.) worried about what he called "a whole galaxy of spending programs." Sen. Styles Bridges (N. H.), the senior Republican, said the Kennedy estimate of the state of the nation and the world led into "disillusionment." Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), the Senate GOP leader, forced a two-week delay in the Douglas area redevelopment bill by demanding testimony from Administration subordinates who obviously will support the President's programs.

It was the theory of some who supported Mr. Eisenhower in 1952 that for the sake of the two-party system it was time to throw the Democrats out.

They said that 20 years outside the White House had trapped the Republicans into opposition for the sake of opposition and that it was time for the GOP to learn again the problems of affirmative responsibility.

There was some force to this argument. But to transform and recreate a political party, the example of affirmative responsibility must be set by executive action, and in this Mr. Eisenhower contributed less than he might have done.

IN THE FOREIGN policy field, his contribution was significant. He learned to put more emphasis on economic aid as a necessary part of our relations with other nations. He held firmly to the system of alliances needed to defend the Western world militarily.

But on domestic policy, he himself drifted steadily into constantly more conservative positions, as if he accepted the orthodox Republican doctrine that the New Deal and Fair Deal reforms, generally speaking, had threateningly undermined our national character, and that we dared not use the federal government to promote the general welfare.

He moved steadily to the right—far to the right of the late Sen. Robert A. Taft. The absence of a liberalizing influence and guidance is now revealed in the Halleck-Dirksen-Bridges-Barry Goldwater image that is stamped on the GOP in Congress.

THE NATION and the world seen by the young Pres. Kennedy are obviously different from those Mr. Eisenhower saw.

The former President looked at 60 million workers with jobs; Mr. Kennedy sees 5.4 million without jobs, hundreds of thousands with exhausted insurance benefits and with no prospects, and thinks that decency and common sense require that something be done.

Mr. Eisenhower saw his Administration as having carried America "to unprecedented heights." He saw our economy as basically in wonderful condition, with recent downturns as "moderate and of short duration."

Pres. Kennedy sees the "tide" as running against us in many crisis areas of world affairs and warns solemnly that "time has not been our friend." He warns that in our generation we may again have to prove whether a nation organized and governed as ours "can endure."

The Halleck-Dirksen Republicans obviously are prepared to resist this view, to slow down, delay and modify legislative proposals and social reforms, to treat grim warnings on foreign dangers as mere partisanship. They showed in the House fight on the rules that the GOP liberal wing is small and insecure. There is an undeniable reversion to the habit of resistance, and no doubt the conservatives may often work their will.

Mr. Kennedy's remedy is to go over their heads to the people—and already he is directing his appeal.

Washington Reports:

Flood, Van Zandt Stress Need For Area Redevelopment Bill

AREA REDEVELOPMENT legislation is only one way of restoring economic health to the nation, but it is one of the most urgent items on the agenda of the current Congress, Republican and Democratic members of the House agreed in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

Rep. Daniel J. Flood (D-Pa.) declared that the public should know "the area redevelopment program is not a giveaway. The people who will benefit don't want doles or handouts. This bill will help these people help themselves. It will set up a loan program."

He emphasized that federal loans are necessary because, as an example, his area has "exhausted its risk capital. We need loans at low interest rates on long terms to build factories and give jobs to men who want to work."

Rep. James E. Van Zandt (R-Pa.) pointed out that the aid would only go to areas where unemployment has been high over a long period of time. He said that there are now 174 areas in the country suffering from a labor surplus, and 51 of these where unemployment has been chronic. These are located in 30 states. Unemployment in his district and Flood's is about 13 percent, they reported.

"Anyone who doubts the need for area redevelopment," he said, "should visit these communities. There they would find good Americans who have made their contributions to building the community, the state and the nation. Today they are unemployed. And they are entitled to the assistance of the federal government so that the economy of their communities can be rehabilitated and they can get jobs."

FLOOD SAID that Pres. Kennedy's Executive Order No. 1, providing that the food of America's needy be increased and improved out of surplus food stocks, has been a great aid in his district. Forty thousand people in his district, he reported, "supplement or in some cases exist entirely on surplus food supplied by the government."

Van Zandt added, "In addition to the unemployed, we have a lot of people living on small retirement checks who also are eligible for surplus food. And in my three-county area, persons who have lost their unemployment insurance also must look to surplus commodities."

"It's now zero weather and the jobless, women and children are standing in line all over these areas to get food," Flood said.

If the House passed the bill, he said, it should be signed and become law by Easter.

REP. DANIEL J. FLOOD (D-Pa.), left, predicted that an area redevelopment bill, if passed by the House, will become law by Easter, as he was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public relations radio program. Rep. James E. Van Zandt (R-Pa.) said on the same program that the legislation is urgently needed.

How to Buy:

Skim Milk and Vitamin Tablets Called Equal of Liquid Diet Fad

By Sidney Margolius

ALREADY THERE ARE over 75 different brands of measured-calorie, liquid-diet preparations on the market. They sell for anywhere from 89 cents to $1.59 for a day's supply. You can buy either a powder to be mixed with water, or a liquid. They're being sold by drug stores, supermarkets, department stores and discount houses. New brands are coming on the market every week.

Advertising Age, trade magazine, estimates that about $20 million a year is being spent to advertise the liquid-diet products. Liquid diets are not the only current popular food fad. Honey-and-vinegar is another. But business experts consider the liquid diets the hottest promotional item since chlorophyl. (Remember that?)

In this latest diet fad, food and drug manufacturers have struck it really rich. In less than a year the price of shares in the Mead Johnson Co., who first introduced the liquid diet, jumped from $60 to $164 as speculators raced to get on the profit bandwagon.

In case you've been in hiding from advertisers and sellers, the liquid diets provide a pre-measured intake of 900 calories a day if you drink one glass of the preparation in place of each of your regular meals, plus a glass at bedtime. The sellers claim that this is "weight control made easy and pleasant."

THE BASIC INGREDIENTS of the liquid diets is skim milk plus, in various cases, soya flour, some whole milk, yeast and a few other food ingredients, plus sweeteners, flavoring, and enough added vitamins and minerals to provide a sufficient amount of the known vitamins and minerals.

We figure that a day's supply of a typical liquid diet contains about 4 cents worth of vitamins and minerals, plus 20-25 cents of skimmed milk and other ingredients.

For example, you can buy private-brand multi-vitamin capsules for only 3 cents each. They provide almost as much of the same vitamins and minerals as a day's supply of a liquid diet at a typical $1.19. Skim milk, the other major ingredient, is a valuable, high-protein food which is also rich in minerals and B vitamins. A typical measured-calorie diet product provides the equivalent of a double-rich glass of skim milk plus the other ingredients, for each meal. But the whole day's supply of double-rich skim milk can be bought in powder form for about 17 cents.

Even dairymen are protesting that the liquid diets charge excessive prices for what the Eastern Milk Producers Cooperative called "trumped-up" skim milk with a few other ingredients and a vitamin-mineral supplement.

Like all fad foods, the price started at a high $1.59 and is now down to as little as 89 cents in private brands. But before embarking on a cut-rate liquid diet, it would be a money saver, as well as a nutrition and health precaution, to consult a doctor. He can make up a diet of ordinary foods that you can prepare at a cost of 50-60 cents a day. Or if he approves of the liquid diet, as some doctors have, at least you will be taking it under medical supervision. It's best to consult a doctor to make sure you're in good health before going on any diet of less than 1200 calories.

U.S. Agriculture Department nutrition experts advise that the surest and safest way to take off weight, and keep it off, is to plan low-calorie menus based on foods you normally eat. Plenty of variety is important to insure well-balanced nourishment. The fact is, not all the vitamins in food have yet been discovered. Thus it's not entirely safe to rely even on preparations to which all known vitamins have been added.

The trouble with crash diets, say the Government nutritionists, is that people who try them soon return to their old eating habits, and the unwanted pounds soon return too.

Another big food fad currently is honey and vinegar. This is not so much a diet fad as a health fad. This mixture is recommended as a panacea for almost every ailment, in a best-selling book called "Folk Medicine."

Recently the Food & Drug Administration seized 5000 cases of honey-and-vinegar "tonic" called "Honegar" because the advertising for it was based on claims made in this book. Medical spokesman say there is nothing in honey or vinegar to support the claims made by the book for health or curative value, the Cornell University food and nutrition department reports.

The more serious problem is that—as this department has been warning for the past 12 years—many families spend heavy money for self-prescribed food supplements and vitamin products without a medical determination that they need them.

'Briefing Session' TV Series Launched

Production has begun on the first units of "Briefing Session," the new public affairs television program being presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television and Radio Center.

The first of the half-hour series will go on the air in at least 14 cities during the week of Feb. 19. Exact broadcasting schedules will be fixed within a few days.

Both the first and second programs will deal with the domestic economy and the unemployment problem. Details will be given in next week's AFL-CIO News.

"Briefing Session" is a panel show with a unique feature—a five to 10 minute film-and-narration sequence at the beginning which sets the stage for the discussion to follow. Thus neither the viewers nor the panelists come into the subject "cold"; the issues have been clarified and sharpened.

After this opening, conducted by John MacVane, two or more special guests, experts in the subject of the program, exchange views. Edward P. Morgan serves as moderator.

The guest panelists are selected in a way that will insure the presentation of different viewpoints. Their discussion is filmed "live," without editing.

Production of the program is under the direction of the NET and initial broadcasts will be over the 49 affiliated NET stations in 28 states. Thirty-seven of these stations are on channels that can be tuned in on the ordinary home TV sets; the remainder are on ultra-high frequency channels, which require the installation of a low-cost adapter.

The program is also being made available to commercial stations that do not compete directly with NET outlets.

Crowded Schools Shown by Survey

America in the fall of 1960 had 1,868,000 too many school children or, as the U.S. Office of Education put it, "pupils in excess of normal classroom capacity."

The government's report, covering 50 states and the District of Columbia, revealed a worsening school problem. It was a product of education officials under the former Eisenhower Administration which in eight years failed to develop a school aid program that it could push through Congress.

There was a shortage of 142,100 public elementary and secondary school classrooms last fall—an increase of 6,900 over the fall of 1959—the report said. A total of 66,100 more classrooms is needed for excess pupils and 76,000 classrooms are needed to replace unsatisfactory facilities.

The number of pupils in excess of normal classroom capacity rose by 122,000 over 1959 to reach the 1.9 million figure.

The impact of overcrowding on all pupils—since the problem of 45 pupils instead of the desirable 30 embraces the whole class and not merely the 15 excess pupils—was put this way by the Office of Education:

"Overcrowding, of course, affects not only the pupils in excess of normal capacity but also all the other pupils who share the same crowded quarters."

The report said there are some 685,000 pupils in 36 states and the District of Columbia on curtailed or half-day sessions. About half this number, it added, are included in the total of 1.9 million in excess of capacity.

The report pointed out that 69,400 classrooms were completed during the past year, about the same as in 1958-59 but still below the peak of 72,100 completed in 1957-58. Completions include new construction as well as converted classrooms.

Some 17,800 classrooms were abandoned during the 1959-60 school year for such reasons as reorganization and obsolescence.

Meanwhile, the report went on, public school enrollment increased to a record 36.3 million pupils. This was 1.1 million or 3.2 percent greater than a year earlier.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Brainwashed Americans Need Antidote to Do-It-Yourself Bug

By Jane Goodsell

ACCORDING TO STATISTICS (which I am making up as I go along) 87.6 percent of the population don't really want to do-it-themselves, but they've been brainwashed by all those How To and Why Don't You and You, Too, Can articles.

The minute they read a magazine piece titled "Turn Your Basement into a Rumpus Room!" they obediently hurry out to the lumber yard to buy 2 x 4s. They don't even hesitate long enough to ask themselves whether they want a rumpus room.

What this country needs is an antidote to all this do-it-with-your-own-two-hands propaganda. I'll bet there are plenty of people who'd be happy to turn their home repairs over to experts. Or else let the old manse go ahead and fall to pieces.

Before you start converting your basement into a rumpus room, ask yourself a few questions: What do you want a rumpus room for, anyway? You don't look like the rumpus type to me. And where will you keep your old pop bottles and the Christmas tree ornaments and the Halloween costumes and all those jars of pickled peaches, if you don't have a basement?

Are your living room curtains faded and drab? With 60 cents worth of vegetable dye and a few minutes of your spare time, you can transform them into new curtains. And your new curtains will look as though they've been dyed at home for mere pennies.

ARE THERE TREASURES in your attic? An old pickle crock that can be made into a lovely lamp base? A cast-off lamp base that can be converted into an antique pickle crock and planted with ivy? Listen, these things are valuable. You can get a good price for them by placing an ad in the classified section of the newspaper. You're not the only person who read that article about attic treasures, and lots of people are looking for old pickle crocks and broken lamp bases.

Don't think you can build a model airplane just because the instructions state that any six-year-old can do it. There are lots of six-year-olds with time on their hands. Find one, and let him do it.

Freedom of Association Survey:

ILO Soviet Study Omits Vital Facts

The report of the recent Intl. Labor Organization Mission to the Soviet Union to survey freedom of association falls far short of providing a full picture of actual conditions in the USSR, says the AFL-CIO Free Trade Union News.

The monthly publication of the federation's Dept. of Intl. Affairs, analyzing the ILO mission's report, "The Trade Union Situation in the USSR," in its January edition, declares:

"The mission does not answer the questions . . . is there freedom of association in the Soviet Union, as defined by the ILO? Do workers have the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing? And do these organizations have the right to function in freedom?"

The Free Trade Union News declares that while the ILO report generally concludes that the Soviet trade unions are controlled by the Communist Party, that the workers are not free to establish unions of their own free choice and that the right to strike is not guaranteed, the report nevertheless declares that the Soviet trade unions enjoy "considerable power and influence."

No Freedom

The publication says, "In our view the Soviet trade unions have power and influence only to the extent that they are, first of all, auxiliaries of the all-powerful, all-prevalent Communist Party and, secondly, insofar as they are government agencies. . . . We have formed our own judgment. There is no trade union freedom in the USSR. Independent and democratic trade unions do not exist in the Soviet Union."

The publication contrasts the ILO mission that visited the United States last year to conduct a similar freedom of association survey and the USSR mission. The mission visiting the U.S. was "entirely free to go wherever it wanted and to talk to anyone it pleased (and) was not accompanied on its journeys by any representative of the government, of the trade unions or of the employers."

The USSR mission was worked out in agreement with the officials of the State Labor and Wages Committee of the Council of Ministers of the USSR and throughout its tour the mission "was accompanied by a representative of this committee and a representative of the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions."

Right to Strike Seen Test

A decisive test of whether free trade unions exist in a given country, the Free Trade Union News declares, is the right to strike. The publication notes that the ILO mission report "does not give an unequivocal answer," declaring that Soviet labor legislation does not contain any specific reference to strikes or collective stoppages of work and according to the mission "the legal situation is therefore not clear." The mission was sent to the USSR to determine the actual facts on whether workers can withhold their labor, the AFL-CIO publication notes. Soviet labor legislation is available in Geneva.

The Free Trade Union News charges that the "very heart of free collective bargaining: wage determination," is not found in the USSR, that "wages are fixed not by collective agreement but by law within the framework of the national economic plan."

The ILO report, the Free Trade Union News says, correctly states that "it is only possible to understand the part actually played by the trade unions under the Soviet system if the relations between the unions and the Communist Party are borne in mind," citing the preamble to the Rules of the Trade Unions of the USSR adopted in March 1959.

The ILO report adds "the Soviet trade unions conduct all their activities under the guidance of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the organizing and directing force of Soviet society."

It further states that "links between the trade unions and political party are not peculiar to the Soviet system," and in effect compares the links between party and unions in the USSR with parties and unions in other countries. The AFL-CIO publication comments: "Apparently the authors do not see any difference between, let us say, the relations between the Trades Union Congress and the Labor Party (Britain) on the one hand and Soviet trade unions and the Communist Party on the other hand. . . . Actually the relations between the Soviet trade unions and the Communist Party are comparable only to those under a Fascist regime—in Mussolini Italy, in Nazi Germany, in Franco Spain."

New Pamphlet Tells Arabs of Bias in USSR

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs has prepared a new Arabic-language pamphlet containing a strong indictment of the Soviet Union's policies of racial discrimination.

In an introduction to the pamphlet, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declares that the declaration by the Executive Council of the African Students' Union in the USSR—the text of the publication—"makes a factual exposure and forceful indictment" of discrimination in the Soviet "paradise."

"The African students in the USSR," Meany writes, "have rendered inestimable service to the worldwide fight against racialism by their timely marshalling of the unchallengeable facts regarding the extent and virulence of racialism in the USSR."

Citing the continuing progress being made in the United States against racialism, Meany declares "wherever there is total monopoly of power, there is despotism. Monopoly of power, whether it is rooted in political, racial, economic or class soil, is the deadly enemy of all human dignity and freedom."

Estep New Editor Of United Paper

Albany, N.Y.—Richard A. Estep, a veteran of 20 years in the labor press field in the Midwest, has been appointed director of publications for the Papermakers & Paperworkers and editor of the union's monthly newspaper, United Paper.

One of the organizers of the American Newspaper Guild at the Peoria, Ill., Transcript in the late 30's, he subsequently helped found the Peoria Labor Temple News, eventually becoming owner and publisher of that paper.

Estep is a vice president of the Intl. Labor Press Association. He was the unsuccessful Democratic candidate for Congress from the 18th District in Illinois last November.

SPEEDY APPROVAL of three key appointees in the Labor Dept. has been voted by the Senate. Shown at Labor Committee hearings which preceded their approval are, left to right, Under Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Women's Bureau Dir. Esther Peterson, also designated as assistant to Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg; and Assistant Sec. Jerry Holleman.

Kennedy Fills Key Jobs At Sub-Cabinet Level

Pres. John F. Kennedy continued to build his Administration's official family with a series of appointments to key posts of sub-Cabinet rank.

As the President moved ahead with the major task of rounding out the top echelon of the Executive Branch, Senate committees and the full Senate were busy voting swift approval of presidential appointments previously submitted by the White House.

Heading the list of Kennedy appointments were selections for the critical foreign affairs field. They included:

- Thomas K. Finletter, 67, former Air Force Secretary in the Truman Administration, as ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.
- Edward R. Murrow, 52, noted radio and television commentator, as director of the U.S. Information Agency.
- Donald M. Wilson, former chief Washington correspondent for Life magazine, as USIA deputy director.
- Roger W. Tubby, 51, White House press secretary in the Truman Administration, as Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs.
- Carl T. Rowan, 35, a reporter on the Minneapolis Star-Tribune, as Tubby's deputy.
- Francis T. P. Plimpton, New York lawyer, as deputy to United Nations Ambassador Adlai Stevenson.

Kennan Envoy to Yugoslavia

- George F. Kennan, former ambassador to Moscow, as ambassador to Yugoslavia.
- Henry R. Labouisse, 56, a consultant to the Intl. Bank, to be director of the Intl. Cooperation Administration.
- James Harlan Cleveland, dean of the school of public affairs at Syracuse University, as Assistant Secretary of State for Intl. Organizations Affairs.
- William J. Crockett, 46, of Cimarron, Kan., a foreign service officer, as Assistant Secretary of State for Administration.
- George Crews McGhee, a consultant to the National Security Council, as Assistant Secretary of State for Policy Planning.
- Harold F. Linder, 60, a corporation executive, as president and chairman of the Export-Import Bank.
- Frank M. Coffin, former Democratic representative from Maine, as director of the Development Loan Fund.

For his own White House staff, Kennedy named Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., Harvard history professor, as a special assistant; Carmine Bellino, a former member of the McClellan special Senate committee staff, as a special consultant to the President and to Director David Bell of the Budget Bureau; and Frank D. Reeves, Democratic national committeeman from the District of Columbia, as a special White House assistant.

In the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare he named Dr. Sterling McMurrin, vice president of the University of Utah, as commissioner of education; and Mayor Ivan A. Nestingen of Madison, Wis., as Under Secretary of HEW.

Defense Aides Named

For the Defense Dept., the President picked Nolis A. Lennartson, assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury in the Eisenhower Administration, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense; Carlisle P. Runge of Wisconsin as Assistant Secretary for Manpower; Kenneth E. Be Lieu, an Army veteran, as Assistant Secretary of the Navy; and Adam Yarmolinsky, Washington, D. C., lawyer, as special assistant to the Defense Secretary.

James E. Webb, former Truman Administration budget director, was named head of the key National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Other selections included the renaming of Conrad L. Wirth as director of the National Park Service; Louis F. Oberdorfer as assistant Attorney General; Sidney H. Woolner as head of the Community Facilities Administration; Walter N. Tobriner as a District of Columbia commissioner; Frank B. Ellis, New Orleans attorney, to head the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization; Prof. Mortimer M. Caplin of the University of Virginia Law School, to be commissioner of Internal Revenue; William Simkin, director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

In the regulatory agency field, Kennedy named John William Bush, director of commerce in Ohio, and William Tucker, a bus company counsel in New England, to the Interstate Commerce Commission; and John C. Swidler, a Nashville lawyer formerly on the Tennessee Valley Authority legal staff, and Howard Morgan, a former member of the Oregon legislature, to the Federal Power Commission.

Brotherhood Goals Urged By Schnitzler

Organized labor fully endorses the observance of Brotherhood Week, to be celebrated Feb. 19-26 under the sponsorship of the National Conference of Christians and Jews, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has announced.

Schnitzler is serving as Brotherhood Week chairman for the Commission on Labor-Management Organizations of the National Conference, with David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, representing management.

"No public observance is closer to the heart of the labor movement than National Brotherhood Week," Schnitzler declared.

"The eradication of discrimination based upon race, creed or national origin," he stressed, "is an indispensable prerequisite to union brotherhood as well as to the brotherhood of man.

"Our unions are themselves brotherhoods; many of them retain the word itself in their names. We address each other as 'brother' in our meetings, and we are proud that this old custom has not become old-fashioned.

"Like Americans generally, we have broadened our horizons. We know there are no boundaries to true brotherhood; that to be genuine it must be universal.

"We in the AFL-CIO are dedicated to that end, and we gladly join all who share this dedication in observing National Brotherhood Week as a symbol of its ultimate achievement."

Red Drive on Unions Seen By Lovestone

The Communists have launched an intensive campaign aimed at "penetration and subversion" of the free world's trade unions, Jay Lovestone, a recognized authority on Soviet affairs, has warned the Senate Internal Security subcommittee.

Lovestone, director of publications for the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, appeared as a private citizen before the subcommittee to analyze the international Communist conference held in Moscow last November and December—a conference which he said had not been matched in either size or scope in the past quarter century.

Under Moscow's direction, he warned, Communists will attempt to move in on the free trade union movement, seeking to "exploit such issues as unemployment, automation problems, tax and armament burdens, in order to subvert our social fabric and strengthen the Soviet world position."

Lovestone said new "united front" maneuvers are being prepared by the Kremlin-operated World Federation of Trade Unions to "infiltrate and disrupt" the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions as part of "the entire fraudulent Soviet press program which aims only to cripple and destroy the democratic countries' resistance to aggression."

Rutgers Memorial To Honor Holderman

New Brunswick, N. J.—An intensive effort to complete a drive to raise funds for a memorial to Carl Holderman at Rutgers University has been announced by Pres. Joel R. Jacobson of the New Jersey State Industrial Union Council.

The state IUC plans to complete its drive within three months for a memorial room in the labor unit of the new home of the Rutgers Institute of Management and Labor Relations. Holderman was formerly president of the IUC.

House Vote to Enlarge Rules Committee

Here is the rollcall by which the House broke control of the Rules Committee by a right-wing coalition of conservative Republicans and Dixiecrats. The motion to enlarge the committee carried 217 to 212. R-right; W-wrong; PR-paired right; PW-paired wrong; NV-not voting.

Rayburn Wins Rules Committee Battle

217-212 Vote Defeats GOP-Dixie Coalition

vote giving possible indication of sharp battles ahead.

At his press conference 24 hours after the House vote, Kennedy conceded that the House is "closely divided on a good many matters which involve legislative proposals," but said that under the new rule "at least we will have a chance to have a vote, and I consider that the most important thing.

"If the House then does not want to support our proposals, then at least I feel the country has indicated its viewpoint, and not the judgment of only a small number of representatives," the President added.

Elliott, Sisk Named To Rules Group

The Democratic caucus moved quickly to give unanimous approval to Speaker Sam Rayburn's choices for two new Rules Committee posts created by the House.

Assigned to the committee were Representatives Carl Elliott (Ala.), a progressive southerner on labor and social welfare legislation, and B. F. Sisk (Calif.), a liberal Democratic bloc leader.

House Republicans put off until the week of Feb. 6 their selection of the one additional GOP member to serve on the expanded Rules Committee.

The Rayburn plan to enlarge the committee—which previously had eight Democrats and four Republicans and which now will have 10 Democrats and five Republicans—maintains the same party ratios, reflecting the approximate makeup of the House.

The addition of two majority party members who, Rayburn said, "support the Democratic position in and out of Congress" will give the Administration an 8-7 majority for clearing its proposals for floor action.

6-6 Deadlock Broken

This will be in sharp contrast to the pattern which prevailed in the 86th Congress, when the two conservative Democrats — Chairman Howard W. Smith (Va.) and Rep. William M. Colmer (Miss.)—joined forces with the four right-wing Republicans to create a 6-6 deadlock, and thus pigeonholed housing and jobsite picketing bills, killed school-aid bills by keeping them from a conference committee, and delayed depressed areas and civil rights legislation.

Defeat of the coalition, which has stood as a barrier to much liberal social legislation over the past quarter century, was a sharp blow to Minority Leader Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.), who had mustered the overwhelming number of House Republicans in support of continuing the alliance with the Dixiecrats. Most of the 22 Republicans who rejected the leadership were from the Eastern liberal wing of the party.

In a last-minute effort to stave off defeat, Smith had proposed a compromise under which he would have given assurances that the committee would clear five priority items on Kennedy's list of domestic legislation—depressed areas, housing, minimum wage, health care for the aged under social security and federal aid to education—and would not, as in the past, block Senate-House conferences to iron out differences in bills passed on both sides of Capitol Hill.

Rayburn rejected the offer, declaring on the floor at the climax to a tense hour-long debate that Kennedy would be sending more than a dozen bills to Congress in the next two weeks to deal with the deepening recession and adding that the President had a right to have these measures considered.

The Rayburn plan for enlarging the committee was an alternative to more drastic moves urged by some Democrats, who had advocated "purging" Colmer from the committee and replacing him with a more liberal member. The proposal to oust Colmer was based on the fact that he openly campaigned against the Kennedy-Johnson ticket in November.

LONG LINES of unemployed gather outside this Pittsburgh school, with government-distributed surplus food the magnet. Snow and bitter cold could not dampen the hope of families cheered by Pres. John F. Kennedy's order to give more food to those who need it. Western Pennsylvania is one of the U.S. areas hardest hit by mine and plant closings and short work weeks in the steel industry.

President Asks Permanent Reform In Unemployment Benefits Program

For immediate aid to the present jobless, Kennedy asked a temporary extension of the duration of benefits by 50 percent of the maximum now permitted under the laws of each state, to be financed by an increase in the earnings base on which employers pay taxes.

The President disclosed that mid-January unemployment had leaped to 5.4 million, an increase of 900,000 since December, and that an additional 1.7 million workers were on part-time shifts, an increase of 200,000. An Administration spokesman said this produced a seasonally adjusted jobless rate of 6.6 percent, down slightly from the 6.8 percent rate in December.

Basically similar to the 1958 temporary extension law, insofar as benefits are concerned, the Kennedy program would call for voluntary agreements between the states and the federal government under which the federal treasury would advance funds for extending the duration of benefits.

The extended benefits he proposed would go to workers who have exhaused benefits under state law and are still jobless. They would be payable for a maximum of 13 weeks in extension of payments for one-half the period permitted under state law. The state duration period plus the additional federal temporary benefit would be limited to a maximum of 39 weeks.

Where state law now provides a duration period of more than 26 weeks, Kennedy said, the federal government would pay the total cost of extended benefits for all weeks to a maximum of 39, "thus freeing state funds for much-needed increases in benefit amounts."

Unlike the 1958 program, which required only those states participating to repay federal advances, the Kennedy proposal would finance the cost of TUC by an increase for all employers in the wage-and-salary base on which taxes are paid to finance the permanent jobless insurance system.

At present, the tax is collected on the first $3,000 of payroll costs per employe, and the President said this should be increased to the first $4,800 of payroll costs per employe—a change that would raise revenues by approximately 60 percent.

The increase, he said, would "maintain the self-supporting basis of the system and enhance its capacity to meet future emergencies."

Kennedy also called for immediate adoption of an "interim amendment" to the social security laws to provide matching federal funds for assistance to the children of unemployed workers.

Federal assistance is now extended under the Aid to Dependent Children program, to children whose fathers are "deceased, disabled or family deserters."

"In logic and humanity," he said, "a child should also be eligible if his father is a needy unemployed worker — for example, a person who has exhausted unemployment benefits and is not receiving adequate local assistance."

Calls Need 'Urgent'

Calling the circumstances "urgent," the President spelled out the need for immediate assistance to the unemployed by pointing out that in mid-January more than 1.3 million workers had been jobless for 15 months or longer, with 600,000 continually out of work for more than six months.

About 500,000 who have exhausted their benefits are still unemployed, he said, although the number still drawing benefits has jumped to 3.4 million—"1 million higher than a year ago."

During the first six months of 1961, he warned, "nearly 1.5 million more persons will use up their benefits before finding jobs."

"We have long since decided as a nation," he said, "that we will not turn our backs upon workers and their families undergoing the hardships of unemployment."

Kennedy to Create Advisory Panel Of Labor, Industry, Public Groups

view that prospects for meaningful high-level meetings of top labor and management leaders to consider mapping guidelines for industrial peace had improved now that the Kennedy Administration is in power.

Says Ike Yielded to NAM

Interviewed on the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. radio program, "Washington Viewpoint," Meany said he had first advocated such "summit meetings" to former Pres. Eisenhower in November 1959, that agreement had been reached to have the President name the committee members, but that Eisenhower subsequently yielded to "the influence of the National Association of Manufacturers" and allowed that organization to pick the management representatives.

In disclosing his plan for creating the advisory committee, Kennedy said the "course of the American price level depends in substantial measure on wage and price decisions of labor and management," adding that "this dependence grows in importance as the economy moves toward full employment."

America, the President said, must not "come to accept the proposition that reasonable price stability can be achieved only by tolerating a slack economy, chronic unemployment, and a creeping rate of growth."

Must 'Compete Successfully'

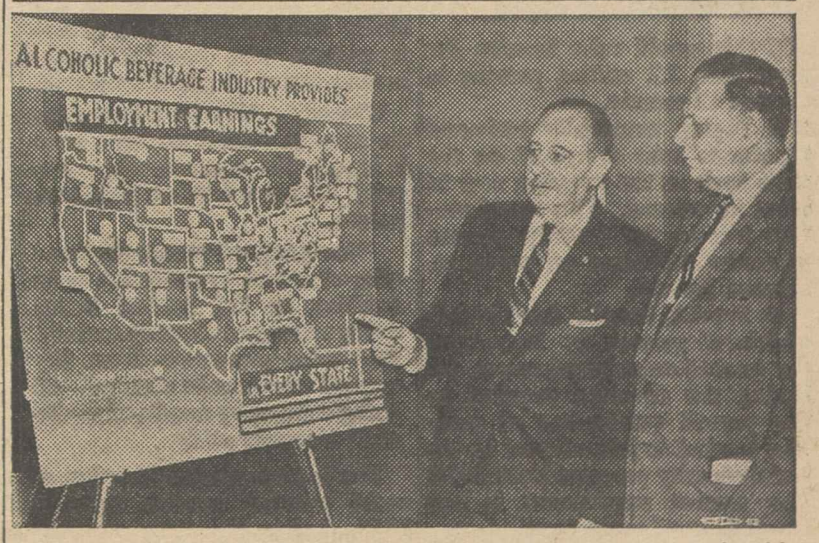
Instead, he said, the nation must be "conscious of the need for policies that enable American goods to compete successfully with foreign goods." He added that the U.S. "cannot afford unsound wage and price movements which push up competitive position, restrict job opportunities, and jeopardize the health of our domestic economy."

Meany said on the radio interview that the NAM representatives appointed to attend last year's conferences were small industrialists from "the ultra-conservative wing, if not the anti-labor wing, of the NAM."

Two of them—Pres. William J. Grede of the J. I. Case Co., and Pres. L. A. Petersen of Otis Elevator Co.—were engaged, at the time of the meetings, "in a knockdown, drag-out strike with their employes."

Meany said labor would prefer to have the President name both the union and management representatives, as originally suggested, in order to assure having "top-level" industrialists "who really represent big industry" taking part in the meetings.

The AFL-CIO president originally called for the meeting to help prevent "prolonged and costly industrial strife" similar to the record-breaking 116-day steel strike of 1959, and to bring "greater stability to our entire economy and new vitality to free and voluntary responsible collective bargaining which is indispensible to the health and progress of our democracy."



IMPORTANCE OF alcoholic beverage industry is shown in this chart, prepared by the National Coordinating Committee of the Beverage Industry for its midwinter meeting in Washington. Since the repeal of the prohibition law, the industry has paid out $4.4 billions in wages to more than 1.2 million workers, according to Chairman Joseph E. Brady. Pictured above are Brady, left, and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, a guest speaker.

and will not be satisfied with economic decline and slack," adding that America "has been falling further and further short of its economic capabilities" and that in the past seven years "our rate of growth has slowed down disturbingly."

At the same time, Kennedy made it plain his Administration did not "expect to make good in a day or even a year the accumulated deficiencies of several years," but warned that the nation faced "further deterioration if we fail to act."

For 1961, he said, the "realistic" aims of his Administration would be to "reverse the downtrend in our economy, to narrow the gap of unused potential, to abate the waste and misery of unemployment, and at the same time to maintain reasonable stability of the price level."

To 'Show the World'

In 1962 and 1963, Kennedy said, the goal would be to expand American productive capacity "at a rate that shows the world the vigor and vitality of a free economy."

In his message to Congress, the President:

- Urged temporary extension of unemployment compensation to workers who have exhausted regular jobless benefits without finding jobs. (See story, Page 1).
- Recommended five improvements in social security, effective Apr. 1, including a hike in minimum benefits, early retirement for men at age 62, extending of coverage, increasing widow's benefits and broadening disability protection. (See story, Page 1.)
- Reported that by executive action, he had directed the FHA to reduce interest on its home loans from 5.75 to 5.5 percent, ordered the Community Facilities Administration to lower rates to localities on loans for sewage disposal plants and other public projects, and instructed the Housing and Home Finance Agency to speed up approved projects.
- Called for a reduction in interest rates on long-term loans while guarding against declines in short-term interest rates.
- Said he had directed Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg to expand the U.S. Employment Service operations, particularly in depressed areas and rural areas of chronic underemployment and to aid workers displaced by automation.
- Recommended an emergency amendment to the Aid of Dependent Children program so that the children of the unemployed can be covered temporarily by federal-state public assistance programs.
- Urged that the pending area redevelopment bill—similar to ones twice vetoed by former Pres. Eisenhower—"be enacted without delay."
- Said he had instructed Agriculture Sec. Orville Freeman to establish pilot food-stamp programs for needy families in West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Eastern Kentucky, Northern Minnesota, Southern Illinois and Metropolitan Detroit.
- Reported he had instructed the Veterans Administration to advance the payment of the $258 million current dividend on National Service Life Insurance policies so that payments will be received within the next 30 to 60 days.
- Called for raising the minimum wage immediately to $1.15 and to $1.25 within two years with broadened coverage. (See story, this page.)
- Said he had directed heads of executive departments and agencies to expedite procurement and construction, with priority on actions which would affect unemployment; and directed Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges to "make available to the states immediately the entire balance of federal-aid highway funds scheduled for this fiscal year."
- Said he had ordered government agencies to take "prompt steps" to channel federal contracts to firms in labor surplus areas.
- Promised to propose shortly federal tax reforms to provide added incentives for investment in plants and equipment, while removing "several unwarranted special tax benefits.
- Declared he would soon recommend programs to strengthen education, health, research and training activities.
- Called for a broad natural resources program, including flood control, irrigation, navigation, watershed development, water pollution control, nuclear energy and reforestation.
- Said he would by executive order establish a tripartite President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy to devise methods for promoting industrial peace. (See story, Page 1.)

Social Security Hikes Proposed by Kennedy

said this would raise benefits for more than 2.2 million persons in the first 12 months.

- Paying actuarially reduced benefits to men at age 62 on the same basis as the program now in effect for women. This would provide income for 600,000 persons otherwise dependent on public assistance, he said.
- Provide benefits for 170,000 additional persons by liberalizing the insured-status requirement, reducing the coverage required to one payroll quarter out of every four worked in jobs covered by the social security program since 1950. The present requirement is one quarter out of every three.
- Increasing the aged widow's benefit from 75 to 85 percent of the husband's benefit amount, raising benefits for 1.5 million widows.
- Broadening disability insurance protection, providing benefits in the first 12 months for 85,000 totally disabled workers and their dependents who would otherwise have to resort to public assistance.

Kennedy said in his message that the average retired worker's benefit is only $74 a month with a majority having no other significant income.

"We must not permit the benefits of retired workers and their families to lag behind living costs; we cannot decently exclude our older population from the general advances in standards of living enjoyed by employed workers," Kennedy said.

The last congressional action on social security benefits came in 1958 during the 85th Congress when payments were increased an average of 7 to 8 percent for all beneficiaries. In the 86th Congress the age 50 limitation on disability benefits was removed and eligibility requirements eased slightly.

Kennedy Warns Nation Of Tide of World Crises

American domestic problems "pale when placed beside" the "harsh enormity" of the foreign crises facing us in the next four years, Pres. John F. Kennedy told Congress in his first State of the Union message.

Breaking sharply with former Pres. Eisenhower's estimate that in the past eight years the United States has "forged ahead under a constructive foreign policy," Kennedy told Congress that in every principal area of crisis "the tide has been running out and time has not been our friend."

"The news will be worse before it is better," the President warned. "And while hoping for the best, we should prepare ourselves for the worst."

Kennedy's bleak statements on our foreign relations problems occupied more than half of a relatively brief 4,600-word message that he delivered in person.

Meeting published charges that he painted a black picture so as to claim credit for any improvement and to lay blame for failure on the "legacy" he inherited from Eisenhower, Kennedy told his news conference two days later:

"My statement stands as my view of the problems facing the United States at home and abroad. To the best of my ability, it is an accurate presentation. Anyone who thinks that it was laid on thick for political reasons is making a serious mistake."

On domestic issues, Kennedy began his message with a blunt statement that "the American economy is in trouble," with the heritage of an "incomplete recovery" from the 1958 recession and a new recession now seven months old.

"We cannot afford to waste idle hours and empty plants while awaiting the end," he declared. "This Administration does not intend to stand helplessly by."

He promised a series of special messages within the next two weeks on specific proposals "to show the world what a free economy can do—to reduce unemployment, to put unused capacity to work, to spur new productivity, to foster higher economic growth."

On the relatively recent problems involving a gold outflow and a deficit in balance of payments, the President pledged that his Administration would not devalue the dollar, would not fall back on "restrictive trade policies," or "weaken our (world) commitments," but would seek to "ease our dollar outlays abroad."

This objective would be sought, he said, "without placing the full burden" on the families of servicemen abroad, large numbers of whom had been ordered by Eisenhower to return home. In his news conference, he announced revocation of the previous order.

'Our Greatest Challenge'

Kennedy said that he would "build on" the budget estimates of expenditures and revenues proposed by Eisenhower, although his economic advisers doubted that the tax revenues estimated by the previous Administration would be reached.

He said his own expenditure programs would not "of and by themselves unbalance" the Eisenhower budget but that "our national household is cluttered with unfinished and neglected tasks and "we will do what must be done."

The President, nevertheless, warned that "our greatest challenge" is to help meet the needs of "neutralist" and emerging nations and that "our first great obstacle" lies in the Soviet Union and Communist China.

No man entering the presidency could fail to be "staggered," he said, by realizing that "each day we draw nearer the hour of maximum danger."

In Asia, Africa and Latin America, he warned, the Communists are pressing, and our alliances in Europe "are unfulfilled and in some disarray."

He said we must improve military, economic, political and diplomatic tools to meet the dangers. While warning that we would improve our defenses, he also declared we would strengthen our disarmament approaches and he invited the Soviet Union to "join with us" in specific space projects that would "invoke the wonders of science instead of its terrors."

"To state the facts frankly is not to despair of the future or to indict the past," Kennedy said. "We have no greater asset than the willingness of a free and determined people to face all problems frankly and meet all dangers free from panic or fear."

Kennedy Asks Hike in Wage And Coverage

An increase in the minimum wage to $1.15 immediately and to $1.25 within two years combined with extension of coverage to "several million" workers not now covered is essential to improve the living standards, morale and efficiency of low-paid workers, Pres. John F. Kennedy told Congress.

In his economic message, the President dealt directly with the argument that an increase in the minimum wage will adversely affect American competition in world markets and the balance of payments problem.

A higher wage floor, he said, "can actually increase productivity and hold down unit costs" without affecting our trade balances. More than four-fifths of the commodities involved in either import or export trends would not be affected by an increase in the minimum wage, he declared.

On extension of coverage he called for $1 an hour for workers newly included in coverage with a "gradual increase" to the $1.25 minimum. The proposed new coverage would be basically in retail trades and services, he told Congress.

Experience with previous minimum wage increases, he stressed, "indicates little effect on prices."

The Republican-Dixiecrat coalition stymied passage of minimum wage legislation in the 86th Congress. A bill sponsored by then Sen. Kennedy passed the Senate 62 to 34. It would have increased the minimum to $1.15 an hour in 1961, to $1.20 in 1962 and to $1.25 thereafter, with coverage extended to about 4.1 million workers in retail and service trades.

The newly covered workers would have received $1 an hour in 1961, with gradual increases in the wage and reduction in the workweek eventually to reach $1.25 an hour and a 40-hour week in 1964.

The House adopted a coalition measure to increase minimum wages to $1.15 an hour and extend coverage to 1.4 million workers at $1 an hour.

In conference, the House members refused to budge from the weak and almost meaningless House bill and the measure died as the Senate group refused to foreclose action in the next Congress by accepting a bill they believed inadequate.

Advisory Council Formed in Texas

Austin—Texas AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. Brown has announced the formation of a state AFL-CIO Advisory Council to be made up of international union representatives and the presidents and secretaries of central labor unions.

The purpose of the council, Brown said, will be to offer "advice and suggestions" to the state officers and staff.

Kennedy Urges Health Plan To Aid 13.5 Million Elderly

Fines Nearly $2 Million:

7 Executives Jailed In Antitrust Case

By David Perlman

Philadelphia—Seven high-ranking corporation executives, including vice presidents of both General Electric and Westinghouse, have been sentenced to 30 days in jail in a dramatic climax to the federal government's most successful criminal antitrust prosecution.

Twenty-nine big electrical equipment manufacturers and 45 individual company officials were fined nearly $2 million in federal court here. All had pleaded either guilty or no contest to charges of illegally fixing prices and rigging bids on sales of heavy electrical equipment totaling $1.75 billion both to private utilities and to local, state and federal governments.

In addition to sending seven company officers to jail, U.S. District Judge J. Cullen Ganey imposed suspended 30-day sentences on 25 other company officials and placed them on five years probation "where a watchful eye can be kept on their activities." The judge said he "reluctantly" suspended sentence in some cases because of the age or health of the defendants.

Before imposing sentence, the judge gave a blistering tongue-lashing to the companies involved "and those who guide and direct their policy." Their corporate behavior, he said, "mocked" the free enterprise system.

Judge Ganey took sharp issue with the public disclaimers of responsibility from some of the top corporation officers who were not themselves indicted.

Top Officers Hit

He said that while the evidence linking them directly to the illegal actions of their companies might not have been sufficient for conviction, "one would be most naive to believe that these violations of the law, so long persisted in, affect-

Job Picture Seen Worst Since War

By Robert B. Cooney

Current unemployment "at least equals the worst" the nation has experienced since just before World War II, the government has announced.

Dr. Seymour Wolfbein, Labor Dept. manpower chief, made this statement in issuing a monthly job report which showed that unemployment rose by 850,000 to 5.4 million between December and January.

The key seasonally-adjusted jobless rate, at 6.6 percent of the work force, was not significantly changed from December's 6.8 percent, his report said.

The 6.6 percent rate of unemployment was a record high for postwar Januaries. The highest it had gone previously was 6.0 percent in January 1959 and 6.5 percent in January 1950—both of them recession periods.

A separate bi-monthly report showed that over half of the 150 major job and production centers in the United States had "sub-

LABOR SEC. ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG confers with Pres. Kennedy on the minimum wage and unemployment compensation bills the Administration has recommended to Congress. Moves on Jobless Relief:

House Sets Hearings On Kennedy Bills

The House Ways & Means Committee has scheduled Feb. 15 hearings on Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposals for temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits and emergency action to provide aid to needy children of the jobless under public assistance programs.

The proposals are keystones in the Administration's "program for economic recovery and growth," Kennedy said in letters to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.), adding that "the need for prompt enactment . . . is clear."

Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), in scheduling joint hearings on the first two measures in Kennedy's anti-recession program, said Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg would be the leadoff witness followed by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff.

Jobless Figures Cited

As he sent the measures to Capitol Hill, the President pointed out that 5.4 million workers were jobless in January. Of these, he said, 3.4 million were receiving unemployment compensation and more than 550,000 had exhausted benefits without finding jobs.

Kennedy estimated that some 3 million workers would receive extended jobless benefits, totaling about $950 million, before the TUC program's cutoff date of June 30, 1962.

The President called the TUC program "a first step" toward improving the jobless aid system. This was an apparent reference to earlier pledges that he would submit recommendations by the end of March for "permanent reform" in the area of "standards, duration and benefits."

Asks Social Security Financing

By Gene Zack

A program of health care for the aged financed through the social security and railroad retirement systems to provide hospital, nursing home, outpatient and home health services for 13.5 million persons over 65, has been proposed by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

In a message to Congress the President was critical of the "major deficiencies in the quality and distribution" of health services and the fact that medical care is "too often beyond the reach of those who need them most."

To meet what he called a "matter of national concern," Kennedy also called for added federal funds for nursing home construction and modernization and for development of better methods for caring for the chronically ill; new federal grants for construction of medical and dental schools; federal scholarships in the health field; broadening of health research for children; and step-ups in vocational rehabilitation and medical research.

The Administration plan of health benefits for the aged—which spells out "deductible" features requiring the elderly to pay some of the cost of hospital and diagnostic care—is similar to the bill sponsored by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.) which was killed in the post-convention session of the 86th Congress.

In a week filled with a steady flow of messages to Capitol Hill, the President also proposed:

- Raising the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour, in steps, and broad-

Labor Backs Recession Program, Questions Kennedy's Tax Policies

The AFL-CIO has urged Congress to act with speed on Pres. Kennedy's 12-point economic program, but noted that in some respects it fell short of what the labor movement believes is necessary.

Walter P. Reuther, appearing as chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, praised the "speed and vigor" of the President's anti-recession moves, and hailed as a "refreshing change" his frank recognition of national problems. The President, Reuther said, "has given all Americans a sense of national urgency and national purpose," and said Congress should respond accordingly.

Reuther said, however, that while the President's proposals were basically sound, he had made a "serious understatement" of the nation's potential for economic growth, had advanced an "unnecessary and unwise" principle of tax reform, and had been overly conservative in his economic proposals to date.

But the President's economic message to Congress "in some respects tended more to understatement than the reverse," the AFL-CIO spokesman went on. "Nowhere was this more noticeable than in his estimate of an existing potentiality for (economic) growth . . . of 3.5 percent per year."

In view of the predicted growth in the labor force and the anticipated rise in manhour productivity, Reuther said, the potential is 5 percent—and unless this figure is reached, there will be a continuing increase in the hard core of "permanent" unemployment.

"We believe it would be an error to base either short-range or long-range estimates and policies on such a serious understate-

McCulloch Named Head Of NLRB

Frank W. McCulloch, for the past dozen years administrative assistant to Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), has been picked by Pres. John F. Kennedy to be chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

The President also selected William E. Simkin of Wallingford, Pa., a noted labor arbitrator and former member of the National War Labor Board, for the post of director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

McCulloch replaces Arthur A. Kimball, an Eisenhower recess appointee who was not confirmed by

Maryland Unit Wins Prize For Vote Shift

The winners of the 1960 "Get-Out-the-Vote" contest sponsored by Labor's Committee for Kennedy and Johnson came down to the wire in a race reminiscent of the Kennedy-Nixon contest itself.

The Baltimore County Committee in Maryland's 15th congressional district was declared the winner of the $1,000 first prize for helping to bring about a shift of votes which edged the second-place winner by three-tenths of 1 percent.

The Baltimore group helped produce a shift of 10,000 votes in favor of the labor-backed ticket, compared to the Eisenhower vs. Stevenson vote of 1956.

The Essex-West Hudson County Committee in Newark, N. J., won the runner-up prize of $500 for helping to produce a shift of 140,000 votes.

Railway Clerks' Pres. George M. Harrison, in announcing the seven winners of $2,000 in total prizes, pointed out the two top winners more than doubled the previous percentage-of-increase record. The labor political group in Somerville, Mass., boosted that area's Democratic vote by 22 percent in the 1948 Truman-Barkley victory, Harrison said, and held the record until now.

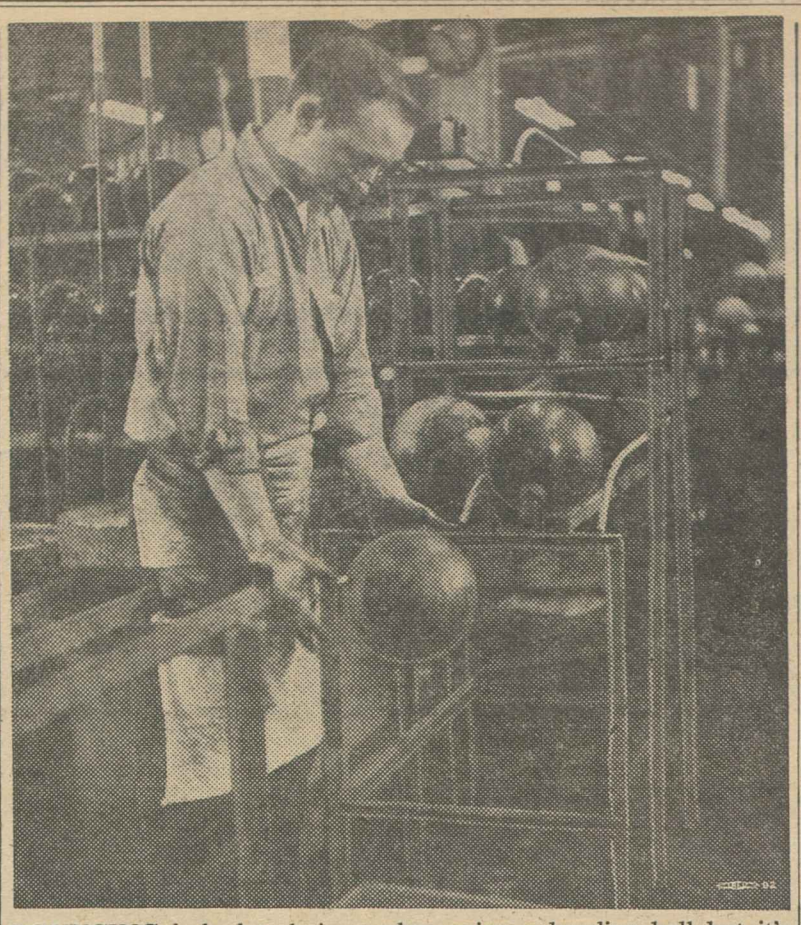
Five prizes of $100 each went to the Palm Beach County Committee, West Palm Beach, Fla. (a shift of 15,000 votes); Bexar County Committee, San Antonio, Tex. (shift of 31,000); Smith County Committee, Tyler, Tex. (shift of 2,000); Harrison County Committee, Clarksburg, W. Va. (shift of 6,000; and Bucks County Federation, Bristol, Pa. (9,000).

Lithographers Join Talks on Merger

New York—The unaffiliated Lithographers have named a two-man team to represent the ALA in discussions by graphic arts unions of the possibility of forming one big union in the publishing industry.

In a letter to William J. Farson, executive vice president of the Newspaper Guild and chairman of the unity committee, ALA Pres. Kenneth J. Brown announced his union's selection of Leon M. Wickersham, assistant to the ALA president, and Edward V. Donahue, president of Twin Cities Local 10, Minneapolis-St. Paul, Minn., to take part in the discussions.

Besides the Guild and Lithographers, other unions participating in the exploratory talks include the Typographical Union, Bookbinders, Papermakers & Paperworkers, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers and Photo Engravers.



BOUNCING is bad technique when using a bowling ball but it's important in testing it. A defective ball, bounced on a steel plate, will crack. Rail Unions Call For Modern Wage Scales

Five rail unions, representing 210,000 "operating" employes, have asked a presidential study commission headed by former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell to make recommendations "to modernize, not to destroy," wages and working conditions.

The unions, in an opening statement to the tripartite commission, sharply rejected management charges of "featherbedding" and said rules changes demanded by industry spokesmen would "completely emasculate" collective bargaining agreements now in force, would cut pay, lead to greater safety hazards "and develop bitter and unrelenting unrest" among employes.

December Goal Set

The 15-member presidential commision, equally divided among labor, management and public representatives, was set up in an effort to find a solution to the long-smouldering work rules dispute. It is scheduled to submit non-binding recommendations by December.

In a joint statement the five brotherhoods—the AFL-CIO-affiliated Railroad Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and Switchmen, and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers and Conductors & Brakemen—called for:

- A shorter workweek "in line with organized labor's general progress toward that goal." They said many railroad workers are still on six or seven-day work schedules. The unions asked a 35-hour week with no cut in pay.
- Allowances for away-from-home expenses, which train crews must now pay out of their own pockets.
- Overtime payments for all employes, "eliminating the present outdated speed basis under which some employes receive overtime only after 12 hours."
- Premium pay for night shift work, plus paid holidays and overtime for those who must work on holidays, "all in accord with existing practices in other industries."

The union statement, presented by Atty. Harold C. Heiss, also asked the presidential commission to consider the need for job stabilization and to make recommendations "for dealing with the problem of dwindling employment in the industry."

As the commission began its study, the question arose as to whether Mitchell would remain as member or chairman in view of his announced candidacy for the Republican gubernatorial nomination in New Jersey.

Mitchell had requested the other 14 commissioners to give their views as to whether his candidacy would represent "a conflict of interests."

The commission announced it unanimously and "emphatically" agreed that there would be no conflict and expressed the hope that Mitchell would remain as chairman. The former labor secretary then said he will make a "careful reassessment" of his position and announce his intentions after completion of the opening round of hearings.

In refuting management's opening argument for drastic rules changes, the unions said the average through-freight engineer would be forced to take a 14.4 percent wage cut and a brakeman would suffer a 42.5 percent wage slash if industry recommendations were adopted.

RLEA Welcomes New Accident Report Rules

Four major changes in accident reporting rules for the railroad industry, ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, have been hailed by rail unions as "a major advance" in labor's "continuing campaign to reduce the mounting toll of accidents on the railroads."

Harry See, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association's Safety Committee, said the ICC's previous regulations permitted thousands of accidents to go unreported, thus giving a false picture of rail safety problems.

He listed the major changes in accident reporting rules as follows:

- Accidents to all railroad employes must now be reported. Previously the ICC had not required the reporting of accident involving workers in some occupational groups. This change in reporting rules was made mandatory by legislation passed by Congress last year.
- Any accident which incapacitates an employe for a period of 24 hours or more must now be reported. Previously accidents were not reported unless the injured employe was unable to perform his regular duties for three days.
- Railroad medical officers no longer have the right to determine whether "doubtful" cases should be reported to the ICC.
- Starting in 1962, railroads will be required to submit a separate report form for each reportable personal injury. Although not required, railroads will be encouraged to make such reports this year.

Job Picture Called 'Worst' Since War

stantial unemployment" as of January.

The Labor Dept. surveys showed that, between November and January, "the aggregate rise in unemployment in the 150 major areas totaled about 50 percent" and factory jobs continued to decline in 120 of the 150 areas.

Wolfbein also reported that the long-term jobless—those out of work 15 weeks or longer—jumped by 324,000 over the month to a total of 1.3 million. Half of the long-term unemployed—some 650,000—have been jobless six months or longer, he added.

The report showed a climb of 200,000 over the month to a total of 1.7 million who are "working part-time involuntarily." This is a 600,000 increase over January a year ago.

Largest Cities on List

In its survey of area joblessness, the Labor Dept. said some of the nation's largest cities were included in the 25 areas recently added to those with "substantial labor surpluses"—6 percent or more jobless. The January total of 76 is more than double the total of 31 major areas recorded in January 1960 and is the highest total since 89 major areas were so classified in the depths of the last recession in September 1958.

The number of smaller areas with substantial labor surpluses rose by 29 from November to a total of 152 in January.

Asked by a reporter whether, in the light of the Labor Dept.'s economic data, Pres. John F. Kennedy was "overdoing" his comments about the seriousness of the situation, Wolfbein replied that he has been saying for months:

"Unemployment is serious by any standards you use—and I say it goes double in spades right now."

He pointed out that unless there is re-employment for workers in the hard-hit manufacturing field, the total of the long-term unemployed will continue upward.

As in December, the January report showed job declines blanketing all the 21 industries which comprise the durable and non-durable goods divisions of the manufacturing sector.

Manufacturing—now down to a job total of 15.6 million—has lost 898,000 workers since January 1960. Two-thirds of the loss, Wolfbein noted, occurred in the metalworking industries.

The plunge in manufacturing contrasted sharply with the steadiness in the service and distribution sectors.

While retail trade dropped by 809,000 from December as the holiday season ended to a total of 8.4 million, it nevertheless remained 112,000 higher than January a year earlier.

Although federal, state and local jobs dropped 287,000 from December as temporary post office workers were laid off, the total of 8.6 million government workers was 344,000 over a year ago.

Total employment in January fell seasonally by 1.6 million to a total of 64.5 million.

The report showed the factory workweek remained unchanged from December at 38.6 hours, though the workweek was now 1.7 hours shorter than a year ago.

The shorter hours caused a slump of $2.74 in weekly earnings compared to a year earlier. The factory worker's weekly earnings remained unchanged from December at $89.55.

A companion report on unemployment insurance showed that initial claims for jobless pay rose 3,300 for the week ending Jan. 28 to a total of 500,000.

A total of 3.2 million workers were drawing jobless pay in mid-January as 32 states reported increases. A year ago the total was 2.2 million.

Local Asks Help In Long Walkout

Pittsburgh—A 95-member local of lighting fixture makers, weary from more than two months of picketing in snow and zero temperatures, would appreciate help in fighting for survival, according to Financial Sec. William W. Elliott of Local 1239, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Elliott's address is Box 248, Herminie, Pa.

A strike has halted production since last Nov. 23 at the plant of the Pittsburgh Reflector Co., in suburban Irwin. Management has tried to operate with supervisory and non-union help and has made contract proposals which would, if accepted, destroy the union, Elliott wrote IBEW Pres. Gordon Freeman. The strike has been sanctioned and the local authorized to seek financial help.

Wages Raised For 7 Million Last Year

Wage increases for some 7 million workers were agreed to or put into effect during 1960, according to preliminary estimates of the Labor Dept.

Including step-ups under contracts negotiated previously, the most common increases—affecting about 1.4 million or 20 percent of the total workers—averaged 10 to 11 cents an hour, the report said. The typical hike in 1959 averaged 9 to 10 cents an hour for 19 percent of the workers.

The next most frequent raises in 1960 averaged 9 to 10 cents—15 percent of the total, and 6 to 7 cents—13 percent of the total.

A total of 57 percent of the 7 million workers received increases in the range of 8 to 13 cents an hour.

The report said the 7 million workers made up 85 percent of all those employed under major collective bargaining contracts—those pacts covering 1,000 or more workers.

It noted that some 4.3 million workers were covered by contracts renewed during 1960, while most of the rest received deferred wage increases under continuing pacts.

In the contracts actually negotiated in 1960, the most common increase was 5 but under 6 cents—covering 21 percent of the 4.4 million total. Seventeen percent received 9 but under 10 cents.

"Among all contracts negotiated in 1960," the report observed, "health and welfare provisions were liberalized more often than any other benefit."

Bernstein Awarded Lasker Fellowship

Boston—Julius Bernstein, executive secretary of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee and regional director of the Jewish Labor Committee, has been awarded a Florina Lasker Fellowship at Brandeis University.

The Lasker grant, which carries a $2,000 stipend, is intended to help individuals working in the civil liberties and civil rights areas to function more effectively in their work. Bernstein has directed labor's civil rights program in this state for ten years.

In Arbitration Award Fight:

Clerks Again Take Sears into Court

San Francisco—Two Retail Clerks locals here are asking the federal district court once again to order Sears, Roebuck & Co. to live up to its agreements with them.

The two unions petitioned the court to direct Sears to comply with an arbitration award ordering reinstatement and back pay for some 140 members who were discharged last summer for respecting a Machinists' picket line.

Department Store Employes Local 1100 and Retail Shoe & Textile Salesmen's Local 410 took the legal step after a series of meetings with Sears officials failed to produce assurance that the company would not go into court in an effort to upset the arbitration award.

The unions contended that, under dispute procedures in their contracts with Sears, the arbitrator's ruling is "final and binding."

Meetings had been initiated with the company looking toward implementation of the arbitration award, which climaxed a seven-month dispute. The meetings ran into a dead-end, however, when union spokesmen became convinced that the company was withholding final acceptance of the ruling.

Price for its acceptance, it was indicated, was the permanent discharge of four employes who had been ordered reinstated by the arbitrator. The company has failed to re-employ these four as it had the other employes who had been "replaced" for observing the picket line.

The company had been ordered to submit the dispute over the firings to arbitration last July by U.S. District Judge George Harris. Arbiter Arthur C. Miller after lengthy hearings handed down his ruling more than a month ago.

Miller upheld in almost every detail the locals' contentions that Sears has breached its union contracts by locking out employes who respected the Machinists' picket line and by refusing to "consider or arbitrate the resulting grievances." Miller also cited a series of additional violations of the company's contractual commitments to the two unions.

The company's action became the basis of a consumer boycott launched by the San Francisco Labor Council that was endorsed by the AFL-CIO General Board and the National Chain Store Committee of the Retail Clerks.

PUERTO RICAN plant of Fleurs de France, where union workers are shown assembling artificial flowers, is visited by a task force of local and district officials from District 4, Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers. Group visited the island on study-tour to improve understanding of problems of members there and those of the union's Puerto Rican membership in the New York City and New Jersey area of District 4.

IUE Puerto Rican Study Aims At New Benefits for Members

A task force of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—with the expressed aim of bettering service to its expanding Puerto Rican membership—has made a whirlwind study-tour of the island commonwealth.

The group visited Puerto Rican plants under IUE contracts, vocational training schools, housing developments, a United Nations technical assistance project, the University of Puerto Rico and the island legislature, and also conducted educational conferences.

The 15-member task force was made up of local union and district officials of IUE's District 4, which encompasses metropolitan New York City, northern New Jersey and Puerto Rico.

Al Loewenthal, district education director, said the group's objectives were to become more familiar with the problems confronting Puerto Rican workers moving to the mainland and into the IUE; to consider the feasibility of an IUE-run job placement service for emigrating workers; and to study the possibility of extending to the island locals a pension and insurance program devised by the district for small locals.

Loewenthal said the extension of the district program to its island affiliates could mean that "thousands of Puerto Rican electrical workers today—and tens of thousands in the future—could enjoy the protections and benefits of a comprehensive health, accident and life insurance coverage as well as an effective pension program."

Pres. Hipolito Marcano of the Puerto Rico AFL-CIO in an address to the group urged stronger ties between mainland and island unions.

Loewenthal said the visitors received briefings from government officials who explained that the successful execution of economic plans over the coming decade could bring Puerto Rico to the current per capita income level of the bottom-most state on the mainland.

The group visited a handicrafts cooperative developed through UN assistance and designed to provide work for sugar workers during the off-season.

The IUE visitors also inspected a 5,000-family housing project in San Jose which included such features as an infirmary, a library, an adjacent school and a pre-school nursery for children of working mothers.

The group visited government-run vocational training schools and saw in operation a new section specializing in electronics. It also toured the island's university and learned that students were drawn largely from the lower middle class and upper lower class groups—where family income is $2,000 or less per year.

UAW to Seek Data on Speed-up for Bargaining

Detroit—Information for collective bargaining committees on how to slow down what workers charge is a constant speed-up in auto plants will be sought by the Auto Workers at a series of area conferences starting Feb. 20 and ending Apr. 4.

Thus the UAW will take a major issue—production standards—to the rank-and-file for answers that can be translated at the bargaining table this fall.

Auto industry contracts covering more than 600,000 UAW members in General Motors, Ford and Chrysler plants expire during August. Contracts with other companies in the auto and agricultural implement industries are due for renewal later in the year. They cover an additional 200,000 union members.

The "production standards" hearings will be conducted by a special UAW committee set up by the international executive board. The committee, headed by UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey, has been studying speed-up problems for a year.

Mazey said it will make specific recommendations for 1961 contract proposals on working conditions to the special collective bargaining conference in Detroit Apr. 27-29. The session will bring 3,500 delegates here from 1,275 auto locals in the United States and Canada.

Mazey has scheduled these hearing dates: Feb. 20, Los Angeles; Feb. 23-24, Detroit; Feb. 28, Flint, Mich.; Mar. 2, New York City; Mar. 9, Cleveland, O.; Mar. 14, Chicago; Mar. 17, Toronto, Ont.; Apr. 4, St. Louis, Mo.

"These hearings are being called," he said, "to get specific recommendations on how we can improve our collective bargaining agreements and do a better job in protecting members and improving working conditions."

UAW Radio Show Has Highest Rating

Shift Break, the UAW-sponsored radio show featuring Guy Nunn, had the highest rating in Detroit in December for any radio show on the air at the same time.

Pulse, a rating service, showed that Shift Break, on the air every weekday between 2:30 and 3:00 p. m. had a 3.3 rating for the half hour. The next highest rating in Detroit was 2.6.

Court Directs New Cross Co. Election

Cincinnati, O.—The Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals here has nullified a 1957 election won by the Auto Workers at the Cross Co. plant in Fraser, Mich., on the ground that the union used misleading campaign literature.

UAW Region 1 Co-Director George Merrelli said the union had urged the National Labor Relations Board to appeal the decision to the Supreme Court "in search of justice."

The court overruled an earlier finding by the NLRB regional director that the union's election-day handbills were "permissible election propaganda." The examiner also had recommended that the company be ordered to halt a series of unfair labor practices, including refusal to bargain with the union.

After denying the UAW certification at the Cross plant, the court ordered a new election to determine a bargaining agent.

Weaver Asks Unionists To Exchange Visits

Allentown, Pa.—An exchange of labor leaders with other countries as one way of improving international relations has been proposed by George L-P Weaver, special assistant to Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg.

Here for a program marking the 10th anniversary of the adoption of India's constitution, Weaver extended congratulations to the people of India and called for steps to create the "grand and global alliance" called for by Pres. John F. Kennedy to eradicate the "common enemies of man."

America has a vital interest in the future course of events in India, Weaver said, because men everywhere are involved in a world struggle for freedom.

"We have to begin," he said, "to accord to the labor movement around the world the same interest and concern, in the area of foreign diplomacy, which we have traditionally extended to other facets of societies abroad. We have to develop an expanded program of exchange, on a people-to-people basis, of foreign and American trade unionists, at every level."

Weaver also proposed "more effective continuity" and long-range guarantees in our assistance programs; priorities in foreign aid which "honor the ability and willingness" of nations to use our aid effectively; stabilization of world food and fiber prices, and methods for establishing "food banks."

Pointing out that India has 2.5 million trade unionists, the speaker said the fate of millions of Indian citizens could be determined by a "distinct minority, if the traditional pattern of quick Communist take-over is given an opportunity."

Weaver will become assistant secretary of labor for international affairs shortly after July 1, 1961. An adviser to two Intl. Labor Organization conferences, he worked in Asia nearly three years for the AFL-CIO and the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

CSA Emphasizes Leadership Role

New York—The development of "community leadership" has been given top priority in the 1961 program of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, according to Dir. Leo Perlis.

Perlis defined "community leadership" as "effective AFL-CIO participation" in the voluntary social welfare field in order for labor's views to have an impact on planning, policy making and program development.

In a letter to CSA staff representatives across the country, Perlis said development of labor's leadership role is necessary to implement such major CSA projects as meeting the needs of the unemployed, winning representation on hospital boards, blood banking, consumer counseling and pre-retirement planning.

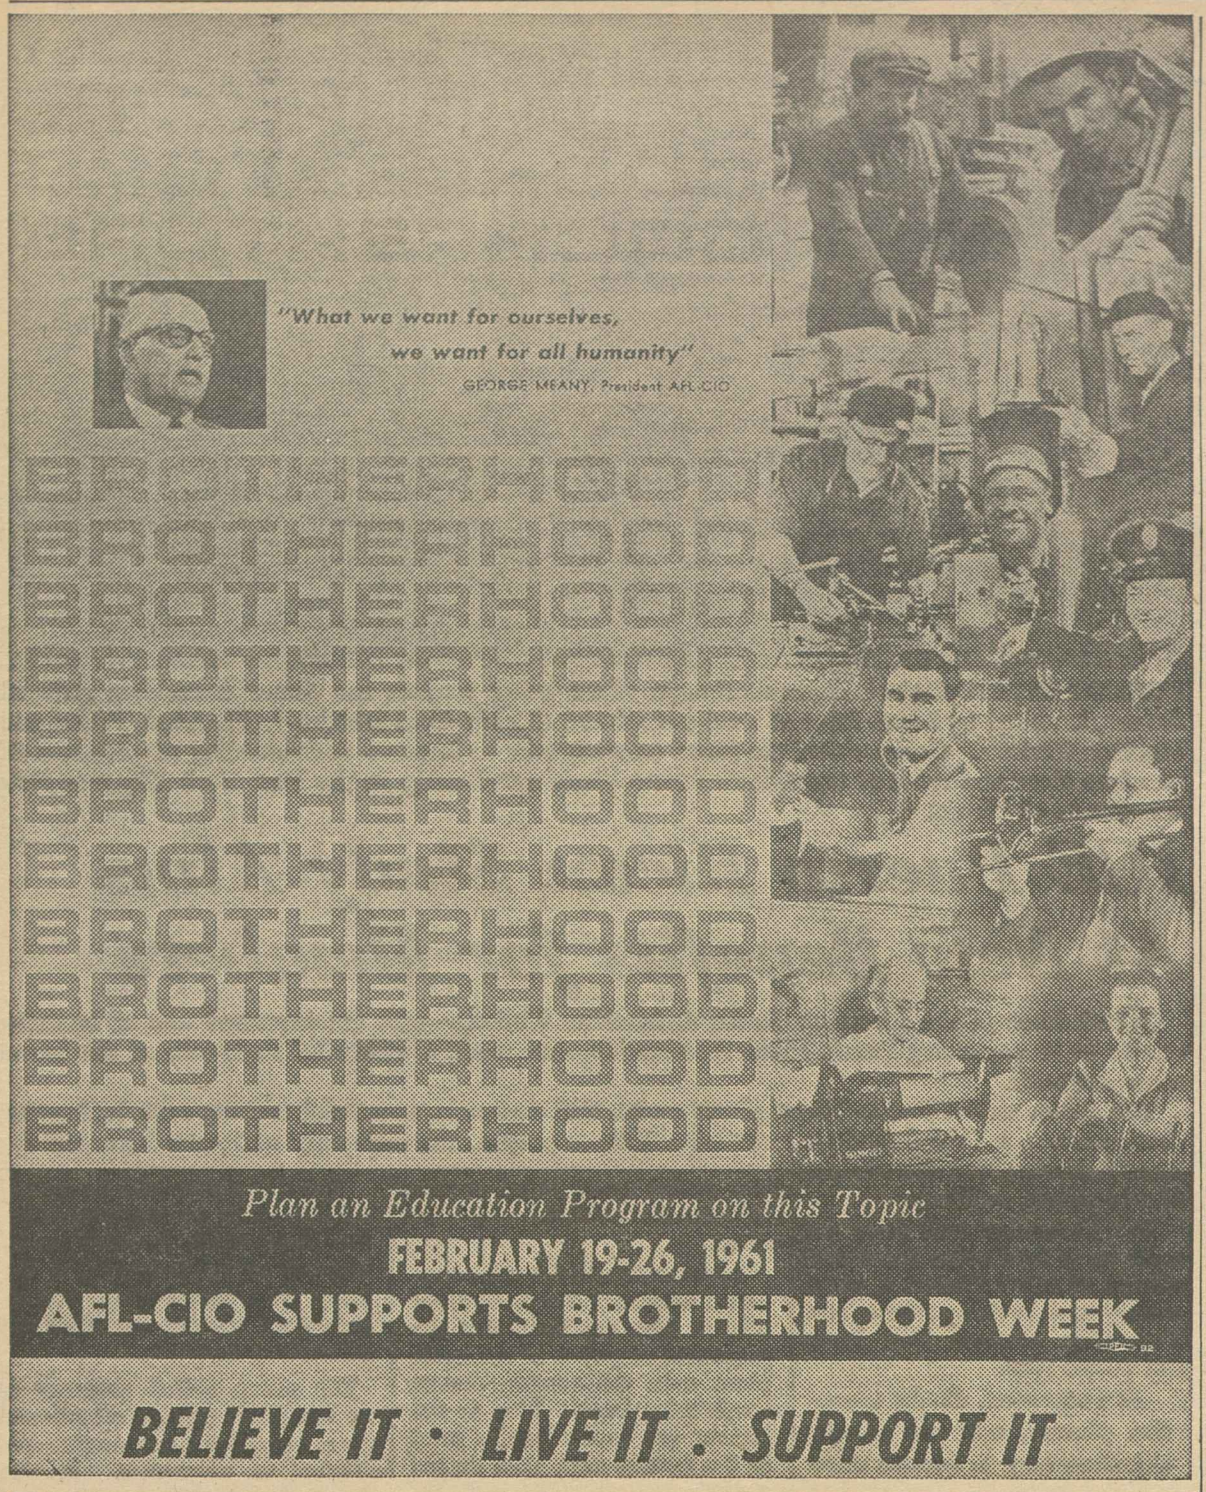
Unions Offered Discount On Tickets to 'Spartacus'

Union members across the country will be offered a special 15 percent discount on tickets for the motion picture "Spartacus" as part of a union effort to promote the American-union-made film epic.

In addition, local unions participating in the promotion of the film, being distributed by Universal-International Pictures, will receive a 5 percent rebate on the tickets purchased by their members.

The promotion has been tested by the Union Label & Service Trades Council of Greater New York.

Recently the Hollywood Film Council, comprised of unions and guilds representing more than 24,000 film industry employes, announced its members were serving as "voluntary press agents" for the motion picture as the answer to a growing trend by American producers to make films abroad in order to escape U.S. wage standards.



Schnitzler Tells Educationists:

Labor Must Broaden Community Appeal

Organized labor, "still a minority," must broaden its appeal if its goals are to be gained, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the annual AFL-CIO Education Directors' Conference in Washington.

The most important labor and social legislation on the statute books, he asserted, "was achieved with a labor movement one-tenth the size of what we have today." He said the Kennedy Administration "appears to be moving in the direction" organized labor has advocated, and expressed the belief that "now we have a friend in the White House."

"To make our voice heard and effective," he continued, "we need more than our own newspaper and magazine articles—there, in effect, we're talking to ourselves.

"How long is it going to take us to realize that we have to talk to others, to the man upstairs who doesn't belong to a union, and bring them the message we have? We'll find that they, too, have their own ways of making themselves felt. Our job is to get the message out to people outside the labor movement—and once it's out, we won't have to worry about the results."

Nearly 100 educators from international unions and state central bodies, as well as 35 from university labor education groups attended the two-day conference.

City Problems Highlighted

William Rafsky, development coordinator for the city of Philadelphia and formerly Hosiery Workers' education director, spoke on "Trade Unions and the Problems of Today's Cities" at a meeting presided over by Gus Tyler, education director of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Education Dir. Russell Allen of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. led the discussion.

Ray Marshall, professor of economics at Louisiana State University, reported on a study for the Fund for the Republic on "The Negro in American Unions," with comment by Boris Shishkin, AFL-CIO civil rights director, and Benjamin McLaurin, eastern zone supervisor for the Sleeping Car Porters. Lawrence Rogin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, presided.

Education Dir. Helmuth Kern of the Meat Cutters, subcommittee chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on Education, discussed the proposed AFL-CIO residential staff training center, and at the same session Joseph Mire told of projects of the National Institute of Labor Education, of which he is executive director.

Group sessions were held on a half-dozen phases of labor education activities.

$1.46 Sought In Labor Dept. Pay Hearing

Labor representatives recently recommended that the Secretary of Labor set a minimum wage of $1.46 an hour for work under government contracts in the manifold business forms industry.

Under the Walsh-Healey Act, the Secretary makes determinations of an industry's prevailing minimum wage, which must then be met by manufacturers working on government contracts in the industry.

The labor representatives emphasized at a hearing that $1.46 is not "fully equitable or adequate," but is the amount shown to be the "prevailing minimum" by an analysis of wages in non-union as well as union plants.

Union representatives participating in the hearing were Walter Allen, research director of the Printing Pressmen, Robert Munson, research director of the Bookbinders, and Seymour Brandwein, AFL-CIO economist.

The industry, which has some 22,000 workers in 168 plants, has about $8 million in government contracts annually, in large part for special forms used in electronic machine data tabulation.

School on L-G Forms Held at Knoxville

Knoxville, Tenn.—Union officers here went to school Feb. 4 to learn how to fill in correctly the forms required by the new Landrum-Griffin labor law. The school was sponsored by the Knoxville AFL-CIO and the U.S. Labor Dept.

7 Electrical Equipment Company Executives Jailed in Antitrust Case

ing so large a segment of the industry and finally, involving so many millions upon millions of dollars, were facts unknown to those responsible for the conduct of the corporation."

Of the 20 separate indictments handed down by a federal grand jury last year, GE and Westinghouse—the two biggest companies in the industry—were named in 19.

The indictments described in graphic detail secret meetings of top corporation officials at which each company's share of business was determined. Under the code name "phases of the moon," decisions were made as to which company should submit low bids for pending contracts.

The two principal companies involved issued contrasting public statements at the time of the sentencing.

Westinghouse expressed sympathy for the "anguish" suffered by those of its officials who were indicted and sentenced, described them as "respected and valuable" civic leaders and indicated that the company planned no disciplinary action against them.

General Electric's top officialdom washed its hands of corporate responsibility, declaring that "the improper acts of a few General Electric employes . . . were carefully hidden from those in the company charged with assuring compliance with the policy" of obeying antitrust laws.

Declaring that most of the officials involved had already been demoted or shifted to positions of lesser responsibility, GE described their price-rigging actions as "nonconformity" with the company's policy.

In sentencing the defendants, Judge Ganey proclaimed an exactly opposite view of the motives of the second echelon of indicted officials —those whom he fined or gave suspended sentences in lieu of jail.

He said he was "convinced" that these defendants "were torn between conscience and an approved corporate policy with the rewarding objectives of promotion, comfortable security and large salaries—in short, the organization or the company man, the comformist who goes along with his superiors and finds balm for his conscience in additional comforts and the security of his place in the corporate setup."

Maximum sentence possible under the antitrust laws was a year in jail and $50,000 fine on each charge. Jail sentences have rarely been handed out in antitrust cases.

Justice Dept. recommendations, prepared under the Eisenhower Administration, were for penalties slightly higher in most cases than the court imposed.

In a letter to the court, Robert F. Kennedy, the new Attorney General, asked that "sentences at least as severe as those recommended be imposed."

He declared that after having reviewed the cases he was "convinced that the conduct of the defendants, particularly the deliberate bid-rigging and price-fixing practiced against their government, was so willful and flagrant that even more severe sentences would have been appropriate."

In addition to the criminal penalties, the companies face possible civil suits by purchasers of equipment who may claim triple damages for overpricing resulting from the admitted conspiracies.

In addition to GE and Westinghouse, the following companies were fined for criminal antitrust violations:

Other Firms Fined

Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., Kuhlman Electric Co., Wagner Electric Corp., McGraw Edison Co., Federal Pacific Electric Co., I-T-E Circuit Breaker Co., Square D Co., Cutler-Hammer, Inc., Sangamo Electric Co., Ohio Brass Co., Lapp Insulator Co., Porcelain Insulator

Also A. B. Chance Co., H. K. Porter Co., Cornell-Dubilier Electric Corp., Hubbard & Co., Joslyn Mfg. & Supply Co., Moloney Electric, Southern States Equipment, Allen Bradley Controller Co., Carrier Corp., Ingersoll-Rand Co., Worthington Corp., C. H. Wheeler Mfg. Co., Foster Wheeler Corp., Schwager-Wood Corp. and Clark Controller Co.

Kennedy Sees Need For Business Code

Pres. John F. Kennedy has said that business groups "might well establish codes of ethical practice such as the trade unions have established." He said he hoped unions would live up to these codes, "which state a very high standard."

In reply to a question involving "economy-sized malpractice" by giant electrical companies, Kennedy at his Feb. 8 news conference said the business community should "consider what steps it could take to lift this shadow from its shoulder" and to "protect" itself from "the effort of these large companies to defraud the government."

THE JOB OF GETTING organized labor's message to all people, not just union members, was stressed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, right, at the annual AFL-CIO Education Directors' Conference in Washington. Here Schnitzler examines union educational material shown him by Larry Rogin, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

'Briefing Session' to Look at Economy

Program Launching Due Week of Feb. 20

The nation's No. 1 problem—the state of the domestic economy—is also No. 1 in the new public affairs television series, "Briefing Session," presented by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Two top economists, one an adviser to Pres. John F. Kennedy and the other to the recent Eisenhower Administration, cross swords in the first of the half-hour programs. Viewers in 14 cities will see the premiere during the week beginning Monday, Feb. 20.

Prof. Paul A. Samuelson of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who headed Kennedy's task force on the economy, and Prof. Henry C. Wallich of Yale, a member of Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers, discuss "The Economy—1961." This topic is one of six that will be explored in the light of the report of the President's Commission on National Goals.

Samuelson, 45, is president of the American Economics Association. He was consultant to several government departments in the Roosevelt and Truman Administrations. A native of Gary, Ind., he studied at the University of Chicago and earned his master's and doctor's degrees at Harvard.

Studied at Oxford, Harvard

Wallich, 46, was born in Germany but came to this country in 1935, after two years of study at Oxford. He also took his two advanced degrees at Harvard. He served with the Federal Reserve Bank, the Economic Cooperation Administration and other agencies before his appointment as a White House economic adviser.

"Briefing Session" will first be seen over 14 NET stations in 12 states. It will be broadcast on prime time in each case, and four of the first 14 outlets will have re-showings, two on Sunday afternoon.

A second group of NET stations will start the series two weeks later, and a third group will follow after another two weeks.

No National Hookup

The staggered schedule is required because the cost of making more than 40 separate tapes of the same show would be prohibitive. The NET stations do not have a national cable hookup like the commercial networks.

A schedule for the first 14 stations is published on this page. The additional outlets will be listed in later issues of the AFL-CIO News.

Union Urges 3-Way Agency As Textile Aid

The Textile Workers Union of America has proposed the creation of an industry-labor-public "permanent Textile Development Agency which can produce a crash program of research to convert this industry into one of growth instead of stagnation."

TWUA Pres. William Pollock, testifying before a Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Subcommittee on Textiles, also urged a series of tariff safeguards designed to assure "adequate protection against imports."

Pollock recalled that 1958 hearings held by the subcommittee produced recommendations which went "largely ignored" by former Pres Eisenhower's Interagency Textile Committee. Since then, he said, the 600 million square yards imported in 1958 have more than doubled—to approximately 1.3 billion square yards by the end of 1960.

Pollock proposed a range of governmental actions, such as public contracts and depressed areas aid, to stimulate the domestic industry and special re-employment assistance for textile workers now in "a twilight zone between unemployment and retirement."

Frank Gorman, legislative representative of the United Textile Workers of America, also urged action, declaring that "the situation has grown more critical, the need more urgent."

Textile industry leaders testified in favor of controls through a system of quotas, citing increased imports from Hong Kong and India.

'Briefing Session' Set For Debut in 14 Cities

Following is the "Briefing Session" broadcast schedule for the first 14 cities. Channel numbers are given after station call-letters. Showings begin Feb. 20, so "Tuesday" means Feb. 21, etc.

Referendum Approval Clears Way For Merger of Postal Clerk Unions

Sixty years of rivalry between two unions of postal clerks came to an end as members of the unaffiliated United National Association of Post Office Craftsmen voted overwhelmingly to merge with the AFL-CIO-affiliated Post Office Clerks.

Unification between the 35,000-member Craftsmen and the 100,000-member Post Office Clerks is expected to be transformed into three-way amalgamation this spring when the 25,000-member Postal Transport Association, an AFL-CIO affiliate, reconvenes its convention to act on a merger agreement signed by its officers.

There were indications that completion of the merger among the three postal clerk organizations might be followed by discussions about the possibility of forming "one big union" of postal workers—a proposal which has been strongly urged by Letter Carriers Pres. William C. Doherty.

A telegram to Doherty from Pres. E. C. Hallbeck of the Post Office Clerks, Pres. Paul A. Nagle of the Postal Transport Association and Pres. Joseph F. Thomas of the Craftsmen declined an invitation for immediate discussion of a single union but declared a willingness to discuss the matter after completion of the three-way postal clerk merger.

11-to-1 Vote

The UNAPOC referendum on approval of the merger agreement resulted in 11,087 for merger to 1,061 opposed, Thomas announced.

At the same time, a Boston postal workers' union, once affiliated with the former CIO, has voted almost unanimously to affiliate with the Post Office Clerks, Hallbeck announced.

Hallbeck said present plans for completion of the merger with the Postal Transport Association call for simultaneous conventions of the two organizations to be held in Washington—probably this spring in connection with an expected legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council. If the merger agreements are ratified by both unions, a joint one-day convention of the merged group would follow immediately.

Under the proposed three-way merger, Hallbeck and Sec.-Treas. John Bowen of the Post Office Clerks would hold the same offices in the merged organization which would be known as the United Federation of Postal Clerks, AFL-CIO. Nagle would become administrative vice president and Thomas would be director of organization. Other key officers of the participating unions would be assigned important posts within the new union.

Oil Workers To Set New Wage Goals

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, after completing a campaign to secure wage increases of 14 cents an hour for oil industry members, will move in April to initiate its next round of bargaining with the industry.

OCAW Pres. O. A. Knight has announced that five area meetings of oil union delegates will be held in April to discuss the desires of members for the next round of negotiations. Most oil contracts will not be open for negotiation until late in the year but the area meetings are a first step toward unified negotiations, Knight said.

Delegates from the mid-continent area will meet Apr. 14-15 in Kansas City; from West Coast and mountain states, Apr. 20-21 in Salt Lake City; Gulf Coast, Apr. 23-24 in Dallas; Great Lakes, Apr. 28-29 in Chicago; East Coast, Apr. 30-May 1 in Washington, D. C.

Each conference will elect two rank-and-file members to serve on the national bargaining policy committee for the oil industry, the union said. Proposed uniform bargaining goals recommended by the committee must be ratified by secret ballot vote of three-fourths of the local units affected.

Economists Ask Study Of Disarmament Impact

Thirty professional economists from universities and trade unions have asked Pres. John F. Kennedy and the Joint Economic Committee of Congress to analyze the impact which disarmament might have on the U.S. economy.

Such a study, the petition asserted, would help achieve these objectives:

- "Anticipate and thus minimize the inevitable problems of adjustment;
- "Remove the uncertainty and fear with which some regard the likely effect on them of disarmament;
- "Assure the world and ourselves that we can face the prospect of disarmament with confidence."

The group proposed that the Kennedy Administration "undertake a serious analysis of the alternatives to arms spending." They urged the Joint Committee to sponsor studies and take public testimony on the economic effects of disarmament and possible public policies.

The signers included author Robert Heilbroner and professors Seymour E. Harris of Harvard University and Adolph Lowe of the New School for Social Research.

Union signers included Solomon Barkin of the Textile Workers Union of America, Irving Beller of the Machinists, Ralph Bergmann and Roy A. Ockert of the Rubber Workers, George W. Brooks of the Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers, Harry Chester and Woodrow L. Ginsburg of the Auto Workers.

Also Charles W. Morton and Elwood Taub of the Woodworkers, Otto Pragan of the Chemical Workers, Ben B. Seligman of the Retail Clerks and Sumner M. Rosen of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. Rosen drafted and circulated the petition.

Congress Is the Arena

PRES. KENNEDY'S economic message to Congress with its detailed proposals to combat the recession and stimulate long-range economic growth demonstrates in concrete terms the new note of urgency and concern that is the hallmark of the opening weeks of his Administration.

His immediate concern with caring for the unemployed and stimulating the economy to provide jobs for those unemployed through no fault of their own reveals a feeling for people rather than statistics. His long-range growth proposals demonstrate an acute awareness of the essential weakening of America's economic strength over the past decade.

The fate of the President's program is now in the hands of Congress, and to a great extent in the hands of the citizens. For if the people respond favorably to the President's program, they will create in Congress the climate for quick approval.

Most of the issues have been subjected to intensive study and discussion over the past few years. The facts are in; what's needed now is action to match the new Administration's spirit of urgency and concern for our national well-being.

Salute to CBS

WITH LAST WEEK'S telecast of "CBS Reports: The Business of Health, Medicine, Money and Politics," the Columbia Broadcasting System once again earned the applause of every citizen concerned about the need for action in meeting the high costs of modern health care. It was a worthy follow-up to this same television network's brilliant documentary, "Harvest of Shame," which detailed the exploitation of migrant workers.

In its exploration-in-depth of the health care issue, CBS brought sharply into focus the various forms of prepaid health insurance now in existence, the staggering expense of illness and the refusal of organized medicine to face up to the realities of the problem.

It is to be hoped CBS will continue to probe courageously and profoundly into the social issues of our times on future shows in this distinguished series. Certainly a grateful American public will be watching.

No Single Standard

BY ALL ODDS of news judgment and public responsibility, there ought to be in progress at the moment a strenuous campaign to protect the free enterprise system from companies and business executives willing to sell the system down the river in order to assure themselves a guaranteed profit.

But a preliminary check of the nation's daily press fails to reveal any such campaign. If they were really interested the papers would be talking of thousands of firms and executives possibly engaged in price-fixing and bid-rigging. There is likewise no discernible cry for new federal regulation of business along the lines of full reporting and disclosures of pricing and bidding practices.

The sentencing of 29 manufacturers of heavy electrical equipment and 45 company executives of conspiring to fix prices and rig bids on government sales has received routine attention in the press. One or two papers have reported in depth the sentencing judge's statement that the case is a "shocking indictment of a vast section of our economy" and that the defendants have "mocked the image of that economic system of free enterprise which we profess."

But then perhaps it is too much to expect a single standard of responsibility for both business and labor.

Morgan Column Torn from Context:

News Commentary Distorted By Soviet Propaganda Machine

By Saul Miller

OF THE MANY INVENTIONS and discoveries to which the Soviets lay claim, there is one that goes unmentioned—the Soviet technique of feeding honest bits of news and opinion into its propaganda machine to produce gross distortions, outright lies and violently mangled information.

In most cases catching up with Soviet propaganda is a difficult task in terms of tracing the distortion to the original material and attempting to set the record straight. But occasionally the Soviets cite the source of their material and there is a chance to check back. This happened the other day in terms of the AFL-CIO News.

On Jan. 27, 1961, Radio Moscow broadcast in English to Africa an "item contributed by Yuriy Popov, member of the Soviet delegation to the first ILO regional conference recently held in Lagos."

The broadcast had Popov reporting a conversation with an African trade union leader who cited the "great difference between American statements for external and internal use." Popov says he was shown a copy of the AFL-CIO News. The broadcast then continues with this statement:

"The newspaper dated July 16, 1960, carried an article on the events in the Congo, in which the following was written in black and white. 'It may be said about the Belgian Congo that it is the largest zoo in the world, the biggest natural museum existing in Africa. How, the people of the Free World ask, is it possible to turn into a free nation a primitive people for whom field mice and flying ants are delicacies? It would be more logical if the Congolese people still waited some more.' "

The broadcast concluded: "No comments are needed, as they say. The statement published in the organ of the U.S. trade union speaks for itself."

ON JULY 16, 1960, the AFL-CIO News published excerpts from a broadcast by Edward P. Morgan, a commentator for the American Broadcasting Co. sponsored five nights weekly by the AFL-CIO. The column "Morgan Says" is a regular feature of the News, providing responsible and intelligent opinion on major issues.

The Morgan column appeared under a headline "Tragedy Stalks Independence of Unprepared Congo Republic." This is what it said in its opening paragraphs:

"The Belgian Congo might be called the world's biggest zoo, the greatest living museum in Africa. A huge place, a third the size of the United States, it abounds with natural sideshows, all manner of wild beasts—though alarmingly on the wane—living in the great preserves of Albert National Park, pygmies who hunt with poison darts and pose for tourists' photographs providing cigarettes are produced, savage tribes who still practice ritual cannibalism, and a total population of more than 13.5 million native Congolese many of whom are so ignorant of the meaning of the independence they are officially receiving tomorrow that they have inquired of missionaries, according to New York Timesman Homer Bigart, whether it comes wrapped in a package or whether they must go up to the bank and draw it out.

"How is it possible, gasps the incredulous western world, to make a free nation of a primitive people to whom field mice and flying ants are tasty delicacies; of whom at least half are illiterate, among whom there is not one trained Negro doctor, lawyer or engineer and from whose midst have emerged only sixteen college graduates, with only twelve Congolese rising to administrative positions in the Belgian colonial government?

"It is not possible. And yet the Congo republic has been born. Perhaps nothing that has happened in Africa shows more dramatically than this the explosive force of African nationalism and the inability of most western nations, notably our own, to face up to it as a fact.

"Logically it would have been better for the Congolese to wait. That is the way it was planned by the Belgians, who in recent generations have converted the ruthless exploitation of the nineteenth century to what might be called a kind of model paternalism. But the Belgian timetable was cut short fifty years by an infectious nationalism which simply would not wait."

The distortion of this honest analysis is a sample of the Soviet "truth" beamed around the globe, infecting and poisoning the populations of the new nations with a bitter anti-Americanism. It is a sample of the warped totalitarian mind hard at work subverting peace and freedom everywhere.

Morgan Says:

Low Business Morality Seen As Symptomatic of Nation's Ills

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THE AMERICAN CORPORATE morality got a caustic going-over in federal court in Philadelphia and it was high time. The split personality of the organization man has haunted the American dream long enough. In a sad but memorable scene before U.S. Judge James Cullen Ganey, the corrosively hypocritical though widely accepted practice of going to church on Sunday and being unethical the rest of the week received its come-uppance.

Morgan

In this case not only ethics but criminal violations of the law were involved. The occasion was the sentencing of seven business executives to prison terms and the fining of their corporations—whose trademarks are largely household words in electrical equipment—after all had pleaded guilty or no defense to charges of conspiring to fix bids and prices in the biggest antitrust case on record.

As mitigating circumstances, attorney after attorney for the defendants stressed that their clients were pillars of their communities. And pillars they were: a deacon of a church; a Chamber of Commerce president; member of a hospital board; chief fund raiser for the Community Chest; sponsor of local Little League baseball teams; respected and presumably respectable men, with their sons and daughters in the best colleges. But, like Pisa, the pillars leaned.

Not unsympathetically, Judge Ganey saw them torn "between conscience and an approved corporate policy" wherein the company man, the conformist "who goes along with his superiors . . . finds balm for his conscience in additional comforts and the security of his place in the corporate set-up."

While the Justice Dept. prosecutors were unable to pin specific charges on the topmost officials of General Electric, Westinghouse and others, Judge Ganey did not spare them with his words.

In a biting pre-sentence statement he said "one would be most naive indeed to believe that these violations of the law, so long persisted in, affecting so large a segment of the industry and finally, involving so many millions upon millions of dollars, were facts unknown to those responsible for the conduct of the corporation." Accordingly, he fined the companies heavily. In addition to this punishment, the industrial customers conspiratorily over-charged for electrical equipment may bring civil suits for treble damages. The Justice Department has already prepared similar suits on behalf of the government where bids were elaborately rigged on federal contracts.

BUT THE DAMAGES and the punishment are not so important as the conditions, the attitudes of society under which the violations were committed.

Judge Ganey penetrated to the heart of the matter in his statement. "What is really at stake here," he said, "is the survival of the kind of economy under which America has grown to greatness, the free enterprise system.

"The conduct of the corporate and individual defendants alike . . . (has) flagrantly mocked the image of that economic system of free enterprise which we profess to the country, and destroyed the model which we offer today as a free world alternative to state control and eventual dictatorship. Some extent of the vastness of the schemes for price fixing, bid rigging and job allocations," the judge went on, "can be gleaned from the fact that the annual corporate sales covered by these bills of indictment represent a billion and three-quarter dollars."

There are positive aspects to this shocking situation. The Eisenhower years may be generally remembered and/or regretted as the heyday of the "business administration in Washington." But the fact is that these prosecutions of the electrical industry were originated and pressed by the Justice Department under a Republican attorney general, William Rogers, and the judge went out of his way to commend Rogers' antitrust ace, young Assistant Attorney General Robert Bicks who spearheaded the action. And, as Judge Ganey also noted, the taxpayers were saved the expense of possibly endless litigation by the fact that both corporate and individual defendants "faced up to the situation realistically" and admitted their guilt. In the face of these admissions, there can be no appeal from the sentences.

In a very real sense, however, the country shares the guilt of these men and their companies. This is the era of expediency for material gain and under the expense-account psychology almost anything goes. Perhaps this signals an additional need for revision of the tax laws so that incentive may become more legitimate. But more is involved here than taxable technicalities.

With grasping greed we have been threatening a way of life. We cannot compete with communism on these terms because we are converting liberty to license. Let not just the business community but labor unions, bureaucrats and even bridge clubs take deeply to heart the lesson that Judge Ganey has so sharply pointed up.

Washington Reports:

Free World's Stake in Laos Emphasized by Zablocki, Judd

LAOS CAN and must be held for the Free World, Rep. Clement J. Zablocki (D-Wis.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on the Far East, and Rep. Walter H. Judd (R-Minn.), ranking minority member of the same committee, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 450 radio stations.

"We will be able to win in Laos if we have the fortitude to stand fast," Zablocki put it. "If we show one iota of weakness there, we are inviting trouble not only in Laos but in the whole world."

Judd asserted that the Red Chinese have developed a science of guerilla warfare "that we're derelict in having failed to study and adopt ourselves. They maneuver about and appear to be much stronger than they really are."

"If we don't succeed in Laos," Judd asserted, "it will be a great deal harder to defend Thailand, Burma, Vietnam and Cambodia. It's because we didn't win in Korea that we had Vietnam, and because we didn't win in Vietnam that we now face the Communists in Laos."

Zablocki pointed out that Pres. Kennedy had said in his State of the Union message, "We seek in Laos what we seek in all Asia and indeed all the world: freedom for the people and independence for the government. And this nation shall persevere in our pursuit of these objectives."

JUDD SUGGESTED that the subcommittee pass a resolution declaring that the members are opposed to the recognition of Red China and its admission to the United Nations, and that they believe "that careless statements made by officials on this situation weaken the stand of the United States."

Zablocki asserted that he didn't think the recognition of Red China is any closer than it was five or 10 years ago. He pointed out that the UN votes were "not on the admission of Red China, but on whether the issue would come up." He said he was of the opinion that if the vote were on the subject of admission, it would be overwhelmingly against.

"It's been a mistake to interpret these votes on a percentage basis," said Judd. "Actually there were practically the same number of countries voting against taking up the subject this last time as before. Many of the new countries were neutral.

"When you talk over the subject with them, you find they're afraid of Communist China. They're waiting to see how the issue is going. And how it goes depends on how firm we are."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

APPROXIMATELY six years, eight and a half months after the Supreme Court struck down the "separate but equal" doctrine as justification of segregated public school systems, a President of the United States has publicly endorsed the decision. Said John Fitzgerald Kennedy at his Feb. 8 press conference, in response to a question about the mob "intimidation" that "effectively frustrated" a court order in New Orleans:

"It is my position that all students should be given the opportunity to attend public schools regardless of their race, and that is in accordance with the Constitution."

Mr. Kennedy said he was still carefully considering how he could "most usefully" do something to help provide implementation of the New Orleans federal court decision.

He acknowledged, in effect, that he had not yet determined in what specific way and at what time he could "use the moral authority or position of influence of the presidency" to check control of New Orleans schools by mobs of shrieking women who have forced a boycott by white children and through economic coercion and other persecutions have terrorized white families defying the boycott.

On the "general question," he said, "students should be permitted to attend schools in accordance with court decisions."

There was, further, a "broader question" that went beyond the court decisions, he declared.

"I believe strongly that every American should have an opportunity to have maximum development of his talents, under the most beneficial circumstances, and that is what the Constitution provides."

IT IS NO DOUBT futile to speculate on what might have been the changed chain of events had former Pres. Eisenhower uttered comparable words in 1954, or in 1955.

Mr. Eisenhower, in any case, was never willing to respond affirmatively to the many questions in which answers endorsing the Supreme Court decision were invited.

He spoke often of the need for "patience" and awaiting the processes of education, but never did he indicate even moral sympathy with the result of the constitutional judgment of the court. He did not assail the court; he simply declined to express his concurrence.

The effect was to deny to southern white families and children willing to accept desegregation, to southern officials seeking help against passionate mobs and race-baiting politicians, "the moral authority or position of influence of the presidency."

NOW A FRESH START has been made, and although some situations have become at least temporarily frozen, even the worst ice jam yields to the warming effects of a changed climate.

The Deep South is a complex of its history and its traditions, but it is by no means monolithic in its social attitudes. It has perhaps more than its share of men of conscience and tolerance, of both races, partly because circumstances have compelled them to think deeply about the implications of an American society founded on the doctrine that all men are equal in their claim to a fair opportunity.

What they have needed, what they will need before the story is done, is moral sustenance and encouragement. What the embattled communities need is a chance to rebuild the bridges of understanding, of communication and cooperative work toward a decent goal, that were tumbled down by the ranters and the demagogues and rioters.

Another thing they need, surely, is a little less pious lecturing from those who are full of advice for officials and school boards hundreds of miles away and noticeably silent about forms of discrimination in their own communities and neighborhoods—in housing, in the field of job opportunities, in public facilities. They need a fair chance to use the new change.

THE SITUATION IN LAOS is difficult, but a setback there would threaten all Southeast Asia, commented Rep. Clement J. Zablocki (D-Wis.), right, on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Zablocki heads the House Subcommittee on the Far East. Rep. Walter H. Judd (R-Minn.), left, said the West must and can stand firm in Laos.

How to Buy:

Rising Cost of Rental Housing Spurs Growth of Co-op Plans

By Sidney Margolius

WHETHER YOU RENT or own your home housing very likely has become your largest single living expense. The Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates that housing, including operating and equipment expenses, now takes 33 percent of a moderate-income family's budget compared to 29 for food.

Housing actually has become the No. 1 consumer problem. For the first time a typical family must spend more for its shelter than for its food. In 1950, BLS figured that food took 30 percent of a moderate budget; housing, 26.

Housing costs are still climbing—steadily and stubbornly. But what's especially significant is that costs have risen noticeably more for families who rent than for homeowners. While overall housing costs have risen 32 percent since the 1947-49 period, rents have jumped 43 percent.

The rent boosts, especially in the larger cities, have spurred a rapid rise in housing co-ops as one of the few practical answers to this pressing problem. This is an idea that works. Big new apartment-house co-ops, sponsored largely by labor unions, are changing the face of New York City, transforming former slums into handsome developments surrounded by lawns and playgrounds.

The United Housing Foundation reports that already over 13,000 New York families live in co-op housing developments, which they own. A number of other big projects are under construction. In fact, Rochdale Village, now being built on the site of a former race track, will house 6,300 families, and the new ILGWU Houses, 2,800 more, according to Philip Dodge, writing in Co-op Report.

THE HOUSING CO-OP IDEA is spreading into other areas. In Cincinnati, Co-operative News Service reports, the new Park-Town Co-op will provide garden apartments for 323 member families. They'll pay down $250 for an efficiency apartment, and $650 for a three-bedroom unit. Monthly carrying charges, including interest, principal, taxes, insurance and maintenance, range from $70 a month to $100.

But one of the most unusual little housing co-ops you ever heard of is being organized by a group of ten moderate-income families in the heart of New York City. They have an idea that offers great promise to small organizations or groups of neighbors in large cities.

As you can see, most of the housing co-ops recently built or under construction are at least fair-sized, and are sponsored by organizations, generally large unions or jointly by a group of smaller union locals and other community organizations.

But this small band of pioneering families is working out their plan by themselves under the leadership of William Horvath, a Co-op housing technician, and Father William McPeak, assistant pastor of the neighborhood parish.

They're not aiming to build a big cooperative. They're not seeking outside help. What they want to do is take over one tenement—the kind they're now living in and paying high rents for the dubious privilege. They want to improve it gradually, operate it themselves and thus finally free themselves from unending exploitation by big-city landlords.

Horvath points out that if a five-room apartment in a 20-family house has rented for an average of $50 a month since 1900, the three generations of wage-earners who inhabited it have paid to landlords a total of $36,000. The 20 families in such a house have paid a total of $720,000.

THIS IS TRULY an Operation Bootstrap. Father McPeak explains that the families in the group are doing two things to bring their idea into being: They have organized a savings fund, and a study group.

Each participating family has agreed to deposit at least $2.50 a week in a local savings and loan association. After five months of saving and studying co-ops, any member can withdraw and get his deposit back. Those who want to go ahead then can buy a voting share in the new co-op corporation. In all, each member will have to put up a total of $200 as its share of the down payment.

Other capital for the down payment is being supplied by friends of the group who want to help it along by buying non-voting, interest-bearing shares.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Keep Asking Silly Questions And See How Far It Gets You

By Jane Goodsell

Q. HOW many hours of housework per day are necessary to keep a seven-room house in apple pie order?

A. Twenty-six.

Q. Can you give me an example of a nutritious, low-cost dinner menu for a family with growing children?

A. Certainly. Liver and rice loaf, diced beets, cole slaw, stewed fruit, fig newtons, milk or coffee. Nobody will eat it, but it's a nutritious, low-cost meal.

Q. If you are making hollandaise sauce and the telephone rings, what do you do?

A. Have something else for dinner.

Q. My teen-age daughter keeps nagging me for a skirt with sewed-down pleats. She's driving me crazy. How can I get her to stop?

A. By getting her a skirt with sewed-down pleats.

Q. It takes me 30 minutes to get my five-year-old ready for bed at night. Is this normal?

A. I hope not. It takes me almost an hour.

Q. My children keep losing things. Mittens, galoshes, hats, scarves, sweaters, things like that. What can I do about it?

A. Stop complaining. My children lose their coats.

Q. Every time I announce dinner is ready, my husband suddenly remembers that he has to wash his hands or make an important phone call. Why does he do this?

A. Because he's a man.

Q. How man sweaters does a high school sophomore need?

A. One more than she now has.

Q. How can I keep my family from spilling food on the dining room rug?

A. By eating in the kitchen.

Q. I work and slave all day, trying to keep our home nice, but my family doesn't appreciate anything I do. They track mud into the house, scatter orange peels and apple cores around, and never pick anything up or put anything away. What should I do?

A. Complain.

Q. My problem is dingy-grey dishtowels. Have you any suggestions?

A. Your problem is yourself. You're too much of a conformist. I think dingy-grey dishtowels are pretty.

Q. How do you cook rice so that each kernel is dry and fluffy?

A. I'll bet you're the same fusspot who was yammering about dingy dishtowels. Gluey rice is good. Tell people it's the way your grandmother used to fix it.

Full Employment Attained:

Sweden's Planning Stabilizes Economy

By Arnold Beichman

SWEDEN'S HIGHLY MANAGED industrial economy has since the war been able to maintain one of the lowest rates of unemployment in the Free World despite three recessions. This has been accomplished through a wide-ranging social-economic program in which government, labor and management have cooperated since the end of World War II.

The report comes from Bertil Olsson, director general of the Swedish Labor Market Board with national headquarters in Stockholm. Olsson, who is visiting the United States, has headed the organization since 1957.

The board, established by the Swedish Parliament, is the central authority for all labor market policies dealing with vocational guidance, youth and adult employment services, rehabilitation of handicapped workers, location and relocation of industry and, above all, the continuous planning for the maintenance of what is Swedish national policy—full employment.

Of Sweden's 7.5 million population, the work force is 3.4 million, including about 100,000 foreign workers. Despite three recessions since the war—1948-49, 1952-53, and 1958-59—unemployment has never been higher than 3 to 4 percent. As of November, 1960, the percentage of unemployment was 1.8 percent or between 60,000 and 70,000 persons.

"OUR PHILOSOPHY of full employment," said Olsson, "is that anyone who can and wants to work should have a chance to get a job. Parliament and the government have given us that responsibility.

"In addition, it is also our responsibility to maintain a stable price economy and we have succeeded in doing that. From May, 1958, to the present moment, the cost of living index has remained stationary while at the same time our standard of living has gone up through increased production at the rate of 3 to 4 percent annually. Wages and productivity have risen annually in the last five years at an average of 4 percent."

One of the most important weapons in combating unemployment is encouragement of geographical mobility of labor through the national employment exchanges.

An unemployed worker who registers at the exchange will be told there is a job suitable to his training in another city some distance away. The government will pay his travel and living expenses so that he can go to that city to see if he can get the job. If he gets the job the government will pay the expenses of moving his home and family to his new place of work. If he doesn't get the job or he finds it unsuitable, he goes back home and tries somewhere else.

Another stimulant to geographical mobility is the encouragement given municipalities to construct houses for the workers who are to move. About 95 percent of all Swedish housing construction is subsidized. However, as soon as it appears that a large number of workers will be moving to an area where there might be insufficient housing for newcomers, the municipalities are told they can get subsidies for additional housing. These must be rented to the new workers and their families.

THE BOARD is now proposing an additional stimulant to mobility—making it possible for a home-owning worker to sell his house without a loss so he can move. For example, in a depressed area, a worker with a house worth $10,000 might find it impossible to sell except at a substantial loss, say, for $6,000. The Board is proposing that in such a case, the government would pay the difference so that the worker could move without penalty.

Occupational mobility is another tactic used to keep down unemployment—if, for example, there is a slowdown in electrical employment, the marketing board will invite an unemployed metalworker to go to a vocational training school to learn how to be a television repairman. The training can last from 4 to 22 months during which period he is given a wage, plus allowance for his wife and children under 16.

The wage is usually about 70 percent of what he earned formerly. The worker, learning a new or allied trade, can supplement his income by taking a job after school hours. This training technique, according to Olsson, has been quite effective in retraining older workers in declining industries such as textile, shoes and leather.

Public works programs are a major factor in maintaining job opportunities. Such planning is possible because parliament approves the board budget for two years at a time. These funds can be used on an emergency basis if necessary. By this method, the board can place industrial orders with firms which are planning layoffs due to a decline in business.

"OUR MOST IMPORTANT APPROACH," said Olsson, "is continuous planning. It is too late to begin to plan when unemployment begins to increase. Our test for a project is that it must be effective within two months in providing jobs. If it appears that a suggested project will take more than two months to get into action, it is out of the plan."

Obviously, a program of this kind must be closely meshed with government fiscal policy. To this end, there is daily coordination with bank authorities and regular meetings between the ministry of labor and the ministry of finance. This kind of cooperation makes possible the stimulation of private investment and various tax incentives.

U. S. Acts in Picketing:

Braceros Barred to 16 Lettuce Growers

The federal government has moved into a potentially "explosive situation" in the lush lettuce fields of Southern California and barred 16 members of the Imperial Valley Farmers Association from using imported Mexican nationals.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg on Feb. 7 ordered completion of action begun Feb. 3 when the Mexican government urgently requested the removal of hundreds of its citizens from a labor camp to protect them from anticipated "acts of violence."

The Mexican minister to Washington, Eugenio de Anzorena, immediately afterward protested that the order affected only 584 Mexican nationals enlisted for work on the ranches and urged the Labor Dept. to expand the directive to remove all 1,723 the Minister said were there.

The AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee and the Packinghouse Workers—as the Labor Dept. order related the facts—began picketing activities at the ranches about Jan. 13 seeking recognition and higher wages. The scene was near El Centro, about 200 miles southeast of Los Angeles and near the Mexican border. A total of 657 domestic workers were involved.

The Labor Dept. said the arrival of some 200 to 300 farmers from the northern part of California on Feb. 1 and 2 "added to the stress and tension" of what was becoming "an explosive situation." The growers' caravan moved in, as they described it, "to save the harvest."

Glenn E. Brockway, West Coast regional director of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Employment Security, carried out Goldberg's order and revoked the authorizations of the 15 growers to use 1,939 braceros because the situation represented "a menace to the health and safety of the Mexican national workers."

Mexican Government Lauded

Frank L. Noakes, chairman of the U.S. Section of the Joint U.S.-Mexico Trade Union Committee, said American labor "stands fully behind" the Mexican government in the latter's withdrawal order.

"Once again," Noakes declared, "the workers of the United States have seen the Mexican government stand firmly behind the assurances it has repeatedly given to the Joint Committee that it will never allow the Mexican contract workers coming to the United States to be used as strikebreakers or in other ways which will adversely affect the interests of domestic farm labor."

Some 440,000 Mexican workers a year have been brought into the U.S. under a bilateral agreement to work on corporate farms. The imported Mexicans have accounted for up to 90 percent of the workforce in the Imperial Valley, with some 8,000 reportedly there for the current lettuce harvest.

In the rapidly-changing situation:

- The AWOC and the UPWA led picketing at 16 ranches where Mexican nationals were in use and were joined by domestic workers who left the fields.
- The U.S. Dept. of Labor and the California Dept. of Employment ruled these strikes were legal, a decision which barred the use of Mexicans under the compact.
- Growers secured a court injunction to prevent the government rulings from being put into effect and about 13 unionists were arrested on charges of unlawful assembly.

Brockway said in his order that increasing union demonstrations "created tension and unrest on the part of Mexican nationals" who were transported by growers through picket lines.

The events moved to a climax on Feb. 2 with a demonstration outside an El Centro labor camp where some 1,150 Mexicans were housed and with the arrival of the growers' caravan. The Mexican consul at Calexico, under orders from the Mexican Embassy in Washington, urgently requested the Mexicans' withdrawal.

Brockway's order said the growers' association must make a special effort to reassign the Mexican nationals to other approved members who are not being struck.

SOME OF THE DIFFICULTIES that must be overcome before a liberal program can be pushed through Congress were discussed by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) at the Legislative and Civil Rights Conference of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in Washington. Seated next to the podium is IUE Sec.-Treas. Al Hartnett, who presided at the luncheon.

IUE Plans Series of Meetings To Press for Liberal Legislation

By Gervase N. Love

A nationwide series of meetings to press for passage of a liberal congressional program was announced by Sec.-Treas. Al Hartnett of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at the union's Legislative and Civil Rights Conference in Washington.

Hartnett, chairman of the IUE's Civil Rights Committee, in a keynote address declared the two-day conference was the beginning "of a hurricane in action set on the removal of any element that would seek to deprive America of the enactment of a decent legislative program."

The parley drew about 200 IUE members who heard a series of talks on national legislative programs by members of Congress.

Hartnett called for a "Fortress America which has as its principal weapon not guns but human understanding — a Fortress America which by her care for her elderly, her young, her middle-aged, her black, her white, her yellow, her sick, blind, lame and healthy, by an ever-increasing standard of living, says 'This is our strength, this is the kind of thing to which we ask you to be attracted, this is the kind of society we offer to all who will follow us'."

IUE Pres. James B. Carey said there were difficulties ahead in Congress for social and civil rights legislation this year.

"There is no clear liberal majority in Congress," he warned.

"Time and again we have deluded ourselves into thinking that that majority of Congress was of a liberal bent. Time and again we have suffered at the hands of what we thought was a liberal Congress."

'Obligation to Criticize'

Carey recalled that organized labor has never affiliated with any political party and "cannot fall into the trap of blind allegiance even to the candidates we support."

"We wholeheartedly supported Pres. Kennedy's candidacy," he added, "and we think that his will be an extremely liberal and constructive Administration. This does not free us of the right and obligation to criticize Pres. Kennedy when we think he has made mistakes."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) told the delegates that under the Kennedy Administration the country is "coming out of the long sleep," with its first task "to clear away the rubbish and separate substance from baloney."

"The Republican Administration slipped so many things under the rug it looks like the Sierra Nevadas," he said, predicting passage of the bulk of the Kennedy legislative program.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) foresaw difficulties in store for liberal legislation, partly because of the changing character of the liberal coalition. An improved civil rights picture, he insisted, calls for congressional and judicial action as well as the administrative action he said the Kennedy forces seem to be concentrating on.

Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.) expressed confidence that legislation this year will alleviate the hardships of migrant farm workers. He said a special showing of the film, "Harvest of Shame," had resulted in "a great wave of sympathy" among members of Congress.

AFL-CIO Assistant Organizing Dir. Alan Kistler, describing the work of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee in California, said 90 percent of the cherry crop is now picked under union conditions.

Other speakers included Mrs. Viola McFerrin, one of the Tennessee sharecroppers who lost her home after she and her husband registered to vote; and Representatives Alfred Santangelo (D-N.Y.) and Alvin E. O'Konski (R-Wis.).

The delegates, who visited their senators and congressmen in support of organized labor's legislative program, adopted resolutions supporting voting rights in Tennessee for all citizens, endorsing the basic Kennedy legislative program, calling on both parties to carry out their platform pledges on civil rights, and reiterating the IUE's five-point civil rights program.

Histadrut Center Aids Asia, Africa Progress

A training school founded in Tel Aviv by Histadrut, the Israeli federation of labor, will be remembered in time as one of the most constructive ideas for developing a middle leadership in Africa and Asia.

This judgment was offered by Francis Offner, a public relations staff member of the Israeli Embassy in Washington, D. C., in an interview on "As We See It," AFL-CIO public service radio program. Offner once was a correspondent in Israel for the Christian Science Monitor and the former AFL News-Reporter.

The AFL-CIO has furnished funds for scholarships to the school.

Offner said the training center uses the work-study approach and currently has some 70 students from a score of countries enrolled for six-month courses.

He said the course content covers the theory, structure and operation of cooperatives. "After a few months of theoretical courses," he explained, "the students go on to work in either farming cooperatives of various types or housing, credit or servicing cooperatives.

"By the time the students finish and go back to their home countries, they are able to pass on their knowledge to fill the terrible, menacing gap which exists in these new countries between the top leadership and lowest levels of the population."

Offner, a European refugee who made his residence in Israel in 1945, said there is a mutual attraction between Israel and the less developed nations because they have common problems.

He said the newer nations of Africa and Asia feel they face a dilemma in the rival systems of the big powers. They admire the progress of the western world, he said, but feel it may take too long for them to follow the same path and they fear a renewal of colonialism. He said they see examples of short-cut progress in Russia and China but fear the accompanying lack of freedom.

Israel offers the example of a new and young country which is not suspected of colonialism and which has made progress in its 12 years of existence, Offner said.

Disabling Job Injuries Down Slightly in 1960

On-the-job injuries which disabled workers for one day or longer dipped slightly last year but the number of deaths remain unchanged, according to preliminary estimates by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Dept. of Labor.

The report showed that:

- Disabling injuries dropped from 1.97 million in 1959 to 1.96 million in 1960, a decline in the injury rate from 31.2 to 30.5 per 1,000 workers; the number of people at work rose slightly.
- Deaths in both years totaled 13,800, at the rate of 22 per 100,000 workers despite somewhat higher employment in 1960. The death rate is the lowest since the BLS began to keep records in 1936.
- Some degree of permanent physical impairment, ranging from partial loss of the use of a finger to complete inability to do any kind of work in the future, was suffered by 83,000 workers, compared to 84,200 such cases in 1959.
- Work injuries and deaths resulted in the loss of about 41 million man-days of work; projecting the future effects of deaths and permanent disabilities indicates the total loss will be about 167 million man-days, or the equivalent of a year's full employment for 540,000 workers.

The BLS said the principal decrease in injuries came in manufacturing and construction, with preliminary reports indicating a drop of 5 to 7 percent in the average injury-frequency rate. Total hours of exposure to job injury were virtually unchanged as employment rose slightly but the workweek was somewhat shorter.

Employment and injuries both dropped in transportation, but the number of fatal injuries rose.

There were increases in injuries in mining, trade, finance, service and government. The increase in state and local government injuries about reflected the rise in employment, but the rise in injuries to federal government workers jumped considerably as a result of the disastrous Brooklyn Navy Yard fire, which in addition sent the U.S. employe death total above that of previous years.

ILG States Policy On Organizer Unit

Atlantic City, N. J.—The executive board of the Ladies' Garment Workers has voted not to oppose representation proceedings by staff organizers seeking a bargaining unit.

At the same time the board said it would oppose recognition of a bargaining unit covering business agents on the ground that their duties are "directorial in nature."

The action came after receiving a request for recognition from a group claiming to represent both business agents and organizers.

The board said it had also designated a personnel review committee to consider grievances and to make recommendations to the board on wage and personnel problems.

FRANK W. McCULLOCH
Named as NLRB Chairman

WILLIAM E. SIMKIN
Chosen as Mediation Director

McCulloch Appointed Labor Board Chairman

the Senate. The current NLRB chairman, Boyd Leedom, will remain on the board as one of its five members. His term runs to Dec. 16, 1964.

Meanwhile the opportunity was presented Kennedy to make an early selection of his second board appointee as Joseph Alton Jenkins, whose term would have expired next August, announced he was resigning Mar. 28 to become regional director of a new NLRB office being opened in Albuquerque, N. M.

McCulloch, 55, was one of the founders of Americans for Democratic Action in 1947 and has been a member of its board of directors ever since. He is currently chairman of ADA's executive committee.

A native of Evanston, Ill., he was graduated from Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., and received his law degree from Harvard University in 1929. In the middle '30s he was industrial relations secretary of the Congregational-Christian Church Social Action Council and served for three years as director of the Labor Education Division of Roosevelt College in Chicago.

Simkin, the new mediation chief, was principal of Central High School in Sherwood, N. Y., from 1928 to 1930, and head of the science department at Brooklyn Friends School from 1930 to 1932.

Following his labor board service during World War II, Simkin entered the arbitration field. Since 1939 he has served as impartial arbitrator of the men's clothing and women's dress industries in Philadelphia and for the past 10 years has been permanent arbitrator for American Viscose Corp., Crucible Steel Co. and National Can Co.

In other actions, Kennedy announced the appointments of:

- Allen S. Boyd, a member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, as its new chairman.
- Robert T. Murphy, counsel of the Senate Commerce subcommittee on aviation, as a CAB member.
- Paul Rand Dixon, general counsel of the Senate anti-monopoly subcommittee, as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.
- Philip Elman, assistant to the solicitor general, to membership on the FTC.
- William L. Cary, professor of law at Columbia University, as chairman of the Securities & Exchange Commission.
- Former Sen. J. Allen Frear (D-Del.), to the SEC.
- Burke Marshall, a Washington lawyer, as Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Civil Rights Division.
- Stanley Sterling Surrey, a tax expert at Harvard Law School, as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.
- Dr. Arturo Morales-Carrion, under-secretary of state for the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs.
- Frank P. Briggs, Macon, Mo., newspaper publisher, as Assistant Secretary of the Interior.
- Robert E. Giles, former administrative assistant to Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges when the latter was governor of North Carolina, as general counsel of the Commerce Dept.
- Herbert J. Waters, administrative assistant to Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), as special assistant to the director of the Intl. Cooperation Administration.
- Philip M. Stern, editor and publisher of the Northern Virginia Sun, Arlington, Va., as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs.

Stern's newspaper recently was found guilty of unfair labor practices by a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner after the Sun refused to bargain with the Typographical Union. Another of the Sun's owners, George Ball, was named earlier by Kennedy as Assistant Secretary of State for Eeonomic Affairs. The Ball appointment drew a stiff protest from ITU Local 101 in the nation's capital.

- Wallace Turner, 39, news director of TV station KPTV in Portland, Ore., a Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter and recipient of two Heywood Broun Awards for reporting from the Newspaper Guild, as Assistant to the Secretary for Public Affairs in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

First Step Is Stronger U.S. Economy:

Kennedy Submits Program To Halt Drain on Dollars

The "effective performance" of the American economy is the "first requirement" for a solution of the balance of payments problem, Pres. John F. Kennedy told Congress in a special message.

He called for "economic progress at home" and steps to "improve our technology, lower our production and marketing costs and devise new and superior products under conditions of price stability," adding:

"A dynamic economy producing goods competitively priced in world markets will maintain the strength of the dollar."

Kennedy presented an 18-point program to improve domestic monetary machinery and strengthen international cooperation in the economic and monetary policy areas and to correct the "persisting basic deficit in our balance of payments."

The program includes proposals for the Senate to approve United States membership in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development; amendment of the Federal Reserve Act to permit American banks to pay higher interest rates on deposits of foreign governments and monetary authorities; amendment of the tax laws to prevent tax evasion by American private capital using "tax-haven" countries; and repeal of legislation allowing tourists to bring home up to $500 of foreign goods duty-free, cutting the exemption back to the pre-1948 level of $100.

Continuing Deficit Cited

Kennedy told Congress that for the past decade "our international transactions have resulted in a deficit—payments were in excess of receipts in every year" except 1957.

The surplus of exports over imports, while substantial, he said, has not been large enough to cover expenditures for U.S. military establishments abroad, for capital investment abroad by private American businesses and for government economic assistance and loan programs. "All of these outlays are essential," said Kennedy.

Kennedy pledged that the U.S. official dollar price of gold "can and will be maintained at $35 an ounce. Exchange controls over trade and investment will not be invoked. Our national security and economic assistance programs will be carried forward. Those who fear weakness in the dollar will find their fears unfounded."

He called for maximum emphasis on "expanding our exports," with the government playing "a more vigorous part in helping to enlarge foreign markets for American goods and services."

But he stressed that "a return to protectionism is not a solution. Such a course would provoke retaliation; and the balance of trade, which is now substantially in our favor, could be turned against us with disastrous effects to the dollar."

The U.S., he declared, "must take the lead in harmonizing the financial and economic policies for growth and stability of those industrialized nations of the world whose economic behavior significantly influences the course of the world economy and the trend of international payments."

Interest Rate Changes Invoked by White House

The Kennedy Administration is revising the nation's monetary policies as part of its program designed to promote recovery from the recession and ease the impact of the balance of payments problem.

The Administration's approach is designed to lower long-term interest rates for general construction, housing, community development and other productive investment while checking the decline in short-term interest rates directly affecting the balance of payments.

In his economic message to Congress, Pres. Kennedy said the recession and the balance of payments problem call for "two apparently contradictory objectives: checking declines in short-term rates that directly affect the balance of payments and increasing the flow of credit into the capital markets at declining long-term rates of interest to promote domestic recovery."

These objectives can be achieved he said "but only with close cooperation among all governmental agencies involved."

The basic agencies involved are the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board. All indications at the moment are that these agencies are cooperating to achieve the President's objectives.

FHA Interest Cut

The President took the initial step in reducing long-term rates by directing the Federal Housing Administration to reduce the maximum permissible interest rate on FHA-insured loans from 5.75 to 5.5 percent, as well as directing the Community Facilities Administration to reduce interest rates on new loans for public facilities.

The Federal Reserve Board is reportedly moving to prevent a decline in short-term interest rates. The drop in domestic short-term interest rates has been a major factor in the flow out of the country of funds normally invested for short periods. This "hot money" seeking higher interest rates overseas helped touch off speculation in the international gold market.

The FRB is departing from its so-called "bills only" practice of the past seven years. This means that when the FRB is influencing money and credit through purchases and sales of government securities, it buys and sells only short-term Treasury bills.

More Funds Provided

By moving into the medium or long-term market the FRB could provide the banking system with more funds for lending during a business slow-down without driving up prices on short-term bills and thus further depressing short-term interest rates.

The Treasury has moved also to hold and attract short-term funds and stop the overseas movement by offering 3.25 percent interest on a new $7 billion issue of 18-month notes.

Labor Backs Recession Program, Questions Kennedy's Tax Policies

Reuther noted that Kennedy's tax program had not yet been submitted to Congress, but cited a reference in the economic message to "additional incentives for investment in plant and equipment." This he described as "an unnecessary and unwise concession to adherents of the discredited 'trickle-down' theory so well beloved by the previous Administration."

"Dubious" Incentives

Encouraging investment to expand capacity is of dubious merit when an industry is operating only 75 percent of the capacity it now has—about the current average for industry as a whole—Reuther observed. If demand strains existing capacity, he said, no incentives are needed.

Investment for modernization, without increasing production, may be profitable for the company that undertakes it, but serves no general good since it invariably displaces workers, Reuther said. Such investment should not be financed by public funds in the form of tax concessions, he argued.

Higher consumer purchasing power is the indispensable element in a higher demand for goods, which in turn will be stimulus enough for new investment, Reuther said.

The AFL-CIO proposed six specific additions or improvements in the Kennedy 12-point program.

They are a temporary tax reduction when unemployment reaches 7 percent; temporary increases in the amount as well as the duration of unemployment benefits, and faster action on permanent federal standards for the system; a provision that the $10 increase in minimum social security benefits cannot be used to cut supplementary state assistance to the aged; a $1.25 minimum wage at once, rather than in steps; a cut in FHA interest rates to 4.5 percent, instead of 5.5, and an end to discounting; $300 million in federal incentive grants for public works projects.

The statement also lists 22 other measures "essential to balanced and vigorous economic growth," most of which were covered in AFL-CIO testimony before the Democratic and Republican platform committees last year.

Pamphlet Tells How Class Studied Unions

Methods used by a Boulder, Colo., high school history teacher in teaching the labor movement and collective bargaining methods to her classes are explained in a new pamphlet published by AFL-CIO.

Called "Teaching High School Students About Labor Unions," the eight-page pamphlet, AFL-CIO publication No. 113, may be ordered from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Single copies are free; up to 100 copies may be ordered at 5 cents each; over 100 copies at 4 cents each.

The pamphlet tells how Shirley Ward, past president of her Teachers' local, taught her classes to form into "unions" and to bargain collectively with the teacher as "management." The publication has an appreciation of teachers written by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers, chairman of the AFL-CIO Education Committee.

Congress Asked for $1.25 Minimum Pay

Kennedy Also Seeks Extended Coverage

Pres. John F. Kennedy has called on Congress to extend protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to 4.3 million additional workers—including 2.8 million in retail trade—and to raise the minimum wage, by steps, to $1.25 an hour.

Kennedy's proposal was virtually the same as the bill bearing his name as sponsor which the Senate passed last year. By resubmitting the same bill the President thus, in effect, challenged the House to go beyond the minimal measure it passed last year, calling for a $1.15 wage and coverage for only 1 million more workers.

Efforts to compromise the Senate and House bills in conference during the post-convention session of Congress were blocked by the conservative coalition.

The President said his proposal for gradual increases in the minimum—in three steps for those presently protected and four steps for newly covered workers—had been "carefully set at levels to which employers can readily adjust."

Within a matter of hours after Kennedy's minimum wage program was sent to Capitol Hill Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) formally introduced the Administration bill and announced that his Labor subcommittee would open four days of hearings on the measure Feb. 17, with Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg as the first witness.

Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, indicated he would follow up with hearings by the full committee on Feb. 23, and expressed the hope that the bill would be passed by both the House and Senate before the April Easter recess.

Letter Cites Need

In covering letters to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.), Kennedy said the nation "can ill afford to tolerate the growth of an underprivileged and underpaid class," and added that "substandard wages lead necessarily to substandard living conditions, hardship and distress."

Since the last increase in the minimum—from 75 cents to $1, which took effect Jan. 1, 1956—"both living costs and productivity have increased to such an extent," the President said, "that the proposed bill merely reflects an adjustment to keep pace with these factors."

The Administration measure would:

● Raise the hourly minimum of currently protected workers to $1.15 within 60 days after enactment into law; to $1.20 the second year and to $1.25 the third.

● Bring newly covered employes under the act at an initial minimum of $1. This would go to $1.05 the second year, $1.15 the third year and $1.25 the fourth.

● Provide a three-step increase in existing wage orders in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. The first increase would be 15 percent above present levels, while the second and third, coming at one-year intervals, would be 5 percent each.

● Extend coverage, in addition to 2.8 million workers in retail trades, to 130,000 employes of laundries and cleaning plants; 110,000 employes of local transit systems; 100,000 seamen; 800,000 workers in the construction industry; 30,000 switchboard operators in small telephone exchanges; and 33,000 workers in seafood processing.

For newly covered employes no maximum hours requirements would be established the first year so that employers "could make the initial adjustment to the minimum wage." In the second year, overtime rates would be effective after 44 hours. This would drop to 42 hours in the third year and 40 hours thereafter.

Still excluded from coverage would be employes of hotels, motels, restaurants and motion picture theaters. The Kennedy proposal would extend minimum wage protection, but not overtime coverage, to workers in on-shore fish processing and gasoline service stations.

The Labor Dept. estimated that 804,000 of the newly covered employes under the Administration plan currently make less than $1 an hour. It was also estimated that 1.9 million of those presently protected are paid less than the $1.15 which would become effective as the first step in the Administration proposal.

Proposal 'Modest'

Accompanying Kennedy's message to Congress was a letter to the White House from Goldberg describing the proposed changes as "comparatively modest" and ones which, having been subjected to hearings, deliberations and debate in the 86th Congress, can be enacted "effectively and expeditiously."

"More than 20 years have passed since Congress enacted the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938 to provide a modest floor under wages and an equally modest ceiling over hours," Goldberg wrote to the President.

"A whole generation of Americans has entered our work force since Congress pledged itself to correct and as rapidly as practicable to eliminate labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of minimum standards of living necessary for the health and general well-being of our workers.

"Unfortunately for many American workers, the conditions deplored by the 75th Congress are still with us today. We must not leave these workers with no more assurance in 1961 than they had in 1938 that their wages will provide the minimum standards of living to which they are entitled."

Press Agent Leaves $10,000 to Union

New York—Joseph Flynn was one of the theater's best-known, best-loved press agents. His normal habitat was Broadway but his work took him into nearly every big city in the United States and Canada as advance man for road shows.

Flynn was also an active and dedicated union man. He was a member of Theatrical Press Agents & Managers Local 18032—a directly affiliated federal local—from 1938 until his death last year at the age of 73.

Recently, from the attorneys for Flynn estate, the union received a check for $10,000—earmarked for the local's welfare fund. It was Flynn's legacy to his union.

'We Were Just Jaywalking'

Rules Committee Gets 3 GOP Conservatives

Three conservative Republican congressmen, with records of opposition to key measures on Pres. John F. Kennedy's liberal legislative program, have been named by the GOP House leadership to posts on the pivotal Rules Committee.

Chosen to fill out the minority party's representation were Representatives Katharine St. George (N. Y.), H. Allen Smith (Calif.) and Elmer J. Hoffman (Ill.).

The appointments came as an aftermath to House approval, by a 217-212 vote, of a proposal by Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.) to enlarge the committee and thus break a conservative Republican-southern Democratic coalition which in the past had blockaded many liberal economic measures.

In the 86th Congress, Mrs. St. George, Hoffman and Smith all voted against final passage of the House school aid and depressed areas bills, and voted for a coalition-sponsored $1.15 substitute for a committee-approved $1.25-an-hour minimum wage bill similar to one backed by Kennedy in the Senate.

The three have histories of "wrong" votes on key measures, according to the 1960 voting analysis of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. COPE's record showed Mrs. St. George with 36 "wrong" votes and only five "right" votes, for an 87.8 percent "wrong" score; Smith with 21 "wrong" and two "right," for a 91.3 percent "wrong" average; and Hoffman, who served his first term in the 86th Congress, with no "right" votes and 10 "wrong," for a 100 percent "wrong" record.

Join 2 'Right-Wingers'

They join two other right-wing GOP members—Clarence J. Brown (O.), with 90.4 percent "wrong" on the COPE record, and B. Carroll Reece (Tenn.), with 76.6 percent "wrong."

Despite the addition of three more conservative Republicans, liberal and moderate Democrats are expected to be in effective control since the House-approved plan to enlarge the committee made it possible for the Democratic caucus to name two new members with records of support for Kennedy's proposals.

The new Democratic members are Rep. Carl Elliott (Ala.) and Rep. B. F. Sisk (Calif.). Sisk supported last session all major bills now part of the Kennedy program. Elliott supported minimum wage and depressed areas bills. He voted for the school aid bill in committee but against it after Republicans attached an anti-segregation amendment on the House floor.

Democratic holdovers on the committee included Chairman Howard W. Smith (Va.) and William M. Colmer (Miss.)—the conservatives who joined with the GOP in the old coalition—and Representatives Ray J. Madden (Ind.), James J. Delaney (N. Y.), James W. Trimble (Ark.), Homer Thornberry (Tex.), Richard Bolling (Mo.) and Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (Mass.).

Deadline for Scholarships Is Extended

The National Institute of Labor Education has announced that full- and part-time union officials have until March 15 to apply for full-tuition scholarships providing 10 weeks of intensive residential study this summer at three major universities.

The deadline was extended from Jan. 1 when 15 scholarships out of 60 remained unclaimed.

The NILE program is planned primarily for full-time union officers and staff representatives, though qualified part-time officers also may be sponsored by their unions. Class size will be limited to 20 each at Cornell University, Michigan, Wayne State and Michigan State Universities and the University of California.

The "core curriculum" will be economics, political science, sociology and psychology, trade union history and philosophy, treated under these titles: Central Economic Problems of the 1960s; American Government and Politics; Man and Society; the American Labor Movement.

NILE said it switched from the usual short-course and "tool" subjects for scholarship winners because it believes labor education needs its own "new frontiers" in the form of long-term liberal arts studies centering on current labor problems.

The only comparable type of residential program in recent years is the trade union fellowship program, a 13-week course, at Harvard University. The basic difference between Harvard's program and the NILE project is that the latter is a cooperative union-university project from recruiting to curriculum.

Costs of the program are shared by the Fund for Adult Education, the universities, and the sponsoring unions. Scholarship winners and unions are responsible for lost time, travel and other expenses.

Ruttenberg Sees Growth Limited by Joblessness

New Brunswick, N. J.—The United States has everything needed for 10 years of industrial growth if private and public policy-makers will find ways to put all of America—not just automated machinery—to work, an AFL-CIO representative told industrial executives here.

Dir. Stanley Ruttenberg of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, one of several speakers at the annual plant management conference of Rutgers University, said problems of unemployment, under-production and falling consumption will yield to vigorous action by government and by private industry.

"If we fail to solve these problems," Ruttenberg said, "they will make the difference between a decade of industrial opportunity and one of mounting difficulties at home and abroad."

Action by the federal government is essential, and the government role must not be confused by "sloganized fears of big government," the speaker asserted.

Industry Has Responsibilities

"This does not mean that federal government has the responsibility for solving everything," Ruttenberg told the industrialists. "But private industry is responsible for something besides automated machinery, and profits.

"It is responsible for helping to solve today's unemployment problem . . . fast moving toward a rate of 7 percent. If all parts of America do not soon recognize that unemployment is not just a problem for the unemployed, or for labor, the proportions of this problem by 1965 will make a solution for today's difficulties look small," he said.

Ruttenberg advised private industry to give up some of its pet slogans from the 1950's, such as the "wage-price spiral."

Wage 'Myth' Rejected

The jobless were told, he said, that high wages had produced high prices and led to unemployment. Acceleration of automation, and other developments will disprove this myth in the 1960's, he asserted.

Another myth which Ruttenberg said will be "buried by the sheer weight of the evidence" is the argument that "consumers are jaded."

"Consumers weren't jaded when the recession got under way in 1959," he said. "People who work for a living did not have high enough incomes to buy what could be produced. Certainly the problem won't be solved by replacing the wage cost with the cost of an automatic machine."

- An 18-point program to end the balance-of payments deficit which urged "economic progress" at home coupled with steps to "improve technology, lower our production and marketing costs, and devise new and superior products under conditions of price stability." (See story, Page 10.)

Nine More Messages

At the same time Kennedy told legislative leaders he would send nine more messages in the next few weeks, including one on Feb. 14 detailing a federal-aid-to-education proposal. Other messages, Democratic leaders said, would cover water resources, agriculture, budget and fiscal policy, taxation, housing, defense and foreign aid.

Kennedy's health message gave primary attention to the needs of the aged, whose annual medical bill "is twice that of persons under 65," but whose annual income "is only half as high."

He called for:

- In-patient hospital services up to 90 days for any one illness, with the patient paying the first $10 of costs for each of the first nine days —with a minimum payment per patient of $20—and with the program paying the full cost for the remaining 81 days.
- Skilled nursing home services up to 180 days immediately after discharge from a hospital, plus an arrangement where a patient can substitute two additional days of nursing home care for each unused day of hospital care.
- Outpatient clinic diagnostic services for all costs in excess of $20.
- Community visiting nurse services "for a limited period of time."
- Financing of the program by a one-quarter of 1 percent increase each in the social security tax on both employers and employes, plus an increase in the taxable earnings base from $4,800 to $5,000 a year.

Kennedy called the program "a very modest proposal cut to meet absolutely essential needs" which would make it possible to "spread the cost of health services in old age over the working years—effectively, and in a manner consistent with the dignity of the individual."

He made it clear that patients would have the freedom of choice of both doctors and hospitals, with "no supervision or control over the practice of medicine by any doctor or over the manner in which medical services are provided by any hospital."

In the area of community health services and facilities, the President asked Congress to double the present authorization of $10 million in matching federal grants for nursing home construction; a $10 million initial annual appropriation for grants to states, and through them to communities, to help develop a wide variety of community health services; and a removal of the arbitrary appropriations ceiling on grants for research covering hospital facilities.

To end the growing shortage of doctors and dentists, the President called for a 10-year program of matching grants for construction of medical and dental schools. He asked for $25 million in federal funds the first year and $75 million each year for the next nine years.

At the same time he urged a program of federal scholarship funds on the basis of $1,500 for one-fourth of the new medical and dental school enrollment each year, plus an additional grant of $1,000 per scholarship to help schools meet necessary expenses.

Declaring that "while meeting the health needs of the older groups in our population we cannot neglect the needs of the young," Kennedy recommended establishment of a new National Institute of Child Health and Human Development to carry out new research projects, and an increase in appropriations for the existing maternal and child health, crippled children and child welfare programs.

The President said his entire medical care and research program was dedicated to meeting "the unfinished business in health which affects every person and home and community in this land."

Banking Unit OKs Weaver After Grilling on 'Loyalty'

The Senate Banking Committee, by an 11-4 vote, has cleared the nomination of Dr. Robert C. Weaver as Federal Housing Administrator after southern Democrats submitted the highest-ranking Negro appointee chosen by Pres. John F. Kennedy to a grueling day and a half of questioning about his loyalty.

The start of the hearings was delayed by Chairman A. Willis Robertson (D-Va.), until the committee received written assurances from Kennedy that Weaver had been cleared by the FBI before the appointment was made. White House staff aides had previously informed Robertson of the FBI clearance, but the chairman insisted on the Kennedy letter.

The heavy fire of questioning, dealing with Weaver's activities in various organizations a quarter of century ago, came from Robertson and Sen. William Blakley (D-Tex.). Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.) also questioned Weaver on segregated housing and voted against clearing the nomination. Joining with them in opposition to the new FHA appointee was Republican Sen. Wallace F. Bennett (Utah).

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, sent a letter to Robertson praising Weaver's "distinguished career" with the U.S. Housing Authority in 1937, with several government agencies during World War II, and more recently as deputy commissioner of Housing in New York State and declared that the Administration is "fortunate" that Weaver is "available and willing to assume the direction" of the FHA program.

House Sets Hearings on Higher Jobless Benefits

employment "reaches across state lines" and makes it imperative for the federal government to step in, the President proposed immediate extension of jobless benefits for a period 50 percent longer than the maximum now permitted under the laws of each state, but not to exceed a combined federal-state total of 39 weeks of compensation.

Protection Spelled Out

Protection would be extended to workers who exhausted regular benefits after Oct. 31, 1960, and would continue to cover those who use up their benefits prior to Apr. 1, 1962.

To help equalize the burden on those states that currently pay benefits for more than 26 weeks, Kennedy proposed, the federal government should reimburse states for all benefits beyond the 26-week mark on the same basis as it extends additional aid to other states.

Although the benefit structure is largely the same as the TUC program enacted during the 1957-58 recession the method of financing is far different. Under the Kennedy plan the cost of the temporary benefits would be paid by authorizing a permanent increase from $3,000 to $4,800 in the base wages on which employers pay federal unemployment taxes, effective Jan 1, 1962.

The Kennedy proposal calls for voluntary state participation, as was the case in 1958. However, the Administration pointed out that this time federal, instead of state, financing is involved and that states therefore can enter into agreements with the Secretary of Labor without the necessity for enactment of enabling state legislation. Three years ago, only 16 states and the District of Columbia took advantage of the TUC program.

In his message to Congress the President said "it is suitable . . . that the cost of financing this program be spread among employers in all the states," so that states "which usually bear a disproportionate share of recession unemployment would not have to bear the total financial burden."

Wage Base Hike 'Overdue'

In addition, the Administration said, an increase in the wage base "is long overdue." When the $3,000 base was established in 1939, Kennedy noted, it covered 97 percent of payrolls taxed while today it covers only 60 percent of payrolls.

In the area of aid to dependent children Kennedy told Congress there was "a pressing need for improving our public assistance programs." He called for $305 million in federal funds so that aid could be extended not only to children deprived of care because of death, desertion or disability of a parent "but also the families where a parent is unemployed."

The message asked that the legislation state the intent of Congress that the additional funds "are not intended to replace state and local funds now aiding needy persons."

Kennedy said the move would "further the objective of helping these needy families to again become self-supporting." It was estimated the program would aid an additional 750,000 children monthly.

Layoffs Rise, Hirings Down For December

Twenty-one more workers per 1,000 factory employes were separated from their jobs in December than were hired, equaling the postwar record for the month registered during the 1957 recession, according to the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

In nearly every manufacturing industry separations ran ahead of hirings, the report said. Layoffs rose from 27 to 29 per 1,000 workers over November, while quits dipped from 7 to 6 per 1,000. Other separations came to 4 per 1,000. Total hirings declined during the month from 23 to 18 per 1,000 payroll workers.

Preliminary statistics for the full year of 1960 put the monthly hiring rate at 30 per 1,000 workers, a drop of 6 from 1959 and the same as in 1958. Layoffs averaged 20 per 1,000 workers compared to 1.6 per 1,000 the year before and 2.3 per 1,000 in 1958.

The BLS said the excess of hirings over separations "which marked the recovery from the steel strike at the opening of 1960 was short-lived." The trend was reversed in March, it noted, and continued unfavorable throughout the rest of the year.

The major metal and machine industries, apparel, rubber and industries connected with home building and home furnishing showed particularly larger layoff rates and lower hiring rates in 1960 compared with 1959, the BLS said.

Port Unions Rap Broader Controls

Albany—The Port Council of Greater New York Harbor and Vicinity has urged Gov. Nelson Rockefeller to hold public hearings on legislation designed to broaden the powers and jurisdiction of the Waterfront Commission of New York and New Jersey.

Delegates from more than a dozen unions attended a meeting chaired by Pres. William V. Bradley of the Longshoremen. They said a hearing is needed to present arguments in favor of reducing the commission's powers, instead of expanding them.

Said Raymond R. Corbett, New York State AFL-CIO's legislative chairman: "The amendments would have the agency branching out beyond the waterfront in a manner that provides inducement for those seeking to hamstring unions, to rekindle their efforts and lay the groundwork for new restrictive union-smashing legislation."

Goldberg Says Labor-Industry Unit Will Aim for Better Understanding

The purpose of Pres. John F. Kennedy's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy is to help "create a better climate of understanding" of industrial problems, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has said, "not to take over or interfere with established collective bargaining machinery and methods."

The statement came at a Feb. 6 news conference in which Goldberg also announced that he had called a conference for Feb. 20 of all state labor commissioners "to discuss matters of mutual interest to federal and state Labor Depts."

The Labor Secretary's comment on the intended objectives of the top-level labor-management advisory group followed a statement by Commerce Sec. Luther Hodges that the committee would give close scrutiny to automobile industry negotiations this year.

A top-level labor-management committee, named by the President, to discuss mutual problems away from pressures of the bargaining table, was asked by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in November 1959. In a radio broadcast recently, Meany pointed out that former Pres. Eisenhower had allowed the National Association of Manufacturers to name business representatives for first-round conferences who were small industrialists from "the ultra-conservative wing" and not really representative of major industry.

Goldberg said that he and Hodges were "in full agreement as to the objectives" the committee should seek.

These objectives, he said, were to "advise with and make recommendations to the President" on labor-management policies that will "promote free and responsible collective bargaining, industrial peace, sound wage and price policies, higher standards of living and increased productivity."

The committee also would consider, he said, "policies designed to insure that American products are competitive in world markets" and consider "the benefits and problems created by automation and other technological advances."

In regard to his pending meeting with state labor commisisoners, Goldberg said his department and the state officials have many problems "of common concern," including unemployment, the effective use of the U.S. Employment Service and issues of minimum wages.

A later meeting, he said, would be held for specific discussion of unemployment compensation programs.

Goldberg left shortly after his news conference for a tour of areas of heavy unemployment and chronic economic distress.

Kennedy Anti-Slump Bills Begin to Move in Congress

Crafts OK Site Policy On Missiles

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has approved an unprecedented peacetime policy of using the full power of the department and its 18 affiliated unions to prevent work stoppages at the nation's missile bases.

The department's executive council adopted unanimously a four-point policy statement to aid in the acceleration of the missile program. It includes exhausting all available procedures and methods for peaceful settlement of disputes before a walkout and prohibiting state or local building trades councils from giving "aid, assistance or support to any local union which violates this policy."

Department Pres. C. J. Haggerty said the department and affiliated unions, representing 3 million construction workers "will use every means within the limits of their power to implement and insure the success of the policy."

The statement, he said, recognized that "time is of the essence" in the missile program,

Ratification Of Economic Pact Urged

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has strongly urged the Senate to ratify the convention on the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development and has emphasized that labor can make a special "important contribution" to carrying out the OECD program.

Creation of the OECD, Meany told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in a statement, would enable the nations of the Atlantic Community to unify their efforts "to help the newly independent countries achieve economic progress in freedom."

Meany said that, while recognizing the multiple purposes of OECD in modernizing and stabilizing the economies of the North

Anti-Union Bills Fought:

Modest Labor Gains Expected in States

By David Perlman

In 47 recession-hit states whose legislatures meet this year, labor is pressing for laws which will give more jobless workers bigger unemployment compensation benefits for a longer period, establish or raise state minimum wages for millions not covered by federal law, open up equal job opportunities through enforceable fair employment laws and make workmen's compensation a more effective instrument of rehabilitation and retraining.

Reports to the AFL-CIO News from state labor councils and correspondents indicate that most legislatures — generally conservative and rural-dominated—are moving slowly, if at all, in the area.

Anti-Labor Bills Fought

In a number of state capitals, labor has been forced on the defensive to fight punitive and restrictive legislation ranging from so-called "right-to-work" laws to proposed curbs on strikes and picketing.

In Idaho, for example, the Senate has passed a bill prohibiting union shop or agency shop contracts covering "agricultural labor." The definition of "agricultural labor" includes persons working in food processing, canning, packaging, freezing or transporting "any agricultural or horticultural commodity."

The bill, if passed would take in some of the biggest industries in the state. Idaho is one of the states

Two House Units Launch Hearings

By Gene Zack

The 87th Congress, now in the seventh week of its first session, has begun to move on three key proposals in Pres. John F. Kennedy's program to check the recession and stimulate economic growth.

The House Ways & Means Committee opened hearings on Administration-backed measures for a temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits and emergency assistance to the children of jobless workers, while a House Labor subcommittee began hearing testimony on a proposal to raise the minimum wage and broaden coverage.

There were growing signs that quick action might be in store for all three measures. The minimum wage hearings were scheduled to last only three days, and the Ways & Means Committee was reported aiming for clearance of the TUC and aid-to-dependent-children bills within a week's time.

Wage-Hour

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, launching the Administration drive for improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act, has urged that the minimum wage be raised, by steps, to $1.25 an hour and that coverage be extended to 4.3 million additional workers.

As a House Labor subcommittee opened hearings, the AFL-CIO expressed "disappointment" at the Administration bill and called on Congress to go beyond White House recommendations and "restore the dignity and well-being of millions of Americans."

Specifically, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said, Congress should make the $1.25 minimum effective at once, should place an immediate ceiling on hours of newly-covered workers, and should include more employes.

Both Goldberg and organized labor urged speedy passage of the measure to help check the

Jobless Pay

The Kennedy Administration has called for speedy congressional action on a program of temporary unemployment compensation benefits which would aid 3 million jobless workers and pump $1 billion into the economy.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, leadoff witness before the House Ways & Means Committee, declared that "unemployment in this country has assumed serious dimensions," and said the TUC bill was a "very crucial part" of the Administration's program for economic recovery.

The Administration bill, introduced by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), committee chairman, would extend jobless benefits for a period of 50 percent longer than the maximum now permitted under the laws of each state, with a ceiling of a combined federal-state total of 39 weeks of compensation.

The bill proposes extending cov-

Realities Behind Jobless Statistics Bared on Goldberg Inspection Trip

"I've been everywhere trying to find work of any kind and there just isn't any."—Dwight Shively, 59-year old steelworker, Columbus, O.

"I want to get off unemployment compensation. I need a job."—Caesar Chico, bricklayer, Chicago.

"I worked five days last year. My wife works a little, here and there. I have a pocketful of unpaid bills."—Harry Williams, laborer, Detroit.

These are the realities behind the statistics—the words of a few of the people with whom Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg talked in a whirlwind three-day tour of midwestern areas hard-hit by unemployment.

With unemployment swelling to 5.4 million in January—a 20-year record high for the month—Goldberg was directed by Pres. Kennedy to make a personal inspection of the problem.

"Unemployment is not only a statistical matter; it is a human problem affecting the lives of men, women and children. That is why I am here," Goldberg told a gathering of labor, business and government officials upon arriving at Chicago's Midway Airport.

Goldberg went on to talk to the unemployed at union halls and unemployment compensation offices

Sugar Fields, Mills Struck In Puerto Rico

Salinas, Puerto Rico—Here on the subtropical South Coast of this island Commonwealth, several thousand AFL-CIO sugar plantation workers are on strike for bare-minimum improvements.

In three big sugar-planting areas, workers are seeking modest fringe benefits over the 6-cents-a-day pay increase which other plantations have already granted. Since the field workers are employed only a few months a year, their annual income ranges from $300 to $600, and the straight wage increase amounts to about $7 a year.

Also closed down are three big sugar-grinding plants, where the cane is hauled from the fields, processed and shipped to the United States for refining. The union—the Packinghouse Workers—is seeking wage rates of $1.10 an hour.

The plantations and grinding mills stretch east and west of Ponce, Puerto Rico's second largest city. Only 20 minutes by plane from San Juan, the southern sugar areas seem far removed from the booming capital of the Commonwealth.

At a series of strike meetings in the sleepy villages of the sugar-producing areas, workers shouted their approval of a sharp attack by UPWA Pres. Ralph Helstein on the "policies of poverty."

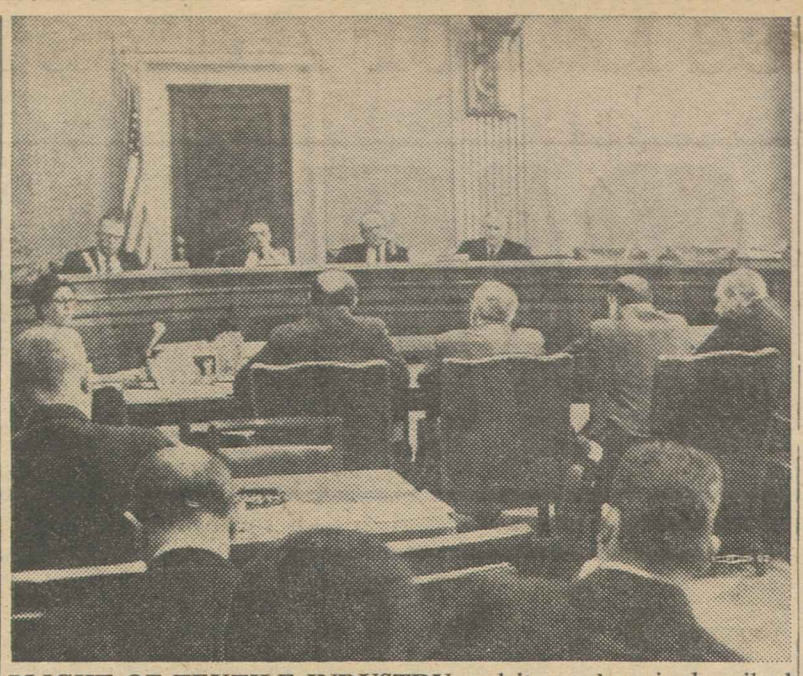
Speaking for the UPWA's island membership of about 50,000 workers in agriculture and industry, Helstein pledged full support to the strikers.

"This strike will be settled when the owners of the plantations understand that their employes demand justice," Helstein declared.

'Feudal System' Hit

He noted that one of the big landowning trusts involved in the dispute is Luce & Co., owned and controlled by the family of Henry Luce, the publisher of Time and Life. The UPWA president accused sugar groups of seeking to fasten on the workers a "dead feudal system" which has no place "in our present democratic society."

While Puerto Rican industry has made vast strides in recent years, its agriculture remains essentially backward, and the workers in the farm areas share little of the prosperity which has come to the rest of the island.



PLIGHT OF TEXTILE INDUSTRY and its workers is described to recent hearing of Senate subcommittee headed by Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R. I.) by William Pollock, president of the Textile Workers Union of America.

TWUA Delegates Vote To Extend Contracts

New York—With the textile industry's fortunes once more on the downgrade, some 250 delegates of the Textile Workers Union of America voted here to recommend a one-year extension without change of its agreements with woolen and worsted and northern cotton-rayon textile companies.

The recommendation, which is not binding upon any TWUA affiliate which feels local industry conditions warrant the negotiation of improvements, was made at two conferences.

Delegates representing 45,000 northern cotton-rayon workers in some 190 mills took their action after hearing reports on industry conditions by TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Victor Canzano, the union's cotton-rayon director.

The woolen and worsted recommendation, directed at 20,000 workers in approximately 75 mills, was adopted at a meeting addressed by TWUA Sec.-Treas. John Chupka and J. William Belanger, the union's woolen and worsted director.

Northern cotton-rayon pacts generally expire or are subject to reopening Apr. 15, while the majority of woolen and worsted contracts are subject to review on May 1.

Resolutions adopted at each conference scored "the extremely short-sighted" foreign-trade policy of the recent Eisenhower Administration which, it was charged, "has loosed a flood of textile imports" more than double the level entering the country in the summer of 1958. "And there is no immediate relief in sight," the resolutions added.

"While textile workers are clearly entitled to improved wage and fringe benefits, it is our considered opinion that a move to secure them at this time is not feasible, practicable nor in the best long-range interests of our membership," the delegates declared.

Pollock announced that the union hereafter will place more emphasis upon the negotiation of fringe benefits. He said an advisory committee would soon be set up to study the situation in preparation for future negotiations.

The recommendation to forego wage increases followed two previous years of progress by TWUA in the wage field. In 1959 and 1960, TWUA negotiated an average total of 17.5 cents for northern cotton-rayon workers and 17 cents for woolen and worsted workers.

Average hourly wage in TWUA woolen and worsted plants is $1.70 with a $1.50 minimum. In northern cotton-rayon it is $1.58 with a $1.315 minimum.

17 Conferences Scheduled:

COPE Sets Dates For Area Meetings

The AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education will launch next month a full-scale program of area political conferences keyed to building political activity on an all-year basis by state and local union members and their wives, with emphasis on state legislative issues and on the hundreds of state and municipal elections scheduled for this year.

The first four conferences will be held in March in Pensacola, Fla., Galveston, Tex., Oklahoma City, Okla., and in Pittsburgh, Pa.

A traveling team of COPE national staff members, headed by Dir. James L. McDevitt, will attend each conference, together with the area director and the woman's director of the region involved.

Rank and File Appeal

Thousands of delegates attended the COPE area conferences last year, building their programs in preparation for the national election.

This year the COPE appeal is directed specifically to rank-and-file local union members and to local union officers and business agents as well as to state officials and international union representatives.

The programs will include an analysis of the 1960 election results, including an analysis of a slight decrease in liberal membership in Congress despite the presidential victory of John F. Kennedy.

On the agenda, major emphasis will be given to such state legislative issues as reapportionment of both congressional and state assembly districts and to the common practice of gerrymandering districts.

The programs will include opportunity for discussion groups, the use of motion pictures, slides and questionnaires designed to obtain maximum local counsel on political procedures and activities.

Seventeen COPE area conferences will be held in about a 90-day period. The full schedule follows:

Pensacola, Fla., Mar. 7-8—Delegates from Alabama, Florida, Georgia and Mississippi.

Galveston, Tex., Mar. 11-12—Louisiana, Texas.

Oklahoma City, Okla.—Mar. 15 & 16—Arkansas, Kansas and Oklahoma.

Pittsburgh, Pa., Mar. 29-30—Delaware, D. C., Maryland, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Hartford, Conn., Apr. 14-15—Connecticut, New York, Rhode Island.

Boston, Mass., Apr. 17-18—Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont.

Toledo, O., Apr. 20-21—Michigan, Ohio.

Chicago, Ill., Apr. 23-24—Illinois, Indiana.

Rochester, Minn., Apr. 25-26—Minnesota, Wisconsin.

St. Louis, Mo., Apr. 29-30—Iowa, Missouri.

Durham, N. C., May 7-8—North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia.

Louisville, Ky., May 13-14—Kentucky, Tennessee and West Virginia.

Salt Lake City, Utah., May 17-18—Colorado, Utah.

Las Vegas, Nev., May 22-23—Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada and New Mexico.

Seattle, Wash., May 26-27—Alaska, Oregon and Washington.

Billings, Mont., May 31-June 1—Idaho, Montana and Wyoming.

Texas COPE Supports Maverick for Senate

Austin, Tex.—The Texas State Committee on Political Education has urged union members to unite behind Maury Maverick, Jr., in a special election Apr. 4 to fill the Senate seat vacated by Vice Pres. Lyndon Johnson.

Some 22 Democrats and one Republican currently are candidates in a contest which presumably will be decided by a later run-off between the two front runners.

Maverick won endorsement at a meeting of 300 COPE delegates which adopted a resolution praising "his extraordinary record in the (state) legislature, his courage in espousing causes in which he believes, his ability to influence others, and his all-out dedication to the liberal program of Pres. Kennedy."

Maverick and State Sen. Henry B. Gonzalez, also highly favored, were among 11 candidates who addressed the COPE conference. Sen. William A. Blakley (D-Tex.), now holding an interim appointment, was among eight other candidates who expressed regrets they were unable to attend.

The COPE resolution said labor's choice was narrowed to Maverick or Gonzalez and added that "to choose between two such friends is hard, but to fail to make a choice helps neither and vacates our responsibility." If union members cancel each other, the resolution added, the run-off may well take place between two enemies of the Kennedy program.

The COPE resolution said it was recognized "that some of our members feel so strongly in support of Sen. Gonzalez that they will not accept our recommendation." "This devotion . . . is merited," COPE said, but in order to get a labor-supported candidate into the run-off, "we must go for one."

All COPE bodies were instructed to make clear to their members the difficulty of the choice and the nature of the problem.

Maverick, 40-year-old son of the late Maury Maverick, who served in the House in the mid-thirties, was a state House member from 1951 through 1956.

Keenan Forecasts Increased Labor Investment in Cooperative Housing

The creation of the new AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment promises that "new impetus will be given to union participation in cooperative housing," Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers declared in a speech before the Fourth National Conference on Cooperative Housing.

Keenan told some 100 delegates meeting in the nation's capital that closer relations between unions and cooperative groups would lead toward the common goal of both movements—"to house more families better through cooperative housing."

The two-day conference was sponsored jointly by the National Housing Conference, the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials and the Cooperative League of the U.S.A. Keenan is a member of the NHC executive.

Housing Starts Decline

Dwight D. Townsend, director of the Cooperative League's Washington office, pointed out in the keynote address that the government reported housing starts in 1960 down to 1.24 million private units—a reduction of 18 percent from 1959.

Townsend said cooperative housing can be "a force for good" and urged delegates to join the newly-formed National Association of Housing Cooperatives.

Keenan said the IBEW, while it has not yet invested in cooperative housing, has invested about $130 million over the past five years in government-insured housing. He said this made possible the construction of some 1,200 units a year in the $15,000 price bracket and all "100 percent union-constructed."

Keenan warned that the nature and availability of union-negotiated funds must be kept in perspective. He pointed out that health and welfare funds, which pay day-to-day costs, are subjected to a constant outflow and therefore that reserves are small and usually invested in government bonds.

As for pension funds, which amount to some $30 billion and accumulate at the rate of $3.5 billion a year, he noted that "the overwhelming proportion" are completely management-controlled.

Keenan estimated, however, that $1 or $2 billion of pension funds are controlled or influenced by unions.

He said management and management-appointed trustees have tended to have " a very narrow view" of how pension funds should be invested, inclining against such socially desirable purposes as housing, hospitals and health-care centers.

Nevertheless, he said, union-influenced funds are "a very significant potential source of investment funds."

Congress Asked to Set AGVA Week

Three members of the New York State congressional delegation have asked Congress to designate the week of Oct. 9-15 as "American Guild of Variety Artists Week" to give recognition to the 20,000 members of the AFL-CIO entertainment union.

Concurrent resolutions were introduced by Sen. Kenneth Keating (R-N.Y.) and Reprsentatives Seymour Halpern (R-N.Y.) and Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.).

The resolution calls for a salute to the members of the AGVA for their work in entertaining American troops at overseas bases and for their current campaign against juvenile delinquency, as well as for the union's continuing activity to care for the interests of professional performers.

In Wake of Anti-Trust Convictions:

Price-Rigging Firms Face Heavy Civil Damage Suits

The nearly $2 million in fines paid by General Electric, Westinghouse and 27 smaller corporations may look like small potatoes before the final chapter is written on the gigantic conspiracy of leading electrical equipment manufacturers to fix prices and divide up the market through an elaborate system of rigged bids.

Even before seven high-ranking company executives began serving 30-day jail sentences for criminal anti-trust law violations, multi-million dollar damage claims were being staked out by victimized purchasers.

The federal government itself will have one of the biggest claims for overcharges.

U.S. Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy announced that the Justice Dept. expects, within the next two months, to file the first of a series of civil damage suits on behalf of some 20 federal agencies which purchased transformers, generators and other heavy equipment from the companies involved. The Justice Dept. may also handle the claim of the Tennessee Valley Authority, one of the biggest customers of the companies.

Scores of city and state agencies and private utilities were also digging into old purchasing records and coming up with claims for millions of dollars in overcharges—the basis for civil anti-trust suits under which victimized purchasers can claim triple damages.

171 Cities Involved

The 20 indictments to which the companies pleaded guilty or entered no-contest pleas covered sales to 171 municipal governments—all eligible for triple compensation if they can prove that the prices they were forced to pay were higher than those which would have been charged under competitive bidding.

While top officials of General Electric and other companies said the purchasers hadn't really been overcharged despite the admitted price-fixing, that they had received "fair value" for the money they had paid, the buyers for the most part appeared skeptical of these assurances.

New York's Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) said: "The city will not stand idly by and be mulcted." He said New York will sue for triple damages unless the companies involved voluntarily agreed to settlements.

Chicago city officials said they will press claims for more than $5 million. Los Angeles indicated its claims would "run into millions." Four California electric utilities joined in an investigation of overcharges on past purchases. San Francisco City Attorney Dion R. Holm said he is asking $1.2 million in damages from four electric companies in out-of-court negotiations currently under way. Several states, including California and New York, are studying the possibility of combined suits on behalf of municipalities involved.

Meanwhile the National Institute of Municipal Law Officers has sent out feelers to a number of cities regarding the possibility of a combined lawsuit. A meeting to explore the matter further was scheduled to be held in Washington, D.C., on Feb. 23.

At the same time that it was insisting that prices paid by purchasers were "fair," General Electric called back from retirement its former president, Charles E. Wilson, to represent the company in "reviewing" with customers past sales and "to make adjustments if warranted by the facts."

GE added: "It is not feasible at this time to predict the possible outcome of these reviews."

Because of the complexities of setting a dollar figure on overcharges, most of the purchasers are expected to explore the possibility of out-of-court settlements.

At the rate of $1.75 billion in sales a year, purchases of heavy equipment covered by the indictments totaled some $7 billion. The possibility of sizeable overcharge claims has been reflected in a sharp drop in stock prices of the principal companies.

While the federal government is limited to single damages under the anti-trust laws—as contrasted with triple damages allowed other victims—Justice Dept. attorneys see a possibility of double damages under the False Claims Act. That is the penalty provided for a conspiracy to defraud the federal government.

Westinghouse, which had previously announced that it planned no disciplinary action against its convicted executives, on the grounds that they had already suffered "anguish," said it will continue paying the salaries of two jailed officials during the period of their imprisonment.

GE, which has three company officers in the Montgomery County Prison at Norristown, Pa.—including two vice presidents—did not disclose the salary arrangements. Earlier GE had announced that its officials involved in the anti-trust violations, including some who were not defendants in the case, had been punished either through demotions or transfers to jobs where they would have no responsibility for sales.

DISCUSSION on problems of pre-retirement planning, sponsored by New York City Central Labor Council, is led by Michael Sampson, chairman of council's Community Services Committee. Seated on platform, left to right, are Council Treas. James C. Quinn; Peter Crescenti and Benjamin F. McLaurin, committee members; State AFL-CIO Legislative Chairman Ray Corbett; A. Charles Ford and Dr. Blue Carstinson, speakers; and Jack Ossofsky, chairman of Subcommittee on Aging.

Pre-Retirement Parley Draws 250 in New York

New York—More than 250 labor union officers and members took part in a pre-retirement conference called by Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the New York Central Labor Council and arranged by the labor body's Community Services Committee.

"Retirement preparation is an educational process," said Michael Sampson, business manager of Utility Workers Local 1-2 and chairman of the committee. "This institute is the first of a series in which we hope to give information about benefits and future income, about health and the aging process."

Sampson praised the work of Jack Ossofsky, chairman of the committee's Subcommittee on the Aging, for arranging the institute. Ossofsky, who is pension administrator of District 65 of Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Workers, explained that a seven-week course, "Thinking About Retirement," sponsored by the committee, would start Mar. 21. The course will be open to members concerned for their own retirement plans and to union representatives who will be trained to give assistance in their own locals.

Featured speakers on the kick-off program were Dr. Blue Carstinson, consultant to the Senate (McNamara) Subcommittee on the Aged and Aging; A. Charles Ford, of the Steelworkers Committee on Retired Workers; Ray Corbett, New York State AFL-CIO legislative chairman; Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers; Treas. James C. Quinn of the Central Labor Council; and Benjamin F. McLaurin, co-chairman of the Subcommittee on the Aging.

The tenor of floor discussion was summed up by retired member Michael Rosenberg, who said:

"Economic security is important, but not enough. A man should be prepared for retirement. Doing nothing is dangerous."

Educators Told Unions Checked Depression

Columbus—Except for organized labor and its contracts, the nation probably would be deep in depression now instead of in a recession, a labor spokesman told the Ohio Elementary School Principals Association at its annual conference here.

Union contracts now stand in the way of the mass wage-cutting that marked the start of every previous slump, said Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"If consumer income has held up in the current recession, it is largely for this reason," he said. "Any wage-cutting that began on a large scale with the blue-collar workers would inevitably spread to white-collar workers, and ultimately to professional workers."

Asserting that labor's goals are consistent with those of most Americans, Clayman told the principals that those goals include higher living standards, reasonable security, a voice in job conditions, earned leisure and a fair share of national production.

"Labor has driven home the message that the machine was made to serve the people, and that trickle-down prosperity isn't enough. True, a minority still has to learn this lesson, but such understanding now is widespread. With this there has come a deeper concern for the human rights of everyone," he said.

Saying that labor is not looking for miracles from the new Administration and Congress, Clayman said labor hopes for an atmosphere in which collective bargaining will be more effective, and an opportunity to "explore the awesome potentialities" of automation through the new labor-management-public committee that Pres. John F. Kennedy has said he will appoint.

One estimate of automation's effects, based on a survey by Rep. Elmer Holland (D-Pa.), was cited by Clayton as indicating that 3 to 4 million white-collar workers will be displaced from their jobs by office machines in the next few years.

Government Role Cited

"Great top-level decisions must soon be made," he said. "The greatest danger lies in having industry make those decisions unilaterally.

"The immediate decisions regarding automation in the individual plant or company can probably best be made in collective bargaining. But just as individual bargaining gave way to collective bargaining, so must the latter now be complemented by government decisions."

The IUD speaker predicted that automation will have as great an impact upon our culture, social organization and education as upon employment. Every teacher and principal must prepare now, Clayman said, to deal with the rising demand for educational opportunity that will accompany more leisure time.

Site Picketing Bills Dropped in Hopper

Bills to legalize jobsite picketing by building trades unions have been offered by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) "with the approval of the Administration" and by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.).

The bills are similar to a measure sponsored last year by then Sen. John F. Kennedy and to a Thompson measure favorably reported by the House Labor Committee. The 1961 Thompson proposal provides a 10-day cooling-off period at the construction site of a military or missile base.

No dates have yet been set for committee hearings.

6,000 Laborers Win Raise in N. Y.

New York—District Council 37, of the State, County and Muncipal Employes, has announced the successful conclusion of negotiations that will upgrade the salaries of 6,000 laborers in almost every city department and agency.

The workers will get wage increases totaling $3.9 million a year under a comptroller's ruling calling for a 26-cent hourly wage increase and cash payment of time-and-a-quarter for holiday work. If the City Board of Estimates approves, the ruling will be retroactive to July 1, 1958. Such rulings are made periodically, based on prevailing rates paid in private industry, under provisions of the state labor law.

Jerry Wurf, AFSCME district executive director, praised City Comptroller Lawrence E. Gerosa and Michael A. Buonora, his assistant, for fairness in conducting negotiations.

37-Cent Hike Won By Rubber Local

Akron—A 37-cents-an-hour wage increase was won by Rubber Workers Local 7 in a first contract covering workers at the Firestone Cherry St. Retreading Shop in Akron.

The agreement provides complete hospital and surgical coverage and a pension plan the same as that covering workers in the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. plant.

Also included are provision on seniority, minimum vacation pay, and other benefits.

The working agreement is for two years with a one-year wage re-opener provision.

Screen Actors Vote to Ratify New Contract

Pres. George Chandler of the Screen Actors Guild has announced that Guild members in a nationwide mail referendum have approved a new collective bargaining contract covering actors, singers and stunt men in non-theatrical industrial and educational motion pictures by a better than 99 percent majority.

The vote was 6,186 to 56 for ratification of the contract.

The contract was negotiated by special committees of the New York and Chicago branches. In addition to wage increases retroactive to July 21, 1960, and other improvements in conditions, the agreement provided for the employers to pay into the union's Pension and Health & Welfare Plans for Motion Picture Actors an additional 5 percent of gross compensation.

The Guild membership is currently voting in a nationwide referendum on a proposed dues hike.

Consumers Offered Advice on Gouging

Five things that consumers can do to protect themselves against being gouged by high finance charges are outlined in an updated AFL-CIO booklet, Consumer, Beware!

The 24-page illustrated publication, among other points, advises consumers to "stagger" installment purchases to fit their income. It tells how to figure the total cost of an auto sales contract, and lists maximum small loan rates in each state.

Revised as of January 1961, the booklet is AFL-CIO Publication No. 47. It is available from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Prices are 10 cents per copy, $7.50 for 100, $65 for 1,000. Checks should be made payable to William F. Schnitzler, AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer.

Weightman Is Given New Post in COPE

James L. McDevitt, director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, has named Philip M. Weightman of Chicago as assistant director.

The 58-year old veteran trade unionist, a native of Vicksburg, Miss., has been a field director of COPE since AFL-CIO merger in 1955. Prior to that, he served in the same capacity with the former CIO Political Action Committee.

Weightman began his union career as a skilled butcher in the St. Louis packing industry and later moved to Chicago where he was employed for many years at the Swift Co.

He was elected first vice-president of the Packinghouse Workers in 1946 and served in this post unitil 1948 when he joined PAC as field director. He has been active in community service since the late Mayor Edward J. Kelly appointed him to the Commission on Human Relations for Chicago. For a time he was a vice-president of the Chicago Branch of the NAACP.

In his new post, Weightman will work with Spanish-Americans, Negroes and other minority groups in a year-round intensive political education campaign.

Senate Confirms Weaver for FHA

The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Dr. Robert C. Weaver as Federal Housing Administrator after three days of mild Southern and Republican opposition.

The confirmation of Weaver to fill the highest federal executive post ever held by a Negro came on a voice vote.

Opposition to the 55-year-old appointee, who had served as vice chairman of New York City's Housing and Redevelopment Board, was based on the issue of housing integration plus the question of Weaver's "loyalty" raised by two southern Senators. Pres. Kennedy personally assured the Senate that an FBI report established Weaver's reliability and integrity.

CAMPAIGN MATERIAL to be used in 1961 fund drive of American Red Cross is examined by Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther (left), ARC president, and William F. Schnitzler, AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer and a member of Red Cross board of governors. Schnitzler and Pres. George Meany have pledged labor's backing in drive.

Labor Vows Support For Red Cross Drive

The AFL-CIO has pledged organized labor's "wholehearted" support to the 1961 fund-raising campaign which the American National Red Cross will conduct during the month of March.

Pres. George Meany, in a letter to Red Cross Pres. Alfred M. Gruenther, expressed confidence that trade unionists would provide "the support necessary to continue the outstanding work of the ARC."

In a recorded message, Sec-Treas. William F. Schnitzler called on union members to continue their backing of the Red Cross, declaring that labor has "a vital interest in its activities."

The Red Cross drive will be conducted in those cities which do not have United Fund campaigns, which the trade union movement backed last fall.

Meany's letter lauded the "ever-closer working relationship" that has been developed over the years between the Red Cross and the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee "to utilize labor's manpower and skills when disaster strikes" and to "strengthen the Red Cross blood program." The federation and the ARC have signed memorandums of understanding in these two fields.

Schnitzler, a member of the Red Cross board of governors and a national vice chairman of the 1961 ARC campaign, pointed out that for many years union members have given their blood to the Red Cross and have, in turn, received blood from the source "when it was needed to save their lives."

"Serving as volunteers on chapter boards and disaster service, first aid and water safety programs," Schnitzler continued, "AFL-CIO members know from experience what a tremendous job the Red Cross does."

Tripartite Group Created:

White House Names Labor Advisory Unit

Pres. John F. Kennedy has appointed a 21-member Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy to explore the broad area of free and responsible collective bargaining, industrial peace, sound wage and price policies, higher standards of living and increased productivity.

In his executive order creating the committee, Kennedy named Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg and Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges as public members to serve alternately as chairman, and selected Goldberg to head the committee for its first year of operation.

In addition to the two Cabinet officers, the President picked seven members each from the ranks of labor and management and five additional members representing the public.

Kennedy assigned the committee, which will report directly to him, two immediate tasks:

- To insure that American products are competitive in world markets.
- To study the benefits and problems resulting from automation.

Labor members picked by the President were AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Ladies' Garment Workers Pres. David Dubinsky, Railway Clerks Pres. George M. Harrison, Mine Workers Pres. Thomas Kennedy, Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Sec. Joseph D. Keenan.

Management members include Thomas Watson, president of Intl. Business Machines; Joseph Block, president of Inland Steel Co.; Henry Ford II, board chairman of Ford Motor Co.; J. Spencer Love, board chairman of Burlington Mills, Inc.; John Franklin, president of U.S. Lines; Elliott Bell, publisher of Business Week; and Richard Reynolds, president of Reynolds Metals.

The five public members named were Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta, Ga., Constitution; Dr. George W. Taylor of the Wharton School of Finance; Clark Kerr, former chancellor of the University of California; Arthur S. Burns of the National Bureau of Economic Research and former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers during the Eisenhower Administration; and David Cole, outstanding labor arbitrator.

Court Again Voids Ban On Stork Club Pickets

New York—The Second U.S. Court of Appeals has, for the second time, struck down a Landrum-Griffin anti-picketing injunction issued against two Hotel & Restaurant Workers' locals involved in a dispute with the Stork Club on the ground that the injunction was "too restrictive."

At the same time the court criticized the "confusing and somewhat self-defeating provisions" of the Landrum-Griffin Act because injunctions tailored to the language of the labor law "would be so lacking in precise warning that the unions could never picket at all with any degree of safety."

Last year the court struck down an injunction issued by District Court Judge Archie O. Dawson barring all picketing at the Stork Club. At that time, Dawson had ruled that although the union was engaged in informational picketing still permitted under L-G, it was interfering with deliveries in violation of the act.

Case Remanded

The appellate court overturned that decision and sent the case back to Dawson with instructions to reframe the injunction against Chefs Local 89 and Dining Room Employes Local 1 so that it would bar only picketing that affected deliveries and left the unions free to continue informational activities.

In Judge Dawson's second writing, the injunction barred picketing between the hours of 1 and 3 p.m. and 7 and 8 p.m., and said that informational picketing was permissible at other times providing "it did not have the effect of stopping deliveries."

The appeals court ruled that this language, too, was "too negative" and failed to achieve a "careful balancing of interests." It instructed the lower court to reword the injunction to bar picketing between the stated hours and to add the following language:

"Provided, however, that nothing herein shall be deemed or construed to prohibit the (unions) from picketing for informational purposes only, at all other times."

Meany Urges Senate Ratification of 20-Nation Economic Assistance Pact

Atlantic nations, the AFL-CIO believes labor can make a contribution particularly in the field of technical aid programs in the less developed areas.

Recalling that participation of American and European trade unions in the Marshall Plan convinced Europeans that such aid went to the key aim of improving the life of all the people, the federation president declared:

"This same spirit of social responsibility and dedication to broad social objectives must be emphasized in the efforts of the OECD to assist the less developed countries.

"OECD must convince the people of the less developed countries that it has at heart their fundamental interests, their deep desire for a better life for themselves and their children.

"I know of no better way to achieve this all-important grass roots acceptability," Meany told the committee, "than by intimate association of the free trade unions of the world with all aspects of OECD's operations and activities."

Meany in endorsing the OECD convention pointed out that former Pres. Eisenhower had asked ratification last December and that Pres. Kennedy had supported it in his State of the Union message and a Feb. 6 message on the balance of payments and gold problem.

'Of Vital Importance'

Kennedy said in the latter message that OECD "is of vital importance for assisting, on a cooperative basis, the developing countries of the free world" and for international consultations on financial and monetary policies.

Treasury Sec. Douglas J. Dillon and Under Sec. of State George Ball warned that Senate rejection would deal "a lethal blow to economic cooperation."

Dillon said that, had the proposed organization of some 20 nations existed last fall, "we might have avoided" the crisis of confidence over the U. S. dollar.

Meany in his statement cited as "significant" an acknowledgement by the OECD Preparatory Committee of "the need to maintain and develop consultations with representatives of labor and management."

He said this was a response to the request of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, a predecessor group confined to Western Europe.

"We would hope," he continued, "that the OECD would set up a division concerned with labor and manpower problems."

Such a division, especially if headed by "a qualified individual with a broad trade union background," Meany said, would reassure people in the developing areas that the social aspects of industrial development would receive full recognition.

"This division, in particular, should maintain close relations with free trade unions in the less developed countries," he added.

The federation president listed the main functions expected of OECD: to develop maximum rates of economic growth and full employment; to raise living standards without inflation; to help correct disequilibrium in balance of payments; to improve scientific and technological training; to increase investment and technical aid to less developed nations and operate aid programs.

Meany said labor sees OECD as an economic counterpart of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

While it will help strengthen the economies of Western Europe and North America, he stressed, "perhaps of even greater importance, OECD can increase the vitally necessary contributions the free industrialized nations must make to the economic development of the less developed countries."

MEBA Launches River Fleet Drive

New York—The Marine Engineers, successful in a representation election among employes of the Commercial Transport Corp. fleet, have announced a drive to organize all non-union river fleets. MEBA won bargaining rights on Commercial Transport's 13 Mississippi River system boats.

Sea Industry Asked to Form United Front

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A number of maritime unions will invite shipowners to form a united front with labor on such issues as government ship subsidies and foreign flag fleets, Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers has announced.

If no agreement is reached by June 15, the union group will consider striking against one or more major companies, said Hall.

The unions have decided, he said, to "use their economic strength" to compel merchant marine management to organize on an industry-wide basis and to stop "cannibalistic" practices.

"There is no point in bargaining for better wages and working conditions in an industry that is dying for lack of managerial statesmanship," he said. "We can see that our industry is finished unless we put at the top of our bargaining list the issues that the employers always prefer to push under the rug."

Other unions in the group were identified as the Marine Engineers; Masters, Mates & Pilots; three SIU affiliates, the Sailors Union of the Pacific, Marine Cooks and Stewards and Marine Firemen; and locals of other unions.

Labor Carries Program to Legislatures where voters rejected a sweeping "work" law in a 1958 referendum.

In half-a-dozen other states, "right-to-work" laws, although apparently bottled up in committee, remain as an implied threat to the labor movement.

In one new battleground, Oklahoma, national promoters of "right-to-work" have set up a full-scale promotion seeking support of a ban on the union shop. Although the campaign has not moved the legislature—at last report no one could be found willing to introduce the "work" bill—such moves have often preceded a petition campaign to force the issue on a referendum ballot.

Labor is fighting a Massachusetts proposal to ban strikes in public transportation, a Maine bill barring "mass picketing" interfering with deliveries of "necessary supplies," a Nebraska bill taxing gross receipts of labor organizations and a Rhode Island bill restricting picketing to employes of the struck shop or plant.

Ban on Strikebreakers Sought

On the other side of the coin, printing and newspaper unions are leading a nationwide drive for state legislation to outlaw professional strikebreaking. In New Jersey, while Gov. Robert B. Meyner (D) has withheld his signature from a broad anti-strikebreaking bill because of doubts on constitutional points, a substitute bill acceptable to the governor has passed the lower house and is pending in the Senate.

Against the drive to improve state unemployment compensation laws, many Republican legislators have found a new reason for foot-dragging. In Ohio, after defeating Democratic moves permanently to extend the duration of benefits to 39 weeks, the GOP leaders concentrated on a so-called "improvement" bill with features which labor charged would transform the insurance system into a dole. Even on this, the GOP line now is to wait and see whether Congress acts on Pres. Kennedy's temporary unemployment compensation program and on his expected proposals for permanent improvements in the system.

In several states, including Maryland, Montana and Wyoming, business interests are bringing heavy pressure for tightening the qualifications for unemployment compensation to reduce the number of jobless workers drawing benefits.

Labor is actively pressing, and with prospects of success in a number of states, for improvements in workmen's compensation, particularly in the area of continued reimbursement for loss of earnings and rehabilitation for persons who are partially but permanently disabled.

Wyoming Kids Take Back Seat to Weeds

Cheyenne—Wyoming's Republican-controlled legislature is so fearful of any contamination from the federal government that it voted to refuse all help to the state's school system from funds available under the National Defense Education Act.

It was a different story when it came to federal aid to agriculture. The same legislature turned around and petitioned Congress for federal aid in the control of "noxious weeds."

In states which have already set up fair employment programs, the emphasis now is on laws aimed at preventing discrimination in the sale or rental of housing. California, Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts are among the states where major efforts are being made.

Despite the opportunity for reapportionment presented by the 1960 census statistics—and the constitutional mandate in some states for periodic reapportionment of the legislature—inequity seems fated to perpetuate itself.

Taxation continues to be a major problem in nearly every state, with the labor movement frequently successful in blocking or limiting sales taxes but less successful in its advocacy of progressive personal and corporation income taxes.

Arkansas—A "union treasury-busting Sue-and-Be-Sued bill," which would open the door for harassment lawsuits against local unions, was defeated in the Senate by a 13-to-11 vote. At the previous legislative session, an identical bill had passed both houses but was blocked by a gubernatorial veto.

Congressional districts were redrawn in line with the state's loss of two seats. In the redistricting, which puts Representatives Wilbur D. Mills and Dale Alford in the same district, and combines portions of the districts of Rep. Oren Harris and the late Rep. W. F. Norrell, "labor got a fair shake" according to State AFL-CIO Pres. George H. Ellison. All incumbent congressmen are Democrats.

California—"Legislative session just now getting rolling," the state AFL-CIO wires in reporting on 180 labor-sponsored bills. The outlook is favorable for rehabilitation training rights in the workmen's compensation law, less favorable for legislation guaranteeing farm workers the right to organize and bargain collectively. Conservatives dominate the Senate Labor Committee despite a 30-to-10 Senate Democratic majority.

A labor-backed bill would broaden existing housing and anti-discrimination statutes and assign enforcement to the state Fair Employment Practices Commission. One major bill would establish a state health care program for California's senior citizens, to be financed through a 1 percent employer payroll tax, but it will be pressed only if Congress should fail to adopt a social security health care program.

Colorado—A labor-backed bill extending workmen's compensation to all occupational diseases is being fought with crippling amendments by employer groups. With legislature evenly split between liberal and conservatives, it's touch-and-go on minimum wage bills, recognition of public employe unions, a prevailing wage on state contracts and other AFL-CIO supported proposals.

Idaho—In addition to the "agricultural" workers' "right-to-work" bill, Idaho labor is faced with the threat of what it calls "the Lawyer's Full Employment bill." This would prevent trained union staff members from representing members before state agencies unless they were members of the bar.

Illinois—With a liberal Democrat, Otto Kerner, in the governorship, labor looks for an effective fair employment law, a state minimum wage, significant improvements in unemployment and workmen's compensation and outlawing of imported strikebreakers.

Michigan—A battle between liberal Democratic Gov. John B. Swainson and the conservative Republican legislature continues to block social legislation. The legislature, on the other hand, seems blocked from restrictive laws.

Maryland — A tug-of-war is waged between labor efforts to improve unemployment compensation and Chamber of Commerce-sponsored efforts to toughen drastically the eligibility requirements.

Massachusetts—Labor is hopeful of gearing jobless benefits to 60 percent of the average state wage, an increase in the state minimum wage to match expected federal action and a constitutional amendment for a graduated state income tax.

Montana—Two anti-labor bills sharply limiting freedom of unions to strike have been killed for the session.

New Hampshire—Labor is fighting a "right-to-work" bill. Some improvement in social legislation is expected despite the drain of energy in the "work" battle.

New Jersey—Increased unemployment compensation, temporary disability insurance and workmen's compensation bills have been passed by the Democratic-controlled lower house. A possibility exists that some compromise legislation will pass Republican Senate, labor observers believe.

New York—Despite some Democratic criticism that it has been watered down, Republican Gov. Nelson Rockefeller's bill to ban housing discrimination is likely to pass. A stronger bill supported by Rockefeller was blocked by Republican legislators at the last session. Labor is seeking major improvements in unemployment and workmen's compensation.

Oregon—Labor is leading a fight to keep Oregon's state self-insurance workmen's compensation program from being parceled out to private insurance companies. Under the present program, 93 cents of every dollar paid by employers in premiums went to injured workers as compared with the national average—under private insurance—of only 62 cents returned in benefits.

Labor is also seeking to gear unemployment compensation to the average weekly wage and liberalize eligibility qualifications. The AFL-CIO is fighting a proposed "little Landrum-Griffin bill" and has beaten down an attempt to impose a "right-to-work" program through amendment of the civil rights statute.

Pennsylvania — Labor-backed proposals made by Gov. David L. Lawrence (D) include a $1.25 state minimum wage, stiffened child labor legislation extended to commercial farms and extension of the fair employment law to employers of six or more persons instead of the present 12.

Texas — Labor sees a "fair chance" of improving unemployment and workmen's compensation.

West Virginia—A labor-backed state income tax proposed by Gov. W. W. Barron (D) to finance long-range economic development of this hard-hit state has been passed by the legislature. Labor expects moderate improvements in unemployment and workmen's compensation benefits and the possibility of establishment of a Human Relations Commission to "strive for elimination of prejudice and discrimination in all areas."

High Cost of Health Care Eats Up Steel Wage Hike

Pittsburgh—Rising costs of health insurance have wiped out a 3-cent-an-hour cost-of-living wage increase conditionally scheduled for more than 500,000 members of the Steelworkers under their contract with the basic steel industry.

Under the 30-month labor pact signed in January 1960 to end the record 116-day steel strike, USWA members were to get a cost-of-living hike—subject to a 3-cent limitation—if the Consumer Price Index rose sufficiently during 1960.

The agreement made the increase conditional on stable costs for the insurance program negotiated by the USWA. The pact was geared to U.S. Steel's program, which was used as a standard for the industry.

The USWA originally challenged U.S. Steel's insurance figures and was prepared to take the issue to arbitration, as provided for by the strike-ending agreement. A re-check of the entire insurance picture resulted in withdrawal of the arbitration proceedings.

Illinois Governor Asks Hike in Jobless Benefits

Chicago—A tripartite advisory board appointed by Gov. Otto Kerner (D) has begun consideration of proposals to liberalize the unemployment compensation laws of Illinois. Its objective is a bill that will command unanimous tripartite endorsement.

Prof. Frank R. Breul, one of the three members appointed to represent the public, is chairman of the board. He is on the faculty of the University of Chicago school of social service administration.

"Unemployment has been rising at an alarming rate since October 1960," Kerner told the board at its opening session. "About the middle of January, unemployment reached 315,000 in Illinois, and the total number of persons filing claims for unemployment benefits was 176,-315.

"Our state government will be derelict in its duty if it does not take immediate steps to alleviate the plight of the unemployed and to concentrate all its resources upon the task of stemming the recession tide."

Illinois' unemployment compensation act currently provides for payment of 13 weeks of emergency benefits during periods of large-scale unemployment to those who have exhausted their regular benefits. The emergency benefits became payable Feb. 15, but only to persons who have exhausted their regular benefits since Feb. 8.

The governor suggested a rollback of the qualifying date to Oct. 31, 1960. About 30,000 unemployed workers in Illinois would benefit from the proposed rollback.

Kerner also suggested a raise in the benefit, which now has maximums of $32 a week for workers without dependents and $50 for workers with four or more dependent children. More than half the unemployed who are drawing compensation have no dependents.

The governor submitted research material to demonstrate his argument that the maximum weekly benefit in Illinois is "far from adequate."

"It constitutes a much smaller proportion of prior average weekly wages than the maximum weekly benefit did in 1940," he said.

He urged the board to prepare a recommendation as rapidly as possible and no later than Mar. 15.

Labor members of the board are P. L. Siemiller, vice president of the Machinists; Harold A. Katz, an attorney for the Auto Workers and other unions; and Charles A. Thompson, secretary-treasurer of the Carpenters District Council.

Mitchell Quits As Chairman Of Rail Study

Former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell has resigned as chairman of the special presidential commission studying the work rules dispute on the nation's railroads.

Mitchell, in a letter to Pres. Kennedy, said the demands on his time as a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of New Jersey "made it impossible" for him to continue to head the commission.

Until Kennedy names a successor, the commission will be headed by its vice chairman, Russell Smith, dean of the University of Michigan Law School. Smith is one of five public members on the tripartite body, equally divided among labor, management and the public.

Both union and industry members of the commission expressed "deep regret" at Mitchell's departure. Earlier they had assured him that they found no conflict of interest if he should decide to continue.

The commission is scheduled to make non-binding proposals for settlement of the long-standing dispute by Dec. 1, 1961.

California Unionist On Welfare Board

Sacramento — Arthur Hellender of Sausalito, assistant secretary of the Alameda County AFL-CIO, has been named by Gov. Edmund G. ("Pat") Brown to a four-year term on the State Social Welfare Board, subject to confirmation by the State Senate.

Hellender is president of the California Association for Health and Welfare and chairman of the East Bay Health and Welfare Committee.

Born 40 years ago in Cambridge, Mass., Hellender is a member of the Communications Workers and formerly was northern California community services director for the former Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Tender Are Their Hearts

IN THE CLASSIC TRADITION of the past half century of opposing nearly all legislation designed to promote the social welfare of the nation, business and industry groups are preparing a new campaign—this time against increasing payroll taxes to finance a temporary federal unemployment compensation program to aid victims of the worst recession since just before World War II.

The specific problem of aiding the 5.4 million unemployed finds the business groups back following the narrow, selfish, profits-at-any-price approach and ignoring the basic economic fact that purchasing power in the hands of unemployed workers means sales and stepped-up business activity.

The Administration proposal to increase the payroll tax is in line with the policies so often preached by these same groups—putting a program on a paying basis instead of incurring a budgetary deficit.

With over half the job areas in the country suffering from unemployment of 6 percent or more, opposition to properly-financed jobless aid is gross irresponsibility.

The One-Sided Press

THE RECENT STRIKE of the railroad-tugboat workers in New York provided another demonstration of how the press and other communications media come down on the side of management with an almost automatic regularity.

In its issue of Feb. 11, the New Yorker magazine, in its "The Talk of the Town" column, comments:

"We are beginning to worry, for the newspapers' sake, about their custom of ruling, in every strike, that labor is wrongheaded, as if they were a panel of arbitrators appointed by a Higher Power."

The magazine continues: "This time, the newspapers were all outraged because '664 maritime workers' could tie up the town by their stubbornness in a dispute with 11 railroad and terminal companies. The corollary, that 11 railroad presidents were being equally stubborn, with as good (or bad) reason, was left for the reader to figure out for himself, and in most cases, we imagine, he did."

Memo on Ethics

THE ALLIS-CHALMERS CO., among the electrical manufacturing companies convicted in the Philadelphia criminal anti-trust trial, blandly estimates that its customers probably were not overcharged despite the admitted rigging of the market in which the companies cut up business at agreed-on percentages and non-competitive prices. If this is so, what was the purpose of the elaborate surreptitious meetings including the "phases of the moon" doubletalk that designated which company would get which contract?

F. F. Loock, president of the Allen-Bradley Co., another convicted firm, acknowledges that no one attending the market-rigging meetings "was so stupid he didn't know" the maneuvers "were in violation of the law." But "it's the only way a business can be run," adds Loock. "It's the free enterprise system."

These observations must be cited to the faculties of the business administration schools of the universities, to the teachers of high school civics, to the moralists of the editorial pages, for their loving attention.

Judge Flays Electrical Firms:

'Sordid, Greedy' Side of Industry Exposed by Price-Fixing Case

Following are excerpts from the text of a statement by Chief Judge J. Cullen Ganey in United States District Court, Philadelphia, prior to sentencing dozens of corporations to heavy fines in the electrical anti-trust case and sending seven executives to jail:

BEFORE IMPOSING SENTENCE, I want to make certain observations concerning the bills of indictment here involved.

They cover some 45 individual defendants and 29 corporations which comprise virtually every large manufacturer of electrical equipment in the industry. This is a shocking indictment of a vast section of our economy, for what is really at stake here is the survival of the kind of economy under which America has grown to greatness, the free enterprise system.

The conduct of the corporate and individual defendants alike, in the words of the distinguished Assistant Attorney General who headed the Anti-Trust Division of the Dept. of Justice, has flagrantly mocked the image of that economic system of free enterprise which we profess to the country and destroyed the model which we offer today as a free world alternative to state control and eventual dictatorship.

Some extent of the vastness of the schemes for price-fixing, bid-rigging and job allocations can be gleaned from the fact that the annual corporate sales covered by these bills of indictment represent $1.75 billion dollars.

Pervasiveness likewise may be judged by the fact that the sales herewith are concerned with a wide variety of products and were made not only to private utilities throughout the country, but by sealed bids to federal, state and municipal governments.

THIS COURT has spent long hours in what it hopes is a fair appraisal of a most difficult task. In reaching that judgment, it is not at all unmindful that the real blame is to be laid at the doorstep of the corporate defendants and those who guide and direct their policy.

While the Dept. of Justice has acknowledged that they were unable to uncover probative evidence which could secure a conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, of those in the highest echelons of the corporations here involved, in a broader sense they bear a grave responsibility for the present situation.

One would be most naive indeed to believe that these violations of the law, so long persisted in, affecting so large a segment of the industry and finally involving so many millions upon millions of dollars, were facts unknown to those responsible for the conduct of the corporation and, accordingly, under their various pleas, heavy fines will be imposed.

As to the individual defendants, the Attorney General who secured the indictments and the present Attorney General . . . [have] wholeheartedly agreed with the government's recommendation in the great majority of cases . . . [and] strongly insisted on the individual defendants serving prison sentences, due to the serious nature of their violations.

IT IS NOT to be taken as disparaging of the long and arduous effort the government has made, and even more, the highly efficient and competent manner of its doing, that only in these instances where ultimate responsibility for corporate conduct . . . vested are prison sentences to be imposed.

Rather am I convinced that in the great number of these defendants' cases, they were torn between conscience and an approved corporate policy, with the rewarding objectives of promotion, comfortable security and large salaries—in short, the organization or the company man, the conformist, who goes along with his superiors and finds balm for his conscience in additional comforts and the security of his place in the corporate set-up. In that this cannot in any wise be a defense to their misconduct is conceded, but long probationary periods where a watchful eye can be kept on their activities, fines will suffice for their first offense.

But this is the sordid, greedy side of the situation and yet there is a bright side. Each and every one of those indicted, both corporations and individuals, faced up to the situation realistically and readily admitted by pleas of guilty and nolo contendere, their violations. For this much must be said, not alone in the saving of great time and expense to the government, in preparing and trying these indictments which would have covered two or three years, but above and beyond that it would cause to point up and emphasize an already unsavory past.

These admissions of guilt, it is hoped, will quickly move this great industry to a thorough reappraisal of their various competitive systems and help move the nation's economy forward under the banner of free enterprise.

Morgan Says:

Private Foundations Reflect Bright Side of Free Society

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THIS MAY COME as a surprise, but the government sometimes finds it difficult, even impossible, to spend money. It bears the bulk of the load of the so-called welfare state. It can't carry it all and there are other items, some of them exploratory and/or controversial, which the Congress or the voters or both restrain it from dabbling with. Here is where that uniquely American institution, the foundation, comes in.

Morgan

Philosophizing on its role, that giant of them all with a net capital worth of more than two billion dollars, the Ford Foundation had this to say in its recently issued annual report—and coming from a group prominently including businessmen and financiers it is a fascinating commentary on the change in outlook of responsible business leaders since the bloodless revolution of the New Deal:

"Human needs," the report said, "are today served by government to an extent never imagined at the dawn of the American republic. Regardless of varying political philosophies, there is nearly universal agreement on the new role of government in certain functions of human welfare. This unanimity stems not from a preference for public over private effort but from the nature of modern society. Only government can marshal the resources neded to cope with certain complex and costly functions of society.

"Far from implying a forfeit of private responsibilities," the report continued, "government expansion poses special challenges to individual initiative and ingenuity. While not entirely precluded from boldness and imagination, responsible government in a democratic society cannot habitually experiment and venture beyond public sentiment."

The Ford Foundation has been experimenting. In the last decade it has given away, on projects ranging from youth research in Harlem to rice research in the Philippines, $1.3 billion. Nobody knows yet how much or whether these experiments are paying off but there is a certain spirit of excitement and adventure to the activities in which hopefulness flourishes.

Giving away money is in itself a hard job. In his book on foundations, Dwight MacDonald described one as "a large body of money completely surrounded by people who want some." But in a combination of experimentation and application of what the business community loves to call "sound business practice," the Ford Foundation has been able to move into a wide variety of fields with care and purpose.

WHEN PAUL HOFFMAN was foundation president, during the Korean War, he launched a series of pioneering and inevitably controversial subsidiary projects, with the assistance of Robert M. Hutchins, former president of the University of Chicago—himself a controversial figure. These included the Fund for Adult Education, the Fund for the Advancement of Education, with emphasis on "new and experimental programs," and the Fund for the Republic, which was established at the very height of the passion plague of McCarthyism to study "the entire field of freedom and civil rights."

Here, I think, is a manifestation of the strength and brightness of the fabric of our society, in contrast to the tawdry underside as reflected in the fining of the country's leading electrical manufacturing firms and the imprisoning of several of their executives for flagrant violation of the anti-trust laws.

The current report of Ford Foundation Pres. Henry T. Heald, former head of New York University, shows that of the nearly $1.5 billion disbursed since 1951, more than half a billion of it went via various channels into education. Nearly $300 million went to hospitals and medical schools, nearly $260 million to international projects, a kind of non-governmental program of foreign aid. The rest went into the fields of economics and business, public affairs and the arts and sciences.

In a society which seems to concentrate its culture on the drugstore book counter and television entertainment, this last category is particularly important. Lively and rewarding educational television projects have been encouraged and supported by Ford money.

Some individuals and companies undoubtedly have used the tax-free instrument of a foundation as a tax-dodging haven but the Ford, Rockefeller, Carnegie and other funds are just as undoubtedly on the constructive side of the ledger. Government cannot, must not do everything and these foundations have shown the way for taking over part of the load.

Washington Reports:

Fast Action by Congress Seen On Temporary Jobless Aid

TEMPORARY EXTENSION of unemployment compensation payments can be effective by Apr. 1, Rep. Thaddeus M. Machrowicz (D-Mich.), member of the House Ways & Means Committee, forecast on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

On the same program, Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski (R-Wis.) said that the economic situation, which the measure would alleviate, "is the worst since 1929-32." He and Machrowicz pointed out that the bill now before the committee "is only a stopgap."

"The ultimate answer—as the President said in his message to Congress—is the establishment of federal standards. Until that is established, we shall have this situation with us all the time," Machrowicz asserted.

He said he was pleased that Pres. John F. Kennedy had made temporary extension of unemployment compensation "the first point in his program and that the Ways & Means Committee had thought the situation so important that it began immediate hearings and limited them."

O'KONSKI EXPRESSED pleasure that the President had included relief for children of unemployed parents among his requests for immediate action. He noted that the machinery is set up for aid to both the children and the jobless, and the aid can be extended without delay once the bill is passed and signed.

Machrowicz noted that recent layoffs in the automobile industry have made a bad situation worse.

"As of mid-January," he said, "over 600,000 out of 5.4 million unemployed have been jobless for 27 weeks or longer. And at least half a million or more have already drawn all the compensation to which they are entitled. In addition, 1.7 million, a rise of 200,000 over the previous month, are on part-time work."

The congressman said that the average monthly number of children who would be aided by the aid to dependent children proposal is more than 750,000.

O'Konski gave as an instance of the need of federal standards the fact that vessels on the Great Lakes, including seamen from Wisconsin, are usually chartered in Ohio because the unemployment compensation laws in that state are more lenient. States with high standards also cause dislocation of industry, he declared.

"The critical situation which now exists," said O'Konski, "simply points out the defects in the present system where aid is left to the whims of 50 different states."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE USUAL February-blooming stories about sloth and apathy in Congress are beginning to blossom in the newspapers, as reporters observe that the gentlemen seem singularly slack in responding to Pres. Kennedy's urgent calls for prompt anti-recession legislation. It would be a misreading, however, to believe that apathy is a correct word.

What we have, instead, is a slowdown that is calculated and purposeful, very largely on the part of the Republicans but to some extent on the part of the GOP's Dixiecrat allies, backed by the ancient enemies of federal action in the field of general welfare, the big business trade associations.

Mr. Kennedy talks crisis and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg talks crisis about the plight of the unemployd.

The Republican Party has a vested interest, or thinks it has, in denying that there is any crisis. The Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers are opposed, as in the past, to higher minimum wages and unemployment compensation, to federal school aid and depressed areas bills, to social security expansion and to aid the families of the unemployed. Nothing has changed, except that it is less certain this year that the opponents of action will have their total way.

ONE MIGHT THINK that the GOP, the Dixiecrats and the business spokesmen would feel some disturbance about the simple statistics—the fact that unemployment dipped slightly below 5 percent only three months during the two years of so-called recovery from the 1958-59 recession; that the number of long-term jobless has skyrocketed; that the rate of unemployed has climbed back above 6 percent and is pushing 7 percent.

The fact is, however, that the official publication of the Republican National Committee, Battle Line, charges that Speaker Sam Rayburn's comments on the current recession are a "major political exaggeration" and a "prefabricated ill wind" designed to "frighten America."

The head of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce argued with Goldberg during the Secretary's recent tour that taxes should not be increased on business to finance longer-term insurance payments to the jobless.

The Republican congressional leaders, Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.), conceded Feb. 16 that the economy had "receded" from what Dirksen blandly called "the high level of 1960." But Dirksen insisted that any measures adopted should be mere relief, and Halleck said if there was a recession it was already Kennedy's fault. The new President had been in office one day short of four weeks, but Halleck said "too much time has gone by" to blame lack of action last year by the Eisenhower Administration and that "the responsibility has shifted."

WHAT IS GOING ON, plainly, is a full-scale public relations competition between the Kennedy Administration with its call for action and the Republicans and their allies who want only limited action, if any, such as they might have had under Eisenhower.

That is why Kennedy arranged for Goldberg to give thorough briefings to Rayburn and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) on the Secretary's midwestern trip. That is why Kennedy himself in his press conference Feb. 15 specifically reviewed his five major immediate programs for assistance to the jobless and urged Congress to pass them so aid would go out "this winter." That is why Republicans scoff at his urgency.

Both sides are reaching out for public support. Both sides know very well that public opinion will decide the contest finally, and that in the House of Representatives, particularly, the shift of half a dozen or a dozen votes will determine the form in which bills are passed, the philosophy behind them and the content.

Congress may look apathetic, but underneath the deadly struggle for power goes on. The question of what is done is still to be decided by whether Kennedy is able to create a sense of urgency in the people that will be reflected in Congress.

THE ECONOMIC SITUATION is "the worst today since we have been in Congress," Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski (R-Wis.), left, declared as he and Rep. Thaddeus M. Machrowicz (D-Mich.) discussed Pres. Kennedy's proposed temporary extension of unemployment compensation during an interview in Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Planning Home Improvements? Check Four Ways of Financing

By Sidney Margolius

U. S. FAMILIES are investing record sums currently in home improvement and expansion—about $11 billion a year, in fact. Families are getting bigger; many have outgrown the small homes built in the early 1950's. Too, many older houses require extensive modernization and repair.

Actually, this year is a little more favorable for home improvements than the past few years have been. Costs have leveled off, and some have gone down a little, as in the case of heating and plumbing equipment, lumber and roofing materials.

A sound investment in home modernization requires these steps:

- Avoid the high-pressure sellers.
- Compare estimates among reputable local contractors.
- Finance the least-costly way suitable to your project.

Complaints of abuses in home repairs are still so widespread that the Better Business Bureau of New York recently launched a campaign to combat such deceptions.

The most frequent tricks are bait ads, offering improvements at low prices with no intention of selling that cheaply; deceptive ad layouts, giving the impression that the illustrated improvements are available at low prices; failure to make good on guarantees; and the continued misuse of FHA completion certificates. Some sellers have been getting homeowners to sign such certificates before the work is actually finished. The sellers then take the certificates to the bank to get their money, and the homeowner is left to pay the bank for incomplete work.

Deceptions have been especially frequent recently in the sale of carports, roofing and siding jobs, and garage extensions.

HERE ARE COMPARATIVE COSTS of various ways to finance home improvements:

Open-End Re-Advance. Many mortgages have an "open end" clause. It permits you to reborrow up to the original amount of your mortgage at the same interest rate without large closing costs other than a service charge of often $25-$50.

For example, suppose you have a 25-year mortgage at 5 percent interest, and in ten years have repaid $3,000. You return to the mortgage-holder and ask for a new advance of $2,000 for home expansion. If approved, the loan is added to your balance. You arrange to repay it either by increasing your monthly payment or by extending your mortgage.

Advantage of the re-advance is that your present mortgage interest rate is probably lower than that obtainable on a new mortgage nowadays, and much lower than short-term modernization loans (see below).

Another advantage is that repayment is spread over a number of years. A re-advance of $2,000 on a 5 percent mortgage which still has 15 years to run would require additional payments of $15.82 a month. In contrast, an FHA home-improvement loan of $2,000 for 36 months would require $63.88 a month, or if stretched to the maximum 60 months, $41.57.

Disadvantage is that if your mortgage still has many years to run, your total interest cost in dollars for the re-advance will be more than for a short-term loan even at a higher rate.

Too, lenders sometimes are reluctant to advance money at old low mortgage rates when they can get 5.75 and 6 percent on new mortgages.

Refinancing Your Mortgage. This means getting an entirely new mortgage. It is a possibility if your mortgage-holder refuses an open-end advance on your present mortgage. But it generally will be costlier than the open-end re-advance. It probably will require a higher interest rate than your old mortgage carries, and also, higher closing costs for title search, etc.

Thus, an FHA modernization loan, even at a higher rate, can help you keep your present low mortgage rate rather than refinance.

FHA Modernization Loans. These are now available for as much as $3,500. The fee is $5 per $100 of loan up to $2,500 and $4 per $100 over $2,500. But this fee is charged on the original amount, unlike mortgage interest which is calculated only on your declining balance each month. Thus, the $5 per $100 really is a true annual interest rate of about 10 percent.

Personal Loans. Sometimes you can beat the FHA modernization-loan rate with a personal loan. In some of the largest cities, banks charge as little as $4 per $100 for personal loans. In less-competitive areas, the charge is more generally $6; thus, more than the FHA rate. Credit-union rates range from $3.25 to $6.50 per $100—lower than the FHA rate in many cases.

Small loan companies charge highest rates, frequently about $9.75 to $12.50 per $100.

On 'Briefing Session' Program:

Economic Advisers See Tax Cut Need

TOP ECONOMISTS representing both the Kennedy and Eisenhower viewpoints agree that a tax cut will be essential by spring unless there is a pronounced recovery from the recession.

Prof. Paul A. Samuelson, head of Pres. Kennedy's pre-inauguration economic task force, and Prof. Henry C. Wallich, member of former Pres. Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers, united on this point during the opening program of "Briefing Session," the new public affairs television series presented by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Otherwise the two were in sharp dispute over the role of government in the national economy, especially as to the action, or inaction, of the previous Administration.

Wallich, now at Yale University, maintained that the recession was less severe than it has been painted, and that in any event, the Eisenhower regime had taken action by easing credit, accelerating the placement of government contracts and stepping up housing and highway construction.

Samuelson retorted that the former Administration, even in its final reports, never conceded the existence of a recession, and its actions were inadequate and too tardy.

"The time to nip a recession in the bud is not after it gets rolling," he said. The slump could be seen as early as last summer, he claimed, but was "glossed over" by the Administration.

SAMUELSON ALSO expressed alarm at the "ominous" pattern of more frequent recessions, shorter periods of recovery and the failure of each upswing to absorb the unemployed from the previous slump. The obvious facts, he said, are more important than arguments over statistics.

"It is like arguing about whether you have a temperature of 103.1 or 103.3," he pointed out. "In either case you are sick."

It's the same with economic growth, he went on:

"Suppose you had a nine-year-old and you said, 'Well, look, his weight is just as great this year as last year, or maybe only a little bit less.' You would know you had an ailing boy. Such an economy as ours has to establish records every year or it is in serious trouble."

Fourteen stations of the NET network are showing the opening program of "Briefing Session" the week beginning Feb. 20 and 14 more will air it a week later.

The second program in the series will be entitled "National Goal —Full Employment; National Headache—How?" Scheduled for first showing during the week of Feb. 26, it will feature the same participants as the opening discussion.

From Soup to Nuts:

Not a Memory Course! —I Need Something to Help Me Forget

By Jane Goodsell

I HEAR THAT SOMEBODY has written another book on how to improve your memory. I can't remember the name of it and, just between you and me, I couldn't care less. I'm not interested in improving my memory.

My trouble isn't the things I can't remember. It's the things I can't forget.

Now, if somebody would write a book telling me how to erase my memory of the day the elastic in my underpants broke, I'd be glad to fork over $4.95 to my friendly bookseller.

It happened in the fourth grade, and I can remember it as clearly as if it happened yesterday. I was standing at the blackboard doing a problem in long division. It was raining outside and the teacher (who was wearing a navy blue dress) was sitting at her desk tapping her teeth with a pencil, and everybody in the whole class was looking at me and —well, as I say, I can remember the whole scene in vivid, cinemascopic detail, and I wish I couldn't.

I want to develop the power of negative forgetfulness.

This is the real problem, but the memory experts refuse to tackle it. They're too busy confusing us with elaborate techniques for remembering names, dates and telephone numbers.

If I can't remember my own phone number, what difference does it make? That's what telephone books are for. It might be nice to remember people's names, but I get along all right, sort of, calling everybody "Hiya!"

When I lie wake at night, beating my fists into my pillow, I'm not trying to remember the name of my best friend's chiropodist. I'm remembering the day I went to a tea with my zipper unzipped.

It isn't the things on the tip of my tongue that bother me. It's the things in the back of my mind, the moments of humiliation burned into my memory.

UAW Panel Reports

Detroit—The Public Review Board of the Auto Workers heard 20 formal appeals during its third year of existence deciding 17, returning 1 to the UAW executive board, and holding 2 pending decision. Of informal complaints involving 90 members, three were found suitable for board action.

In a report to members for the 12-month period ending Sept. 30, 1960, the seven-member board, headed by Rabbi Morris Adler of Detroit, said that the volume of cases remained extremely low for a union with well over 1 million members and praised the UAW for giving the board complete autonomy and "scrupulously respecting" its independence.

A formal complaint dismissed for what the report called "lack of particularity" came from UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and the executive board. The case involved public charges made against the UAW by four Republican members of the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field—the McClellan committee.

The board asked Reuther to specify which provision of the AFL-CIO ethical practices codes allegedly were violated, and when he replied he could not supply the information and that the charges were "politically inspired," the Review Board took no further action.

THREE JUDGES in the Newspaper Guild's annual Heywood Broun Memorial Award contest plowed through entries submitted by 86 newsmen from the United States and Canada, seeking the work judged most representative of the crusading spirit of the Guild's founder. The judges, left to right, are Gerald E. Griffin, head of the Baltimore Sunpapers' Washington office; Howard K. Smith of Columbia Broadcasting System's Washington news bureau; John T. O'Rourke, editor, Washington Daily News.

Liberals Keep Control Of Labor Committees

Liberals appeared to remain in control of both the House and Senate Labor Committees as Republicans and Democrats completed committee assignments for the 87th Congress.

In the House, where the chairmanship of the Education & Labor Committee passed to Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. (D-N. Y.), the Democrats have a 19-12 margin. Liberal and moderate forces appeared assured of 17 votes—enough for approval—on most, if not all, of Pres. John F. Kennedy's legislative proposals.

The Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee, still under the chairmanship of Sen. Lister Hill (D-Ala.), has 10 Democrats and five Republicans. Of the Democrats, eight are holdovers—all with records of solid support for measures similar to those the Administration has sent, or plans to send, to Capitol Hill. The two new Democratic members, both freshmen, are rated as liberals.

There are eight new faces on the House Education & Labor Committee—four from each party. The new Democrats include Representatives Ralph J. Scott (N. C.), expected to vote with the conservative forces on the basis of his support of the Landrum-Griffin Act and his opposition to depressed areas and broad minimum wage legislation in the previous Congress; Neal Smith (Ia.), who supported all of the liberal measures in his first House term; and liberal freshmen Charles S. Joelson (N. J.) and Fernand J. St. Germain (R. I.).

The new GOP members—Representatives Peter A. Garland (Me.), Donald C. Bruce (Ind.), John M. Ashbrook (O.) and Dave Martin (Neb.)—all defeated liberal Democratic incumbents, supported by COPE, in the 1960 congressional elections. They are expected to vote most of the time with the right-wing bloc.

Holdover Democrats on the House committee include only one conservative, Rep. Phil M. Landrum (Ga.), co-author of the restrictive labor bill passed in 1959, who voted for the most part with the right-wing forces.

Other Democratic holdovers, all liberals, are Representatives Cleveland M. Bailey (W. Va.), Carl D. Perkins (Ky.), Edith Green (Ore.), James Roosevelt (Calif.), Herbert Zelenko (N. Y.), Frank Thompson, Jr. (N. J.), Elmer J. Holland (Pa.), John H. Dent (Pa.), Roman C. Pucinski (Ill.), Dominick V. Daniels (N. J.), John Brademas (Ind.), Robert N. Giaimo (Conn.), and James G. O'Hara (Mich.).

Returning GOP members are Representatives Carroll D. Kearns (Pa.), Clare E. Hoffman (Mich.), Peter Frelinghuysen, Jr. (N. J.), William H. Ayres (O.), Robert P. Griffin (Mich.), Edgar W. Hiestand (Calif.), Albert H. Quie (Minn.) and Charles E. Goodell (N. Y.).

Two of these Republican members—Frelinghuysen and Ayres—broke with the conservative forces to support federal-aid-to-education legislation in the 86th Congress.

On the Senate side, the two freshman Democrats are Senators Benjamin A. Smith (Mass.), named to Kennedy's vacant seat following the presidential election, and Claiborne deB. Pell (R. I.).

They joined veteran liberal Democrats Wayne Morse (Ore.), Ralph W. Yarborough (Tex.), Joseph S. Clark (Pa.), Jennings Randolph (W. Va.), Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (N. J.) and Quentin N. Burdick (N. D.).

All five GOP members on the Senate committee are holdovers. Of this number, Senators Clifford P. Case (N. J.) and Jacob K. Javits (N. Y.) have voted with the liberal forces on such measures as minimum wage and school legislation, although in the 86th Congress they voted against broader temporary unemployment compensation and area redevelopment legislation.

Conservative Republicans are Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and Winston L. Prouty (Vt.).

Heading the Labor subcommittee will be McNamara, while Morse will become chairman of the Education subcommittee.

AFL-CIO Publishes New Pamphlet List

A new list of AFL-CIO leaflets, pamphlets and other publications is available from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications.

Listed are the names of 59 booklets and pamphlets on taxation, consumer guides, organizing and other topics of interest to union members and officials. An order list may be obtained without charge from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

CANADIAN trade unionists, almost 600 strong, met in the nation's capital, Ottawa, for a briefing session arranged by the Canadian Labor Congress. After hearing reports that up to 12 percent of the working force may be jobless this winter, the unionists called on members of Parliament to discuss labor's proposal for a federal full-employment program.

CSA Opens Field Headquarters To Aid Refugees Fleeing Cuba

Miami—AFL-CIO Community Service Activities has established a special field headquarters here to expedite the relief, employment and resettlement of thousands of Cuban refugees pouring into the United States.

CSA Dir. Leo Perlis announced in New York that the special operation, established in conjunction with the Cuban Refugee Emergency Center here, would be geared to providing referral services for families seeking information on employment, union membership, community integration and social services.

Labor's role in aiding those fleeing the dictatorship of Fidel Castro will be patterned closely after the major contribution made by the AFL-CIO in 1956 and 1957 when a similar office was set up at Camp Kilmer, N.J., to aid Hungarian refugees.

The move came in the wake of action by the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month in assigning CSA the task of coordinating labor's activities on behalf of the Cuban refugees. The council voted a $10,000 contribution to the U.S. Committee for Refugees, which was already operating in the Miami area.

Direct Help Provided

At that time, Pres. George Meany said labor was anxious to provide "some direct help for the unfortunate victims of the present Cuban terror," and said that the $10,000 grant—nearly tripling sums voted by the council in 1960 for the Refugee Committee's total operations—"reflects our concern over the present Cuban refugee situation."

Perlis disclosed that CSA had assisted the U.S. Committee in the allocation of $5,000 of the funds to four social agencies working among the Cuban nationals. The agencies include Catholic Relief Services, which received $2,500; International Rescue Committee, $1,500; Church World Service, $500; and the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, $500.

In addition, he said, CSA has offered assistance to all other agencies in the employment and resettlement area and has requested local CSA representatives across the country to cooperate in the program of finding jobs for the refugees, "taking into account your local unemployment problems."

In another action, Perlis and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the Community Services Committee, met recently with Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff, who has been assigned overall responsibility for the refugee program by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Perlis said they assured Ribicoff that labor is "deeply interested" in the problem and would "cooperate in any way." At the same time they urged that an advisory council, composed of labor and social agency officials, be named to assist Ribicoff's special representative in the refugee operation.

Robert E. Flaherty, a member of the CSA national staff, has been placed in charge of the refugee field office. It was Flaherty who ran the earlier operation for Hungarian refugees at Camp Kilmer.

L-G Injunction Threat Frees Runaway Ship

Philadelphia—The Intl. Maritime Workers' Union, threatened with an injunction under the Landrum-Griffin Act, has signed a stipulation agreeing not to picket American-owned Liberian-flag freighter Ore Monarch for a period of 30 days.

Under terms of the stipulation, signed after the National Labor Relations Board went to court, the Ore Monarch sailed from the dock where it had been tied since last Oct. 21 and headed for a port where it could be unloaded.

Thus the IMWU lost a round in its fight to organize "runaway" flag ships, particularly those of Daniel K. Ludwig, head of the giant Universe Tankships, Inc., and so called "king of the runaways."

Ludwig is said to own 50 of the world's biggest ships. Most of them fly the flag of Liberia or Panama and are manned by seamen from the Cayman Islands, British West Indies. Universe Tankships claims it has a valid contract with the Global Seamen's Union, but IMWU said the union never has won an election and is not recognized by the NLRB.

"Ludwig was defeated in the courts and on the picket line," said Shannon Wall, director of the IMWU. "So he got the Pennsylvania Railroad and three other parties to claim they were the victims of a secondary boycott.

'We Will Keep on Fighting'

"He got his ship out of this port, but nothing has changed. At the end of 30 days we may resume picketing, or we may not. But we will keep on fighting those runaway fleets."

Back of the signing, and the escape of the Ore Monarch to another port, were these incidents:

- The Ludwig freighter docked here last fall to lighten cargo before proceeding to the Fairless steel plant. When pickets began patrolling on the dock and by boat in the river, Ludwig tied up the ship and went to court.
- The Philadelphia Court of Common Claims ruled against Universe Tankships. So did the Pennsylvania Court of Appeals, which held that Ludwig's remedy was not in the courts but with the NLRB.
- The Pennsylvania Railroad, along with a dock company, a towing company and a stevedore firm, then filed a petition for an injunction. The labor board advised the court that the labor law probably had been violated by the picketing.

The IMWU was formed by the Maritime Union and the Seafarers to organize runaway ships flying the flags of other nations. Wall, its director, is NMU vice president.

The unions still are waiting for NLRB to decide whether elections can be held on foreign-flag ships owned by Americans. They have been waiting for more than a year.

ICFTU Supports Hammarskjold, UN

Brussels—The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has cabled its "full unreserved support" of United Nations' Sec.-Gen. Dag Hammarskjold and particularly its support of his efforts in the Congo Republic.

The ICFTU said in its cable:

"In this hour of crisis we wish to assure you of full unreserved support of the many million workers in the free world for your activities generally, and for your efforts to help the Congo Republic overcome its grave difficulties. Firmly hope you will continue action to save the Congo from anarchy and misery."

Meany Tells Maritime Group:

Hard Battle Ahead On Recession Bills

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The labor movement faces a "real problem" in securing legislation from the 87th Congress to help end the recession and to achieve long-range economic growth, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Maritime Trades Dept. Executive Council here.

The close vote on enlarging the House Rules committee, he told a luncheon meeting, is a "pretty good sample of what we're up against" in Congress. The vote to enlarge the committee and help clear Pres. Kennedy's legislative program for full House action was 217 to 212. A switch of three votes would have defeated the proposal.

The outlook for enactment of a broad legislative program, said Meany, has improved in terms of the executive branch, where legislation no longer faces a "presidential veto," but, he added, the situation in Congress is not as "favorable" as it was a year ago.

"I have the greatest confidence in Kennedy's program and in him personally," the federation president declared, but "we have our work cut out for us" to win needed legislation on minimum wage, aid to education, unemployment compensation and other programs."

The Maritime Trades Dept. in its meeting called on 31 affiliated unions to join an economic blockade of Fidel Castro's Cuban regime by refusing to man, load or unload vessels carrying cargo to or from the island.

Seeks Caribbean Group

The board voted to launch a Caribbean federation of maritime labor seeking to unify all seamen and dock workers in Gulf of Mexico ports and those of the West Indies.

The blockade of Castro is intended to include the picketing of railroads which trans-ship goods by non-union car ferry between West Palm Beach and Cuba, and from such other ports as Miami and New Orleans.

The railroad ferry is considered a focal point in the effort to enforce boycotts of Castro. Unless pickets can halt the traffic, Cuba will continue to benefit from shipments of sealed boxcars from Canada, the delegates were told.

Canada does not have the same restrictions on trade with Cuba as does the United States, which permits only food or drugs to be transshipped. The intent of the boycott would be to halt any other shipment to or from the Castro-run island.

At the board meeting, delegates also urged abolition of the New York-New Jersey Waterfront Commission on the ground that it has outlived its usefulness.

'Same Old Opposition'

Meany in his appearance before the board warned that in regard to the Kennedy anti-recession program the "same old opposition" is coming from the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, who, he said, "never learn lessons from the past."

Meany warned also that labor is facing a new campaign pitched to the idea that high wages are responsible for the balance-of-trade problem. This new attack, replacing the worn-out theme that wage increases were responsible for inflation, is an "absolute misconception," he said.

The balance-of-payments deficit has nothing to do with wages but with expenditures for foreign aid, military support and other overseas programs. Last year the U.S. had a favorable balance of trade of $4.5 billion, he stressed.

"Don't let anyone tell you," he warned, "that low wages is the answer to our problem." The U.S. is a high-wage economy and the problem at the moment is to expand the rate of economic growth and find jobs for the new workers entering the labor force at a steadily increasing rate.

Hall Thanks Kennedy

Meany's confidence in Kennedy was the theme also of a letter from Maritime Trades Dept. Pres. Paul Hall to the President thanking him for the "brilliant and inspiring commencement of your Administration" and urging him to "consider the plight of the American maritime industry" so that steps could be taken "to restore our maritime power and efficiency."

Hall's letter accused the former Eisenhower Administration of "presiding over the liquidation of the American merchant marine" and said that "important segments of our shipping industry are in their death throes." He wrote that "80 percent of the qualified and documented American seamen are not employed in the industry and dependent industries . . . are depressed and unprepared to discharge their proper functions."

The "Republican Administration," Hall added, "never recognized these problems . . . and with complete indifference allowed our fleets to languish and die."

Existing laws, he stressed, empower the Secretary of Commerce "to do all the things necessary" to keep the merchant marine in a "flourishing condition."

Donald C. Thoms, UPP Official, Dies

Chicago—Donald C. Thoms, vice president of the Papermakers and Paperworkers and a union regional director since 1952, died here at 57 after an illness of several months. As director of UPP Region 10, he supervised union activities in Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma and Colorado.

UPP Pres. Paul L. Phillips and Executive Vice Pres. Harry Sayre represented union officers at last rites in Oak Park, Ill. Phillips praised Thoms as a "warm, generous personality," whose life was devoted to improving the lot of his fellow man.

Thoms was a first-class millwright when he was elected president of the union local at the Chicago plant of the Container Corp. of America, Ogden division. He was named to the international Paperworkers' staff in 1946, and in 1952 was elected director of Region 6 for Wisconsin, Illinois, Kansas and Missouri. Later he was elected Region 10 director.

100th Pint of Blood Given by Machinist

Charley S. Simon, Machinists' Union member who works for the District of Columbia post office, has improved his claim to the title of a champion blood donor.

Simon was given a special welcome when he appeared at the Red Cross blood donor center to contribute blood for the 100th time.

Human Suffering in Job Crisis Exposed

Goldberg Tours 5 Hard-Hit States, Meets with Unemployed Workers in Chicago, Gary, Detroit, Pittsburgh and Columbus, O.

The faceless statistics of government reports were shaped into human beings and problems of family survival enshrouded in uncertainty and fear.

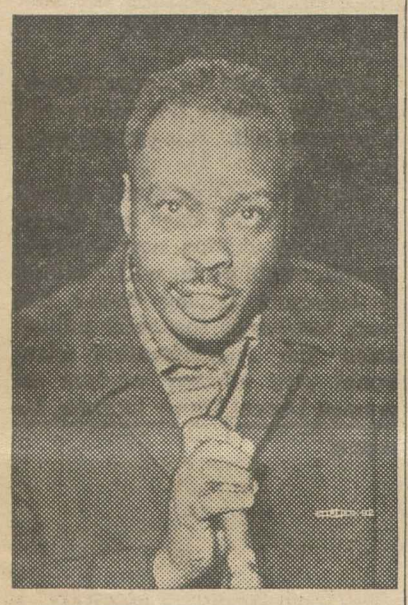
Correspondents for the AFL-CIO News were on the scene and here are their reports:

Chicago Area

"I want to get off unemployment compensation. I need a job," Bricklayer Chico told Goldberg when the secretary dropped in at an unemployment compensation office in the heart of Chicago's South Side industrial complex.

"I have six children. I can't support them on the $50 a week I'm getting," Chico told Goldberg. He said he has been drawing benefits since early November.

Frank Stiller, 54-year-old former millwright at the Ford Aircraft Division plant, explained that he has worked only a year since 1957 and has used his savings to care for his sick wife.



AT GARY, IND., in the Chicago area complex, Cleanan McElroy, an unemployed worker who in good times earns his living at Inland Steel's East Chicago plant, describes problems of the jobless.

"Companies won't hire me because I'm over 40," Stiller commented.

Goldberg told the unemployed workers that Kennedy "needs your help. Tell your congressmen how you feel about the problems that mean so much to you and your family."

As Goldberg's automobile caravan speeded along the Calumet Expressway toward Gary, Ind., through fields of partially-operating oil refineries and steel mills, a radio news broadcast said joblessness in the Gary-Hammond-East Chicago and South Bend area had increased to the 9-to-11.9 percent depressed-area bracket.

Met by a crowd at the Gary City Hall, Goldberg listened as Harold Devault, Calumet Township trustee in charge of welfare, told the gathering:

"We face a crisis in this land of plenty."

Columbus, O.

"We want to go back to work" was the common yearning expressed by those who talked to Goldberg at the hall of Auto Workers' Local 927. Tears welled in the eyes of some as they related tales of hardship.

Steelworker Shively told the cabinet officer that he has but four more weeks to go before exhausting his jobless compensation and "there just isn't any" work to be found.

Jess Mullenix, 50-year-old Steelworker and father of three, struggled to maintain his composure as he told how he has filed bankruptcy papers and faced the loss of a home he built himself.

Mullenix has worked part-time for four months—one of the 1.7 million counted by the government in January as "working part-time involuntarily"—and is trying to keep his son at Ohio State University. A daughter whose husband died recently will soon move in with her child, Mullenix said.

$35 a Month

Mrs. Helen Cummings, unemployed since April of last year, said she was trying to get by on $35 a month in direct relief since she exhausted her jobless pay benefits in October. She said she and her child face eviction soon because she cannot pay the rent.

"When I apply for a job and I tell them I'm 42," Mrs. Cummings told Goldberg, "they say I'm too old."

The union supplied sandwiches and soft drinks for the occasion and the children of Victor E. Shiman expressed wonderment at the meat in the sandwiches while their father talked to Goldberg.

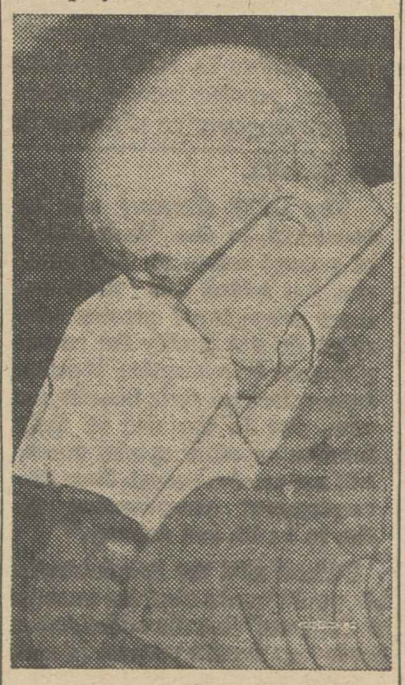
"All I'm looking for is a chance to work," Shiman commented. The father of six, with a seventh expected in March, Shiman said he has been without steady work since August 1959.

Earlier, Goldberg met with labor and business leaders at the office of Gov. Michael V. DiSalle (D).

State officials told Goldberg the latest jobless rate was an all-time high of 9.1 percent for workers covered by Ohio's compensation law and 12 percent for all workers.

When leaders of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce and the Ohio Manufacturers Association took issue with the Kennedy proposal to raise the payroll tax to finance an extension of jobless pay, Goldberg said this approach was more responsible than making an outright federal grant and added:

"I haven't found any affluent unemployed."



IN COLUMBUS, O., Jess Mullenix, father of three, who has had only parttime work for four months, breaks down as he tells of possible loss of his home as a result of joblessness.

Pittsburgh Area

Goldberg took a tour of this area, visiting local union halls of the Steelworkers and individual families in small towns after a briefing session in which State Sec. of Labor and Industry William L. Batt, Jr., explained the state has 504,000 unemployed.

Some 100 Steelworkers and a few women gathered at the hall of USW Local 1272.

USW Vice-Pres. Howard R. Hague introduced Goldberg and told the audience that "we don't want to go through a recurring recession every four years."

Mrs. Betty Jane Milano of Collier, expecting her third child this summer, said she was working at a textile mill to support her family because her husband was jobless.

Edward Dean said he has been unemployed since last November.

"Since 1952, I've been working about 18 months out of every two years. I can't keep my head above water," Dean said.

MRS. JOSEPH CHARNEY at a Pittsburgh meeting tells of the plight of her family with three children after her husband, a Bethlehem Steel Co. worker, had been laid off several months.

At another meeting place, Rep. James G. Fulton (R-Pa.) pledged his support to a program of action.

"This is a human problem," Fulton said. "It's happening under both parties, so maybe both parties better wake up."

Steelworkers' Pres. David J. McDonald, in a statement presented to Goldberg, pointed out that 150,000 steel union members have been laid off and another 400,000 are on short workweeks. McDonald urged jobless pay extension and public works projects as emergency measures.

Detroit

"The goal of the Kennedy Administration is to get everybody back to work full time," Goldberg told a meeting of the unemployed at the Labor Temple here.

Dozens of unemployed workers stood and told their stories, stories which might be taken as representative of the motor city's 165,000 jobless.

The speakers included a 61-year-old factory worker with 30 years of seniority who lost his job when his plant closed; a 27-year-old tool and die maker who had spent four years learning his trade and now cannot find a job; a 50-year-old construction worker, a father of five who said a married son is supporting the entire family.

There was a 57-year old maintenance man out of work a year, who said he has exhausted his jobless pay and must support his wife and three children on $22 a week welfare payments; a 47-year old factory worker jobless 20 of the past 24 months; a 41-year old carpenter and father of six school-age children, who has worked five months since early 1960.

George Dorka, Jr., president of Steelworkers' Local 5373, told of the impact on his 300-member local—all 300 are jobless.

"Nobody wants older men," commented William Siwaka, who at 61 figures he'll have to find some way of getting through the next four years until he can receive social security.

Other workers told reporters how they were forced to sell their insurance policies to pay taxes, of fears of losing their homes, of inability to maintain payments on and meeting their medical bills.

"We don't heat the upstairs, we try to save on gas bills," said Helen Cross, laid off by Chrysler last September.

AT DETROIT MEETING, Cross Mischeff of Auto Workers Local 155 and Mrs. Helen Cross, front seats, listen to Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg present Kennedy anti-recession program. Mischeff called for a New Frontier approach that would permanently meet the needs of the jobless. In Local 155, 8,000 are jobless; Mrs. Cross, a Budd worker, has been laid off since September.

"I worked five days last year. My wife works a little, here and there. I have a pocketful of unpaid bills I can't meet," remarked Harry Williams of Laborers' Local 334.

Jack Rager, father of five and laid off at Budds last September after 16 years' service, said that 2,100 members of his local will exhaust their jobless benefits in March.

Goldberg told the Labor Temple audience the Administration "is determined we shall revitalize the country so that we can have an economy with maximum employment instead of maximum unemployment."

At a Goldberg meeting with labor, industry and government leaders at a downtown hotel, Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther told the gathering that auto workers with 26 years of seniority were walking the streets while the industry was faced with a 69-day inventory of 1 million new cars.

Crafts Move to Prevent Missile Site Stoppages

adding the action is the first by a major labor group to respond to Pres. Kennedy's statement of the urgency of the situation which exists in the missile program.

The department recalled its record in responding to national needs as "evidenced by the highest official commendation of the department's work during World War II in speeding the completion of the Clinton and Hanford atomic bomb projects, the building of a great chain of naval bases at home and abroad and in the completion of the vast construction program of the Corps of Engineers."

4-Point Program

To aid the President in his determination to build an "invulnerable missile force," the statement declared, the following program will apply to all unions affiliated with the department, "their constituent local unions and the various state and local building trades councils:"

1. "All local and national procedures for the settlement of labor disputes without interruption of construction shall be complied with, strictly, including the procedures of the National Joint Board for the Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes."

2. "No strike, picketing, or work stoppage shall be undertaken on any missile project by any local union without complete exhaustion of all available procedures and methods for the peaceful settlement of the dispute and the prior authorization of the general president of the national or international union with which the local union is affiliated."

3. "No state official building and construction trades council shall render aid, assistance or support to any local union which strikes, pickets or engages, in a work stoppage which violates this policy; nor shall any state or local building and construction trades council recognize any strike, picketing or work stoppage which violates this policy."

4. "Each general president of the affiliated national and international unions and the president of the department shall notify all constituent local unions and local and state building and construction trades councils of this missile project policy and take appropriate action to implement this policy."

Haggerty told reporters that the policy is designed to deter walkouts by exploring thoroughly all peaceful means of settling disputes, but stressed that it is "not taking away the right to strike."

Enlargement of the labor relations staffs of the Air Force and other services concerned should be helpful, Haggerty said, in assuring uninterrupted work on the key bases and sites.

Goldberg Asks Speed on Jobless Pay

TUC Plan Would Aid 3 Million Unemployed

erage to workers who exhausted regular benefits after Oct. 31, 1960, and would continue to cover those who use up their benefits prior to Apr. 1, 1962.

The Secretary said temporary programs "do not constitute either an adequate or desirable approach" to the long-term needs of the federal-state unemployment insurance system and added that in the near future the Administration would send to Congress proposals for permanent overhaul.

He recalled that in his recent economic message, Pres. John F. Kennedy said it would be "a tragic mistake" to enact supplementary legislation "without strengthening the underlying system."

The AFL-CIO voiced its strong support of the Administration plan, but recommended that the period of extended benefits be set at a flat 13 weeks to help end the inequities between present state laws, and urged that the eligibility date be set back to May 1 to cover 180,000 additional exhaustees who still have not found employment.

Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said labor advocated passage of the TUC measure as a "temporary part" of a series of White House proposals for "permanent improvements."

The pattern of federal aid in supplementing "inadequate" state programs in times of economic crisis, he said, without a major revision of the basic program, has led to a posture of "passiveness and irresponsibility" on the part of state legislatures.

"The only way for Congress to break this circle is to enact federal benefit standards," Cruikshank said. "Only permanent improvement can properly gear unemployment insurance into its economic role as an anti-cyclical stabilizer."

Goldberg, declaring that "speed is of the essence," said machinery for paying the added benefits could be put into motion by the Administration within 15 days after the bill is signed into law, and expressed the hope that the program could be operative by Apr. 1.

By that date, he said, 600,000 workers will have exhausted their compensation and will still be unemployed. "This is more than the entire population of Seattle, Buffalo or Memphis," Goldberg said.

Although the Administration approved beginning aid for those who used up benefits after Oct. 31, the secretary said, if the committee wished to go back to June 30 to aid another 125,000 exhaustees "this would be acceptable" to the President.

The Administration's Apr. 1 target date for putting the program into operation found general acceptance among committee members. There were indications Mills would seek approval in the Ways & Means unit within a week, and Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.) told Goldberg that "we might even improve on your Apr. 1 deadline."

There seemed virtual agreement among both Democratic and Republican members of the committee that enactment of a TUC program was needed to ease the plight of the long-term jobless, despite testimony by E. Russell Bartley, director of industrial relations for the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, who charged that "the problem is magnified and there is no need for a panic approach for such legislation."

However, GOP members sharply challenged the Administration's proposal for financing TUC through a permanent increase from $3,000 to $4,800 in the base wages on which employers pay federal unemployment taxes. The increase in the tax base would become effective Jan. 1, 1962.

By contrast, the TUC plan enacted in 1958 authorized only federal advances — which the states must repay beginning in 1963—to finance the extended benefits. This procedure meant that in most states legislative approval was necessary before the program could be put into effect, and only 16 states and the District of Columbia finally took part in the program.

The secretary defended the proposal for financing the program through an increase in the tax base for employers, declaring that "since no state is a self-contained economic unit, we should not expect a state to carry alone the crushing burden of long duration unemployment."

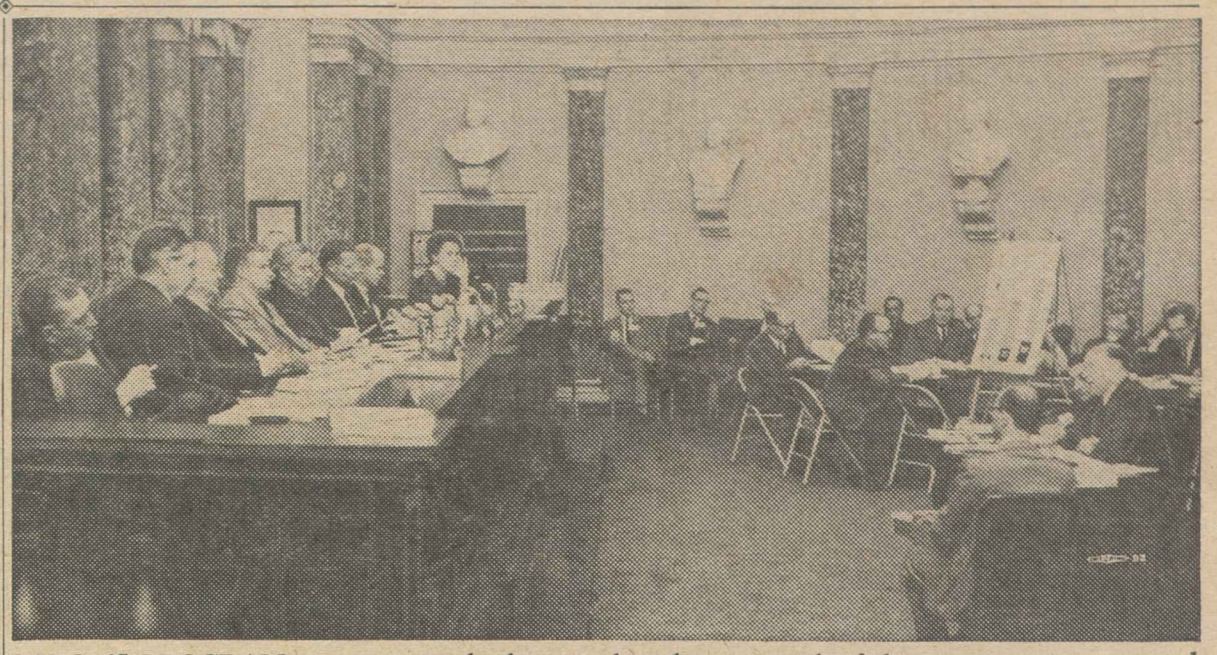
Goldberg said the urgency of the situation was made apparent by the fact that there were 5.4 million workers unemployed in January and warned that the February jobless figures may indicate a further rise in joblessness.

'Storm Signals' Seen

He ticked off what he termed four "storm signals" as signs of "continued weakness" of the economy:

- A more-than-seasonal upturn in long-term unemployment.
- A continued rise in involuntary part-time work.
- A continued dip in the number of factory workers.
- The low level of the average workweek, which has now declined to a postwar low of 38.5 hours.

"Clearly the current situation is grave enough to warrant immediate attention," the Cabinet officer said. "Unemployment statistics are a measure of personal hardship as well as economic cost. Unemployment in our modern industrial society has a direct and immediate impact on the worker affected and his family. It undermines the spirit of the worker. It destroys his ability to maintain a decent standard of living for his family."



LABOR'S PROGRAM to put nation back to work and spur growth of the economy was presented to Joint Economic Committee of Congress by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther. Reuther, shown at witness table (right), urged as chairman of federation's Economic Policy Committee swift enactment of Pres. Kennedy's 12-point anti-recession program and proposed additional steps, including temporary tax reduction. He said the President's economic message understated the nation's potential for growth and was in some respects overly conservative.

recession, and there were indications that the Democratic leadership was aiming for passage before the April Easter recess.

Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), chairman of the subcommittee and sponsor of the Administration bill, scheduled only three days of hearings, and House Labor Committee Chairman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) slated hearings by the full committee for Feb. 23.

Goldberg, in testimony prepared for presentation, called the bill a "practical measure geared to the realities of the legislative process" and added that "most of its provisions have been through the crucible of legislative discussion and debate."

This was an apparent reference to 1960 when a bill sponsored by then-Sen. Kennedy, calling for an immediate hike to $1.25 and coverage for 7.8 million additional workers was pared down to roughly the level of the present measure before a Senate passage.

The Administration bill calls for:

- Raising the minimum for presently covered workers to $1.15 this year, $1.20 in 1962, and $1.25 in 1963.
- Extending coverage to 4.3 million new workers—2.8 million of them in large retail trade enterprises, 800,000 in contract construction, and the rest in laundries, seafood processing plants, transit systems, small telephone exchanges, and shipping.
- Setting an immediate $1 minimum for newly covered workers. This would rise to $1.05 the second year, $1.15 the third year, and $1.25 the fourth.
- Placing no ceiling on hours for those newly covered the first year, then requiring overtime after 44 hours in the second year, 42 hours the third, and 40 hours thereafter.
- Authorizing the Secretary of Labor to seek federal court injunctions to secure payment of unpaid wages instead of forcing employes to bring suits to force wages and hours compliance.

Schnitzler told the Roosevelt subcommittee: "What lies before you is not a bad bill. It is just not good enough."

The AFL-CIO proposals for an immediate $1.25 wage and coverage for 5.9 million new workers, he said, would produce $1.2 billion in consumer buying power this year, instead of the $600 million under the Administration plan; would give affected workers an average 14-cent hourly increase, instead of 9 cents; and would mean immediate wage hikes for 3 million low-paid employes, instead of 1.9 million.

The AFL-CIO official protested the Administration proposal to waive overtime protection for new workers in the first year and called for a 44-hour week at the start, coming down to 40 hours in two annual steps—a program similar to one provided by the original 1938 law.

He called for lowering the yardstick on covered retail and service enterprises from $1 million in gross annual sales to $500,000, and cutting the figure on laundries from $500,000 to $250,000 to cover a half-million workers. He also urged protection of dishwashers, maids, scrubwomen and busboys employed by large hotels and restaurants.

Goldberg told the committee Kennedy "strongly advocated" prompt action on the bill as a means of "alleviating the distress" arising out of the recession and to "stimulate economic recovery."

Like the original Fair Labor Standards Act itself, he said, the current bill "strives for the possible and the attainable rather than the ideal." He added that "I . . . realize that we have to progress step by step, sometimes haltingly, to achieve the Act's original purpose" of putting a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours.

Ribicoff Urges Federal Funds To Aid Children of Unemployed

Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff has asked Congress to pass a temporary social security amendment to extend federal financial aid to dependent children of unemployed parents.

Testifying before the House Ways & Means Committee headed by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), sponsor of the Administration bill, Ribicoff said the measure to help states provide income maintenance to needy families by the jobless was part of Pres. John F. Kennedy's program "to stimulate the national economy."

The temporary program, which would run from Apr. 1, 1961 to June 30, 1962 would call for federal grants of $305 million to the states in order to make aid available to some 750,000 needy children.

The amendment would add "unemployment" of the parent to the list of reasons why children are eligible for such aid. Other reasons are desertion, illegitimacy or the death of a parent.

The Cabinet officer quoted from a report of the Advisory Council on Public Assistance which said that "a hungry, ill-clothed child is as hungry and ill-clothed if he lives in an unbroken home as if he were orphaned or illegitimate."

Nelson H. Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, said passage of the emergency bill would help meet "vital and urgent economic and social needs of working people." With the nation's "tremendous productive resources," he said, "there is no reason why any child should go hungry and live under miserable conditions that prevent constructive growth."

Cruikshank expressed the hope that Congress would soon tackle permanent improvements making federal matching grants available to the states "for assistance to all types of needy persons regardless of the cause of the need," so that the public assistance program "properly performs its role of providing a decent level of living for those who must turn to it as a last resort."

Supports Jobless Bill

Ribicoff testified shortly after Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, appearing before the same committee, urged action on a temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits.

The HEW secretary said he concurred in the "desirability" of prompt action on that measure, but added that "there are many unemployed persons who either do not qualify for unemployment compensation benefits, have exhausted their benefits, or who, due to the size of their families or other special needs, will not receive enough from unemployment compensation to live in health and decency."

Ribicoff said the Administration bill would "make clear the intention of Congress" that the added federal funds "are for the purpose of making assistance available where it is not now available . . . or of helping to make such assistance sufficient where it is now insufficient," so that states could not use the federal funds to reduce their own obligations to the needy.

Labor Asks Stronger Steps To Battle Recession Crisis

Rehearing Sought on Agency Ban

By Robert B. Cooney

The National Labor Relations Board, with the majority splintering into three separate opinions, has held that General Motors Corp. did not violate the Taft-Hartley Act when it refused to bargain with the Auto Workers on an "agency-shop" clause covering GM workers in Indiana, a "right-to-work" state.

The 3-to-2 vote dismissed the UAW complaint.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock promptly announced the union would seek a reconsideration of the ruling. He said the decision, the first on the agency shop issue, "represents an unfortunate stride back into the past."

The majority included Chairman Boyd Leedom and members Joseph Alton Jenkins and Arthur A. Kimball. Jenkins has resigned effective Mar. 28 to become an NLRB regional director. Kimball, a recess appointee of former Pres. Eisenhower's last fall, has not been confirmed by the Senate. Pres. Kennedy has chosen Frank W. McCulloch for the NLRB chairmanship.

The minority of Philip Ray Rodgers and John H. Fanning argued, in effect, that an "agency shop" or "support money" clause is a lesser form of union security than a union shop and therefore is legal.

Construction Pact Seeks to Avert Strikes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Dept. and the National Constructors Association have announced adoption here of a nationwide plan to prevent strikes on industrial construction projects.

The plan, hailed in a joint announcement as "first of its kind in the industry," covers the 18 unions in the department and 28 large and internationally-known engineering and construction firms engaged in the design and construction of petroleum refineries, steel mills, chemical plants and power generating facilities.

Department Pres. C. J. Haggerty said the accord "by providing added assurance against strikes and lockouts, should be a stabilizing element in the indus-

ACTIONS TAKEN by AFL-CIO Executive Council at midwinter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., are discussed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany (at far end of table) at a press conference.

Kennedy Asks $2.3 Billion Program:

Aid to Education Bill Sent to Congress

By Gene Zack

A federal aid-to-education bill—providing $2.3 billion over a three-year period which states could use, at their discretion, for school construction, teachers' salaries, or both—has been proposed to Congress by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

In a special message on education, the President made it plain that while "education must remain a matter of state and local control," federal funds were needed to help carry the burden of providing 600,000 classrooms over the next 10 years and to raise teachers' salary levels to insure a high quality and quantity of training.

Although progress in education "has been substantial" over the past generation, the President declared, the immediate and long-range needs of the nation demand "more effort" on the part of local school districts, states and the federal government.

The Administration proposal went far beyond the basic question of assistance for public elementary and secondary classroom construction and teachers' salaries, calling for:

- A five-year extension of the current college housing loan program, providing $250 million annually in federal loans for residential housing for students and faculty.
- A long-term, low-interest loan program for college classrooms, laboratories, libraries and related structures, at the rate of $300 million annually for five years.
- A five-year program of federally financed but state-administered college scholarships, with a first-year authorization of $26.25 million, to "supplement but not supplant" existing programs of financial assistance to students.

Kennedy also said he had requested Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff to create an advisory body to review and evaluate the current National Vocational Education Acts. Serv-

Tax, Pay Changes Urged by Council

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pres. Kennedy has properly diagnosed the nation's serious economic ills and presented a "well-conceived" program, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared, but his "prescriptions are insufficient" to cope with the crisis.

The council indicated its "serious" disagreement with one of the President's proposed remedies—increased tax allowances for business—and cited his reluctance to recommend a major temporary cut in taxes to quickly increase consumer purchasing power.

The federation's top governing body assessed the Kennedy program in a pair of statements which warned that "unless stronger anti-recession measures" than those so far advanced by the President are taken, "unemployment will be higher at the end of the year than it was during the bleak final quarter of 1960."

7 Percent Unemployment Feared

The report of the Economic Policy Committee adopted by the council predicted that unemployment will reach 7 percent or more "in the months immediately ahead." If stronger measures are not taken, the council added, the jobless rate during 1962 would be worse than the high level of 1959 and early 1960, and "another downturn in 1963 or 1964" would superimpose its burden of unemployment on top of an uncompleted recovery from the recession of 1960-61. (See editorial, page 6.)

The current recession and the serious growth of unemployment dominated the council's mid-winter meeting here. The council:

- Called on Congress to meet "America's most pressing single immediate problem" by providing aid to the unemployed who have exhausted or are about to exhaust unemployment compensation benefit rights. (See story, page 12).
- Approved the general outline of a plan for a series of regional conferences in cooperation with other national groups concerned with the economic crisis, and eventually a national conference. A subcommittee is expected to be named shortly to work out the details of the meetings.
- On the domestic front also, the council voted to help form a national committee of civic groups and older citizens' organizations to press for passage of legislation providing health care for the aged under the social security system.
- On the international front, the council called for vigorous support of the United Nations and Sec.-Gen. Dag Hammarskjold in their efforts to "save the Congo from anarchy and misery" (See story, Page 2), and declared that the report of the recent Intl. White House Announces Settlement Of Walkout on Five Major Airlines

By Eugene A. Kelly

Settlement of a Flight Engineers' strike in line with terms proposed by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has been accepted by five of the airlines and two of the unions involved, Pres. John F. Kennedy has announced.

At a White House press conference that followed protracted negotiations by Goldberg, Kennedy told reporters that all the parties to the tieup of major airlines except one—Western Air Lines—agreed to a resumption of flight schedules while a presidential commission studies the dispute and make a recommendation.

The President said Western Airlines was "not involved" in the agreement but that Goldberg would have a separate announcement to make about the position of that struck airline.

Until the Kennedy announcement, travel on six major airlines was all but eliminated by a walkout of engineers which resulted in cancellation of more than 900 daily plane flights and layoffs of some 60,000 airline employes.

Some 500 engineers struck Feb. 18 against Pan American World Airways after what they said was nine months of unsettled negotiations over new contract terms. FEIA members on the other lines walked out also.

Toronto Newsmen Win Heywood Broun Prize

A team of crusading reporters for the Toronto Telegram have brought the Heywood Broun award to Canada for the first time since the award was established 20 years ago in memory of Broun, newspaper columnist who was founder and first president of the Newspaper Guild.

Frank Drea and Harry Allen, Telegram staffers for less than eight years, divided a $500 cash award and received individual citations for the best work of 1960 in the crusading tradition—a series of stories exposing the exploitation of immigrant laborers on construction jobs in Toronto.

After five men died in a sewer cave-in, Drea and Allen dug out the facts which, despite pressure from advertisers, produced a commission on industrial safety, a drive on income tax and "kickback" violations, and a general tightening of labor and safety regulations.

Special mentions for highly meritorious work went to James L. Robinson of the Detroit Free Press, and William Chapman, formerly of the Charleston, S.C., News and Courier, now with the Washington Post. Robinson's news stories resulted in freeing a man unjustly jailed for the death of his wife, found to have been a suicide. Chapman wrote about loan sharks who victimized Negroes, and led to the introduction of corrective legislation.

Judges Praise Entries

Exec. Vice Pres. William J. Farson and other members of the Guild's executive board were present when Editor John T. O'Rourke of the Washington Daily News announced the winners and presented the awards. O'Rourke and two other judges, Gerald E. Griffin of the Baltimore Sunpapers' Washington office and Howard K. Smith of Columbia Broadcasting System's Washington bureau, praised the 90 entrants for a fine job of newspapering.

"I can remember Broun coming into the News office to write his column when he was in town," said O'Rourke. "No one could be more startled than he to discover that after his death he would become an institution."

Broun would have been pleased, the editor said, if he could have read this year's entries. They were so uniformly good that all the judges were "pretty proud of newspapering," O'Rourke said.

Reporter Drea expressed his thanks to Broun for lifting the status of working newspapermen, and to Publisher John Bassett of the Toronto Telegram for printing the expose stories in spite of pressure from advertisers to leave them out.

"If we hadn't had Broun," said the young labor reporter, "we'd be still walking around in dirty shirts and frayed suits. Thanks to him and people like him, newspapering has advanced from an occupation to a profession."

Others who spoke were Farson; Reporter Allen, who said too many newspapers print "too much of what and not enough of why"; City Editor Arthur Cole of the Telegram, who said both reporters are a credit to newspapering; and Labor Attache Pat Conroy of the Canadian embassy, who said the award to the Canadians proves that problems know no border line.

USWA Dir. Walsh, 56, Dies in Florida

Dunedin, Fla.—Martin J. Walsh, for 25 years an officer of the Steelworkers, died here of a heart attack Feb. 20.

Walsh, USWA district director in New England, had attended the union's quarterly executive board meeting in Miami Beach and was visiting friends enroute back to Boston at the time of his death.

The 56-year-old unionist joined the USWA shortly after its formation in 1936.

Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald, in a message of regret, said Walsh had "dedicated his life to the great objective of elevating the standards of the workers in the mills and in the plants."

Surviving are his widow, two sons and a daughter.

Labor in Cleveland Studies Health Plan

Cleveland—A committee has been named by the Cleveland AFL-CIO to recommend a program for reducing the cost of health care for union members. Under study are two possibilities—a chain of cooperative drug stores and a diagnostic health center in cooperation with the Ladies' Garment Workers or Clothing Workers.

Soviet Intervention Denounced:

Labor Calls for Full Support Of United Nations in Congo

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Vigorous support of the United Nations and Sec.-Gen. Dag Hammerskjold "in their continuing struggle to save the Congo from anarchy and misery" was called for by the AFL-CIO Executive Council here.

The council adopted a statement on Africa which called on the Kennedy Administration to give "every practical aid in strengthening the efforts of the UN" so that a stable and independent government can be developed in the Congo, capable of developing economic resources, improving working conditions and raising living standards.

The statement condemned "unreservedly the brutal murder of Patrice Lumumba" and urged a "full, prompt and impartial investigation by the UN to fix responsibility for the crime," citing the "hypocrisy with which this murder is being exploited by the Kremlin rulers to create riots and continuous bloodshed."

The council made it clear that the Congo must be protected "against the unilateral intervention or presence of the USSR, of Belgium or any other country" attempting to exploit "confusion and chaos."

Soviet Role Denounced

"There is no doubt," said the council, "that the tragedy of the Congo has been stirred up and aggravated by the machinations of the Soviet Communists. Moscow has momentarily found allies in its work among some of the African nations by playing demogogically upon their understandable anti-imperialist and anti-European attitudes, rooted in years of past colonial rule."

The council reaffirmed its historic and vigorous opposition to all forms of colonial rule and incorporated in its statement the comprehensive policy declaration on Africa of February 1960, adding that the correctness of that analysis has been buttressed by the crises in the Congo and Algeria.

The council said it "welcomed the efforts which are now being made" for negotiations between France and the Algerian Provisional Government and expressed its "fervent hope" that peaceful solutions will be found "for the development of a free, democratic and independent Algeria."

Union Rule Emphasized

In its 1960 statement the council had declared that American labor realizes the fight for social and economic justice in Africa cannot be won until the "problem of national independence has been solved" and welcomed the emerging trade unions in the "forefront of the struggle for their countries' national and human freedom."

It is essential, the 1960 statement declared, that the world's free labor movements "should view Pan-Africanism in its proper focus as a movement which developed against the colonialism of the European powers."

ILO Report on Soviets Called 'Not Objective'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The report of the Intl. Labor Organization's mission to the Soviet Union to investigate freedom of association is "not objective" and fails to "make clear the very issues which occasioned its survey," the AFL-CIO Executive Council has declared.

The council adopted a statement declaring that the report on Soviet unions had under the "cover of 'neutrality'" shut its eyes to the Communists' "contempt for and flagrant violation of freedom of association."

The Federation reaffirmed its "unqualified support" of the ILO and called upon U.S. government and employer delegates to the world organization to join labor in redoubled efforts to:

- "Strengthen the capacity of the ILO to promote the ideals and aims of its constitution.
- "Help safeguard the ILO against those forces within its organization which are, in their aims and actions, opposed to its ideals and hostile to its objectives.
- "Urge the governing body to make clear that the Intl. Labor Organization mission to the USSR did not conduct its inquiry in accordance with the rules laid down by the governing body; and its report does not override or supplant the previous findings of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO."

ICFTU Charges Validated

This committee in 1956 and 1957, said the council, confirmed the "validity of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions' charges that the Soviet government is guilty of violating the right of freedom of association and that Soviet workers are denied this right."

The council pointed out that the newly emerging nations face many complex problems and difficulties and that the trade union organizations in these countries are striving to exercise the right to freedom of association "without which no bona fide labor union can exist."

The ILO mission report, said the federation, did not deal directly or concretely with the basic problems of whether the Soviet workers have the right to organize free and independent unions, the right to bargain collectively in freedom or the right to strike for better conditions.

The "considerable power and influence" which the report ascribes to Soviet unions, the council said, does not make clear that the Communist Party and the Soviet government are in absolute control of all policies affecting wages, working conditions, bargaining and the right to strike.

Today it is more urgent than ever before, the council declared, "for the ILO to avoid any action which would weaken its capacity to promote" the principle of freedom of association and its application. The statement commented:

"Every attempt to blur vital issues or to evade taking a position in regard to fundamental ideals and aims can only hurt whatever possibility there might be for the ILO to help the economically underdeveloped areas, where the trade unions are only emerging and still weak."

Steel Employment Dips To Lowest Since 1938

Miami Beach, Fla.—For the first time since the depression year of 1938, "total employment has dropped below 400,000" in the steel industry and those still on payrolls are working on a part-time basis averaging 32 hours a week, the Steelworkers union has reported.

The USWA executive board called on steel industry leaders to join the union in urging prompt action by Congress on the Kennedy Administration legislative program to counter the "real depression" that has hit steelworkers.

The board issued a statement calling attention to its 10-point anti-recession program of several months ago covering unemployment compensation, aid for distressed areas, health care for the aged, aid to education, public works, minimum wage and a shorter workweek.

It declared that the present "snowballing depression has been allowed to drift so long in steel that thousands upon thousands of our idled members are exhausting their unemployment benefits."

The same bleak picture in basic steel, with "half the steel industry's capacity wasting away in idleness," is to some degree extending into fabricating, processing, iron mining, aluminum and other industries where the USWA has contracts, the board said.

Of the Kennedy program, the statement said, "We are gratified that the new Administration has made some moves to implement programs which are in agreement with many of the suggestions made by the Steelworkers union."

The USWA called on "all thinking citizens to join in support of the USWA and the Kennedy programs, "recognizing that the effect of heavy unemployment is compounded daily by the intolerable drain it imposes on our entire economy."

New Booklets Out On Care for Aging

Two new pamphlets—"Medical Care for the Aged" and "Aging—Basic Needs and Programs"—have been published by the AFL-CIO to help focus nationwide attention on the critical problems of caring for the health of older citizens.

The publications, part of labor's campaign to secure legislation at the current session of Congress, emphasizes the point that the use of the time-tested social security system is the only proper solution to financing health care.

Copies of "Medical Care for the Aged," publication No. 115, and "Aging—Basic Needs and Programs," publication No. 114, can be ordered from the Pamphlet Div., AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815-16th St., N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Single copies are free; up to 100 copies, 3 cents each; larger quantities at $2.50 per 100 copies.

Council Asks Stronger Recession Steps

Action Urged on TUC, Tax, Wage Measures

of the Congo and for the USSR to stay out," and commented that in terms of the ILO report "it is nonsense to think that any group can go into the Soviet Union and make an objective survey."

Labor-Management Harmony Urged

Meany also outlined his views on Pres. Kennedy's Labor-Management Advisory Committee, to which he and five other council members were named to represent labor. There are many areas, he said, where labor-management relations can be improved and he hoped that the "function of the public members of the committee will be to assist labor and management to get together."

The federation president drew a distinction between this approach and the operations of the World War II War Labor Board, where the need for immediate decisions in effect resulted in public members holding the balance of power between labor and management.

If the public members on the Kennedy committee consider this to be their function, he said, then the committee would "be doomed to failure."

The AFL-CIO president told reporters also that the new AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment, headed by Alexander Bookstaver, was now in operation and that Bookstaver had reported to the council on methods and means of investing pension and other union funds in government-guaranteed housing mortgages.

He emphasized that the department is a service for affiliates of the AFL-CIO, to guide and advise them, and does not handle funds as such or invest them. The aim of the operation is to make use of these funds to provide more housing at a reasonable cost, help bring down the costs of mortgages by knocking out discount provisions, provide employment for building trades workers and aid pension and other funds to receive a higher return while performing a socially useful function.

Meany said it was difficult to estimate how much money was available for mortgage investment but that he believed at least $1 billion could be used in this program.

Kennedy's Sense of 'Urgency' Hailed

The council's statement on the Kennedy Administration's economic program praised the President for providing a new sense of "purpose, urgency and hope" and the forthrightness with which he has faced "the unpleasant fact of recession and stagnation bequeathed by the last Administration." The AFL-CIO "applauds and supports" Kennedy's anti-recession program and his "determination to take seriously the mandate of the Employment Act of 1946," the statement said.

However, it added, "we believe that more must now be done. Even Pres. Kennedy's prescriptions are insufficient to cure the economic ills which he has diagnosed so well."

The council was critical of the President's estimate that the current rise in productivity would be only 2 percent, terming it "an understatement of the economy's potential ability" that is "unfortunate." The estimate of productivity increases, the council said, is "even less than the productivity rises in recent years."

The council called for three additional actions in the President's program as well as strengthening several of his existing proposals. The additional measures:

- Urged the President to request necessary legislation for discretionary power, subject to disapproval in each instance by Congress, to forgive the first $10 of withholding taxes each week for a period of 10 weeks, thus assuring that every taxpayer receives a total reduction of up to $100.
- Called for federal action to encourage a rapid increase in public works at the state and local level by a $300 million incentive grant. The council estimated that $2 billion of additional state and local expenditures can thus be launched in the next 12 months.
- Asked tax relief for small business now by reversing the normal federal tax of 30 percent on corporate income and the 22 percent surtax.

The strengthening of existing proposals recommended by the council included: Extension of unemployment compensation benefits for 13 weeks for every person who has exhausted his state claim plus benefits to the jobless not covered by the program who have had a substantial employment record in the past two years; a general increase in social security benefits, not only the minimum payment; an increase in the minimum wage to $1.25 immediately and extension of coverage to at least 5.9 million workers; a reduction in the rate of government-guaranteed mortgages to 4.5 percent and elimination of discounts through which the interest rate ceiling is avoided; federal aid for distressed areas, with an independent agency created to handle the program.

The council's statement on taxes said "we most seriously disagree" with the President's plan to propose increased tax allowances for business investment, adding:

"It seems clear to us that the economy is in the throes of today's recession not for lack of adequate business investment but for the lack of adequate purchasing power and consumer markets. Nor will liberalized tax allowances for business prove useful in stimulating economic growth because experience has demonstrated that funds are adequate and stimulus sufficient to induce high rates of investment. . . . We strongly oppose any tinkering with the depreciation rates or other tax incentives to business."

Missile Dispute Plan Hailed by McNamara

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara hailed the "responsible leadership" of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. in adopting a "no-strike policy on missile bases."

In a wire to Department Pres. C. J. Hagerty, McNamara cited the policy statement adopted by the department as an "example of how free labor meets an urgent problem involving our nation's security."

The department's executive council adopted an unprecedented peacetime plan to prevent work stoppages at missile bases at its meeting here.

In announcing the BCTD move, Haggerty said that the policy was designed to deter walkouts by exploring thoroughly all peaceful means of settlement, but stressed it was not "taking away the right to strike."

Migrant Film Available for Use by Unions

Harvest of Shame, the Columbia Broadcasting System's 54-minute documentary film on the plight of America's migratory workers, is now available to AFL-CIO unions.

This film, first shown on the CBS-TV network Nov. 25, aroused nation-wide response to the living and working conditions of migrants described as among the most exploited groups in the nation. Members of Congress reported a heavy flow of mail demanding legislative action to improve the conditions depicted. Florida growers responded by calling the film a "shocking distortion" of the facts and initiating a boycott of Philip Morris cigarettes, sponsor of the program.

Narrated by Ed Murrow, Harvest of Shame includes scenes of the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee's meetings with fruit pickers in California.

Prints of the film are available from the AFL-CIO Film Division of the Education Department ($7.50 rental fee) along with a discussion guide indicating legislation expected to be offered in Congress to deal with the problem of migrants.

Unions, Contractors Act To Prevent Stoppages

try and result in more jobs for members of building trades unions."

H. E. Lore, president of the construction group, said the plan should convince "major American industries that their expansion projects, if designed and built by NCA member companies, would be completed on time and within assured cost estimates."

Grievance Plan Specified

Key provision of the "National Disputes Adjustment Plan" is the section declaring:

"There shall be no strike, picketing or work stoppage by an affiliate of the department and no lockout by any contractor member of the association until the grievance procedures of this plan have been exhausted."

The plan sets up a national arbitration board consisting of three representatives from each group who will select a permanent impartial arbitrator to hear cases that both sides agree to submit. The decisions would be binding on both parties.

The NCA and individual building trades unions have had collective bargaining agreements dating back to 1947. At the present time, all NCA member companies have such national agreements with building trade unions. Most of them call for settlement of disputes without interruption of operations.

Several years ago the unions and the association agreed to a 10-point program aimed at reducing costs in the construction industry. The new plan is the first time the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the association have joined in an agreement.

The new plan calls for improvement in pre-job conferences so that possible trouble spots can be detected before a job is in "high gear." Meetings between the parties are planned to provide for improved conferences. The plan calls also for closer working relationships between representatives of NCA member companies and union representatives, with complete lists of both maintained at both the department and the association.

All disputes except those arising from modification or termination of collective bargaining agreements shall be handled first of all at the job site. If not settled in three days, the dispute shall be referred to the representative of the union involved and the contractor's labor relations man.

If a strike or lockout is threatened, the representatives shall "take appropriate action" to secure compliance with the no-strike, no-lockout obligations of the plan and other agreements. If the dispute is still not resolved, any arbitration or other procedure prescribed in the applicable contract shall be utilized. If none exists or if it is waived, voluntary arbitration under the plan may be used.

Hotel Maids Pay Lost Time of Worker

New York—Maids at the Park Crescent Hotel, who won a fight last year against having to push cots from rooms to elevators, have had to finish a job management refused to do.

They took up a collection to reimburse Maid Emma Patterson for the two days of pay she lost in the struggle with hotel management.

Calvin Elected to Executive Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—William A. Calvin, president of the Boilermakers, has been elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Charles J. MacGowan, late president emeritus of the Boilermakers.

Born in New Brunswick, Canada, Feb. 5, 1898, he joined the union on July 6, 1914, served with the Canadian Army in World War I and was wounded in France one month before the Armistice.

He was elected a vice president of the union in 1930, served on loan to the AFL Metal Trades Dept. as its secretary-treasurer for seven years, and held a number of government posts in the Roosevelt and Truman Administrations.

Calvin became an international representative for the union in 1952, a year later was named assistant to the president, and was elected by the Boilermakers' executive committee as president on July 1, 1954 when MacGowan retired.

FRIENDLY FOES on "Briefing Session" panel were Henry C. Wallich, left, and Paul A. Samuelson. While on a first-name basis personally, the two economists differ sharply on government policy.

Briefing Session Panel Sees Need for Growth

Prompt action to extend unemployment compensation and bring aid to depressed areas are essential first steps to combat unemployment, according to two of the nation's outstanding economists—one from each political party.

Resuming their colloquy on "Briefing Session," the new public affairs television series presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center, Professors Paul A. Samuelson and Henry C. Wallich discussed "National Goal — Full Employment; National Headache—How?"

Samuelson, who teaches at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, is one of Pres. Kennedy's brain trusters. Wallich, now at Yale, was a member of former Pres. Eisenhower's Council of Economic Advisers.

The two economists also agreed that the nation's rate of economic growth could and should be in excess of 4 percent a year. As in their first meeting, however, they parted on basic government policy.

Samuelson, while acknowledging that "we are all against sin and we are all against inflation," stressed that holding down prices by having a slack economy was not a solution. "If we can get moving again," he said, such problems as the outflow of gold and the resurgence of high-tariff sentiment would tend to cure themselves.

In general, Wallich looked to increased production as the primary need; said high wages were partly to blame for the slump in such industries as coal and steel. Samuelson pointed out that wages in the service trades and on the farms, though still low, has risen faster than those in heavily-unionized trades.

Next week a second group of 16 NET television stations will begin airing "Briefing Session," starting with the first program in the series. They will be joined by WWJ Detroit (Channel 4), the first commercial station to pick up the series.

Berlin Threat Topic of Next TV Program

"Briefing Session" will leap next week from domestic economic problems to the even graver issue of world peace. The third program in the series will be entitled "Berlin—Cold War Thermometer."

Panelists will be two well-known newsmen,

Edgar Ansel Mowrer, a Pulitzer Prize winner and a reporter for almost half a century, is one of the nation's most distinguished commentators on foreign affairs.

Theodore Kaghan, editorial writer for the New York Post, is 20 years younger, but gained comparable public attention when he denounced the late Sen. Joseph P. McCarthy's overseas investigators (Roy Cohn and David Schine) as "junketeering gumshoes." At that time (1953), the aftermath was Kaghan's return from government service to the newspaper business.

Takes Jurisdiction for First Time:

NLRB Rules 'Runaway' Ships Must Obey U. S. Labor Laws

The National Labor Relations Board, taking jurisdiction for the first time over American-owned "runaway" ships with foreign crews, has ruled that the West India Fruit and Steamship Co., Inc., broke the U.S. labor law when its agents interfered with the right of crew members to join the Seafarers.

The board, upholding the arguments of the SIU and its own general counsel, Stuart Rothman, reached these conclusions in a 3-2 decision:

- The Labor Management Relations Act applies to American-owned ships flying foreign flags and operating regularly from U.S. harbors even when the ships are manned by nonresident aliens.
- The captain of the company's car ferry Sea Level committed an unfair labor practice when he asked 24 crewmen to revoke SIU cards they signed Dec. 22, 1958 at Belle Chasse, La., and the company manager at West Palm Beach, Fla., likewise broke the law Dec. 26, 1958, when he ordered the 24 crewmen put ashore at Havana, Cuba.

The three-member majority included Chairman Boyd Leedom and members Joseph A. Jenkins and John H. Fanning. The dissenters were Philip Ray Rodgers and Arthur A. Kimball.

The historic decision, which paves the way for maritime unions to renew their organizing campaigns on foreign-flag ships, upheld the contention of union officers and lawyers that U.S. laws apply to American-owned ships regardless of the nationality of the crews or the ships' "runaway" registration.

On the key question, the board majority cited an earlier Supreme Court decision which set up guide lines for deciding whether domestic laws apply to shipping operations.

"Here we are dealing," the majority said, "with essentially American commerce and the American shipowner." The commerce of Liberia, where the Sea Level was technically registered, is not involved at all, for the Sea Level has never been in Liberian waters; neither are nationals of the flag nation concerned, for the employer is American, the crew Cuban, the majority said.

Since the law applies to the ship regardless of its foreign registry and the nonresident alien status of the crew, the board ruled that it has the authority under the law to remedy unfair labor practices committed against the Sea Level crew on the high seas, in foreign territorial waters, and in foreign ports.

The Sea Level's owners argued that the government has encouraged ship owners to register their vessels with the so-called Panlibhon nations—Panama, Liberia, Honduras—rather than putting them in the "mothball fleet."

A brief supporting that argument was entered by the Defense Secretary in the Eisenhower Administration, but the board rejected the argument as incapable of proof.

The NLRB majority ruled flatly that the encouragement of ship transfers to foreign flags, and of the maintenance of the Panlibhon fleet does not rest on any stated congressional policy; that present national policy is to build up an American flag fleet manned by U.S. citizens; and that the board is obliged by the labor law and Supreme Court rulings to take jurisdiction.

The decision is expected to affect three other pending NLRB cases which unions are pressing—against the Peninsular & Occidental Steamship Co. (unfair labor practices), the Eastern Shipping Corp. and McCormick Shipping Corp. (request for an election), and the United Fruit Co. (petition for a representation election).

In arguments extending over several years, the SIU and the Maritime Union, among others, have argued that shipping companies were hiding under foreign flags to escape union conditions and American taxes, and repeatedly urged the NLRB to assert its jurisdiction.

Approximately 450—almost a third—of all American-owned ocean-going vessels were registered under foreign flags in 1960. Most of them operate from U.S. harbors, and probably would be affected by the NLRB ruling.

30 TV Stations Carry 'Briefing Session' Show

Sixteen additional TV stations will begin showing the "Briefing Session" series the week of March 5, bringing the current total to 30. The complete list is shown below, with additions in bold type.

CSA Maps Program For Aid to Unemployed

New York—A seven-point program designed to rally community health, welfare and social agencies to the task of providing adequate aid for the unemployed has been called for by AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

The program was first drawn up by CSA to meet the needs of the jobless during the 1958 recession, Dir. Leo Perlis declared. He added that it is "even more to the point in 1961 when more than 5.5 million are jobless."

In a letter to local CSA representatives across the country, Perlis outlined the following program:

- Organization of community service committees in every local union in order to have available adequate machinery.
- Arranging of meetings between unions and public and private social service agencies to insure coordination of services.
- Organizing of proper referral and follow-up procedures.
- Expediting of unemployment compensation, public welfare and voluntary assistance. In some communities, it was noted, unions volunteered services and facilities to help speed up these processes.
- Development of programs for surplus food distribution to take advantage of the Administration's broadening of these programs to aid needy jobless workers and their families.
- Stimulation of necessary community programs for medical care, hospital services, food, clothing and shelter.
- Promotion, through appropriate union and community channels, of job-finding and public works programs.

"Whenever there are workers unemployed and in need of aid," Perlis told CSA field staff members, "ours should be the first helping hand."

To aid local union officers in handling the needs of the jobless, CSA has three publications—"Services for the Unemployed," "Surplus Foods," and "The Role of Voluntary Agencies in a Situation of Unemployment"—which are available through AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, 9 East 40th St., New York 16, N. Court Orders Trial for Beck, 2 Employers

The Supreme Court has reinstated an indictment charging two employers and former Teamsters Pres. Dave Beck with violating the Taft-Hartley Act in connection with a $200,000 loan made to Beck in 1954.

In an 8-1 decision, the court sent the case back to Federal District Court in New York for trial, declaring that the government's case was based on a "valid indictment."

Defendants in the case are Roy Fruehauf, president of Fruehauf Trailer Co., Burge Seymour, president of Associated Transport, Inc., and Beck. In addition, the indictment also names the two companies plus Brown Equipment & Manufacturing Co., a subsidiary of Associated. The three firms were involved in the complex financial arrangements surrounding the loan.

A year ago District Court Judge Sidney Sugarman had dismissed the government's case on the ground that the T-H prohibition against management giving "anything of value" to a representative of its employes did not forbid a loan.

The Supreme Court, in reinstating the case, did not rule on the question of whether a loan was forbidden under the labor law, declaring only that the lower court was in error in foreclosing the government's case before evidence was introduced.

Kennedy Orders Study:

Cabinet Unit Seeks Textile Industry Aid

A cabinet-level committee has been created by Pres. Kennedy to study problems of the textile industry and to work out solutions.

The White House announcement said the group would explore the industry's competitive position and "the pressure of imports" and "the effect of technological developments, employment trends, competition among different types of fibers, changes in consumer preferences and similar matters which may be affecting employment levels and profits in this large and vital industry."

Price Supports Involved

This new committee was created in the face of these developments:

- An impending Administration decision on whether to raise cotton support prices, with the danger of hiking the price of U.S. cotton exports and possibly boosting imports, inspired strong industry protests to the White House.
- The Clothing Workers' executive board, meeting in Miami Beach, authorized the ACWA officers to order members not to cut Japanese cloth imported after May 1, saying the domestic industry could not compete against goods made by workers earning 14 cents an hour. The Textile Workers board voted "support" of the proposal.
- Japanese exporters meeting in Tokyo called for an increase in their voluntary limit on cotton textile exports to the U.S.

Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, named to head the new committee, told reporters after a meeting at the White House that he had set up a subcommittee—to be made up of subcabinet officials—to find out "what can you do, if anything" to deal with the textile import problem legally and voluntarily.

Myer Feldman, White House deputy special counsel, said the initial meeting reviewed such major problems as technological change and imports and exports.

The subcommittee's function, Feldman added, will be to go into the problems in detail and present to the parent committee "in some form the possible solutions."

Feldman said the textile study committee was a product of proposals made by Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) and Gov. Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.).

Kennedy, the White House statement said, also called the new committee's attention to a current study of the problem being undertaken by a Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Subcommittee under Pastore's chairmanship. He directed the new interdepartmental group "to make use" of the Senate panel's information.

In addition to Chairman Hodges, the new committee includes Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon, Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg and Under Sec. of State George Ball.

Attending the White House conference with Feldman were Hodges, Freeman, Ball, Assistant Sec. of State Edward Martin, Budget Dir. David Bell, Under Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, Treasury Under Sec. Henry H. Fowler and Kenneth Galbraith, an adviser to Kennedy.

"ACTION IS NECESSARY, vigorous action that is aimed at unemployment, ill health, hunger and distress at home," Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant to the Secretary of Labor and director of the Women's Bureau, told the annual meeting of National Consumers League. Outlining the "New Frontier" program, she urged special efforts "to provide consumer protection, to deal with the hazards of radiation, to meet the problems of automation."

Settlement Reached, Airline Walkout Ends

The walkout was sparked by a National Mediation Board decision involving a dispute between United Air Lines, the Flight Engineers and the Pilots. When the board ruled that pilots and flight enginers should be represented by one union on United Air Lines, the engineers expressed the fear that the case would be considered as a precedent on other lines.

That would result, FEIA said, in loss of bargaining rights by their union and loss of seniority rights by FEIA's 3,700 members. The walkout spread to American, Eastern, National, Western and Trans-World airlines, and continued when the engineers reported they were ill or failed to report to work.

Goldberg stepped into the dispute at the start, and Pres. Kennedy named a three-man commission to investigate and report its findings and recommendations to the President and to assist in "achieving an amicable settlement."

Goldberg said after meeting with all the parties that in the immediate background of the dispute is the "stated fear of the men involved" that the Mediation Board decision involving United Air Lines jeopardizes their jobs with the other carriers and the union's bargaining rights and status.

The board is an independent agency, Goldberg said, and its rulings "cannot be changed by the President, myself or anyone" in the executive branch of government.

Goldberg proposed that FEIA members go back to their jobs while the presidential commission studied the facts to reach a recommendation, and told strikers he had been assured by the companies that no disciplinary action would be taken "provided the men return promptly to work; that the status quo under existing agreements will be maintained; and there will be no change of training procedures or effect on representation rights" until the commission has concluded its report, probably within 90 days.

Western Airlines however announced the replacement of 130 FEIA members by pilots who will be trained as engineers. Western was nevertheless asked by Goldberg to attend settlement meetings.

Efforts to get the struck lines back into service brought this comment from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in Bal Harbour, Fla.

"The efforts of Labor Sec. Goldberg to mediate the dispute are completely sound. This is a reasonable approach to an extremely difficult situation and takes into account the very real human problems of the workers involved and the public interest as well.

"Sec. Goldberg's approach makes sense to me."

Shortly after the strike started, Pres. Kennedy issued an executive order establishing the presidential commission to "consider differences that have arisen regarding the performance of the flight engineer's function and related representation rights of the unions, namely the Flight Engineers and the Pilots."

Kennedy named three university professors—Prof. Nathan Feinsinger, chairman; Prof. Richard Lester and Prof. J. Keith Mann. He directed all government agencies to cooperate with the commission, and authorized it to hold public hearings and call witnesses to testify.

Keenan to Get Catholic Labor Award

Jersey City—Joseph D. Keenan, vice president of the AFL-CIO and secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, will receive the 13th annual Rerum Novarum award of St. Peter's College at a dinner Mar. 19 in Newark, N. J.

The award is conferred annually on a Catholic who has distinguished himself in labor-management relations in keeping with the principles of papal encyclicals.

Born in Chicago, Keenan started work in 1914 as an apprentice electrician and graduated from classes conducted by IBEW Local 134 in 1918.

Keenan was elected an inspector by his union in 1923 and recording secretary in 1926. Eleven years later he was elected secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor.

In World War II he was named by the former American Federation of Labor as its representative on the National Defense Council, where he served as an assistant to the late Sidney Hillman, president of the Clothing Workers. He served in the same role in the later Office of Production Management, then became associate director of the War Production Board. In 1945 he was named labor adviser to Gen. Lucius Clay in command of American Forces in Germany and helped reorganize the Hitler-shattered free German trade unions.

In 1948, Labor's League for Political Education was formed by the AFL with Keenan as director. Three years later he was elected secretary-treasurer of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. and retained that post until he became IBEW secretary in 1954.

Keenan, a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, is also a vice president of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and an assistant to the director of the office of Civil Defense Mobilization.

R-T-W Bill Dropped In New Hampshire

A so-called "right-to-work" bill sponsored in the New Hampshire legislature has been withdrawn in the face of threatened defeat.

A public pledge of a veto by Gov. Wesley Powell (R) sealed the doom of a bill which was already on shaky ground in a heavily dominant Republican legislature, the New Hampshire State AFL-CIO has reported.

Lame Duck Board Rules Against Agency Shop

The case arose when the UAW proposed to GM a supplement to their existing national contract to cover some 14,000 employes in nine GM plants in six Indiana cities. This occurred after a 1959 Indiana court decision in the Meade Electric case that the state "right-to-work" law does not forbid an agency shop. The agency shop clause has been upheld by the Indiana Supreme Court.

The UAW requested a clause requiring non-union employes to pay to the union sums equal to initiation fees and dues to obtain and hold employment in the union's bargaining units. GM declined to bargain on this, contending it was prohibited by Taft-Hartley.

The board majority upheld GM, but there was no majority opinion as such. The three-member majority wrote three individual opinions.

Chairman Leedom said any union security agreement, including an agency shop, "necessarily interferes with the . . . right of employes to refrain from assisting a labor organization and encourages membership. . . ." This, he asserted, is unlawful unless there is a saving proviso in the union-employer pact requiring "membership" in the union.

Regardless of the Indiana court viewpoint, Leedom said, "an agency shop arrangement cannot be lawful . . . where employment cannot lawfully be conditioned on literal membership."

Jenkins contended that the issue was not the requirement of membership nor even of "support money" payments by a worker who elects not to join a union. These he would find legal. The "precise" issue, he argued, is that of requiring non-members and new employes to pay the equivalent of fees and dues "as a condition of employment."

Jenkins said Taft-Hartley makes it an unfair labor practice "for an employer to encourage or discourage membership by means of discrimination." And said that "conditioning of further employment upon payment of certain monies is clearly discriminatory."

Kimball said that "the support money employes [would be] excluded from the social benefits and activities of the union, but likewise [would not be] permitted a voice" in deciding union policies. "They would have a second-class status" contrary to Taft-Hartley guarantees, he said.

In their dissent, Rodgers and Fanning pointed out that neither an agency shop nor a union shop requires "literal membership."

They said they were "unable to see" how the majority distinguished between the case at issue and any other union security proposal where a worker's discharge turns on failure to pay the equivalent of regular dues and fees.

The UAW sought a clause "which would leave the decision as to membership or non-membership with each individual employe, at his option," the minority stressed.

The minority cited board precedents to show that federal law "merely sets the maximum limits of union security which may be negotiated; and that the lesser forms of union security, e.g., an agency shop, were clearly permitted."

Joining in the oral argument before the board at the hearing last October were the UAW, GM, a group of non-union GM employes, Steelworkers, Commercial Telegraphers and the Indiana Building and Construction Trades Council.

The AFL-CIO filed a brief, as did the Indiana State AFL-CIO, the Retail Clerks, the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers and the National Association of Manufacturers.

Indiana GOP Votes Down R-T-W Repeal

Indianapolis—By a straight party-line vote, the Republican-controlled House has defeated two moves to repeal Indiana's so-called "right-to-work" law, leaving the Senate-passed repeal bill buried in a conservative-dominated committee.

The solid GOP vote further dimmed hopes that a substantial minority of Republicans would vote with the Democrats to repeal the four-year-old ban on the union shop.

The issue reached the House floor when Democrats proposed a "right-to-work" repealer as an amendment to a bill calling for secret ballots in strike votes.

Taken by surprise, Republican leaders called a 30-minute recess for a GOP caucus. When the House resumed its session the amendment was defeated 62-36, with all Republicans opposed and all Democrats present voting for repeal.

By an identical vote, the House then rejected a Democratic motion to take the Senate-passed repeal bill out of the Labor Committee.

Growth and Employment

THE ACCUMULATED economic weaknesses of the past seven years, stemming from the incomplete recoveries from the recessions of 1954 and 1958, have produced the worst unemployment situation since the Great Depression of the 30s.

An analysis of the current situation indicates that even if an upturn in business activity takes place within the next four months, unemployment will continue to rise. And unless the government takes prompt and decisive measures to restore economic activity to a healthy level, unemployment at the end of the year is likely to be at higher levels than in the final months of 1960—although sales and production may be on the rise.

The outlook for a decrease in unemployment this year is bleak. Even if total national production increases from 3 to 4 percent over the annual rate of the last quarter of 1960, unemployment would probably be about 7 percent of the labor force at the end of 1961. Last month the figure was 6.6 percent.

The reason, according to labor economists, is that an increase in the growth rate of 3 to 4 percent would be based on a full workweek and a rise in productivity while at the same time 1.2 million persons would be entering the labor force as job seekers.

It will take an increase in real national production of about 5 percent this year to keep unemployment from increasing—given the factors of a growing labor force and rising productivity per worker. If production fails to increase over the December 1960 level there is a distinct probability that joblessness will soar to about 11 percent of the labor force by the end of the year.

There is involved in the present economic situation a relationship between the national growth rate and the level of unemployment. For example, a 6 percent increase in national production would begin to reduce the level of joblessness significantly, but it would require a sharp 10 percent rise in production this year to reduce unemployment to a level approaching full employment. To sustain full employment, a growth rate of 5 percent would be needed in 1962. This is no more than the economy's natural growth potential.

This means that to restore the economy to full production and full employment would require a 15 percent increase in the growth rate over two years, a formidable task unless a strong anti-recession program is put into effect shortly and long-range programs are developed to bring about full utilization of manpower and productive capacity.

If such an intensive effort is not made, unemployment will continue at dangerously high levels throughout this year and 1962. It is unlikely that the task of combating the recession and planning for long-range growth can be completed in one year, but unless it is started now there is no real chance to restore the economy to a healthy stage by the end of 1962.

The nation's economy undoubtedly has the potential to grow about 5 percent a year given the country's rising productivity and growing labor force. To understate this growth potential is to weaken any programs designed to help the recovery effort.

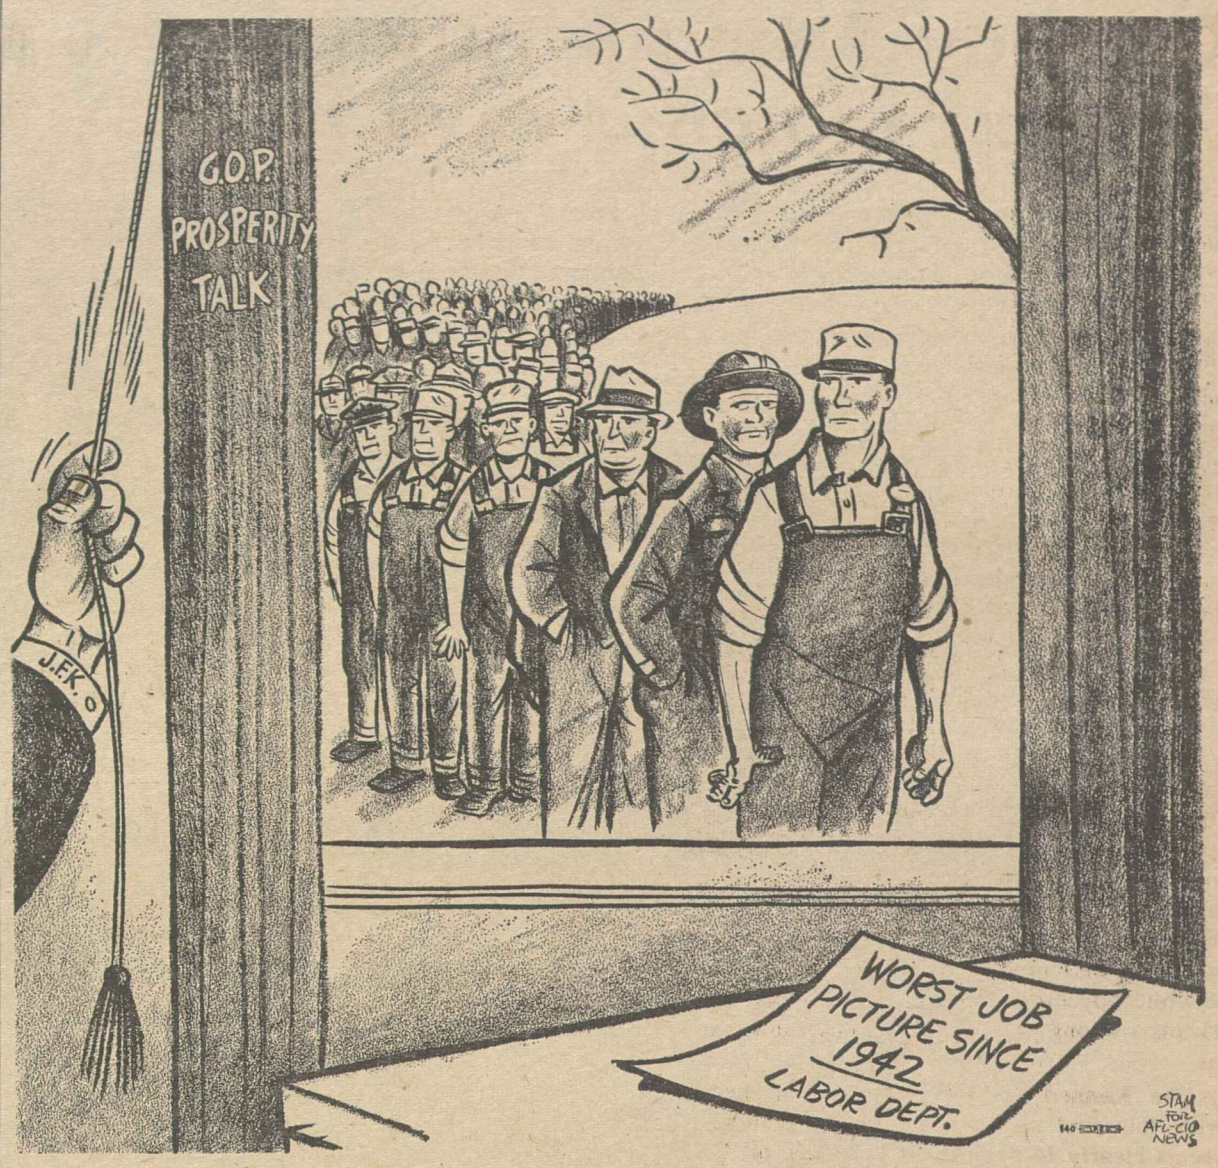
Revealing the Facts



Clark Kerr Predicts 'New Look:'

Growing Role Seen for Public In Labor-Management Affairs

The following is excerpted from a speech by Clark Kerr, president of the University of California, to a recent meeting in Santa Monica of the National Association of Arbitrators. Kerr spoke on "The New Opportunities for Industrial Relations."

RATHER THAN entering a new period of crisis, it seems more accurate to say that industrial relations in the United States are at the beginning of a new transitional period.

If the past period of industrial relations might be identified by its emphasis on bi-partite collective bargaining with the rules of the game increasingly set by government, then the new period may come to be characterized as one of increasing tri-partite policy-making within the confines of national purposes.

To define what is meant by this statement, three quotations are helpful:

1. Who are the players? In the United States we are accustomed to two: management and organized labor. But this is an exception within modern worldwide practice, largely limited to the United States, Canada, England, the Scandinavian countries and Germany. The standard model for an industrial society calls for three active participants: management, organized labor and the state; though the state need not be the dominant participant as it is in so many societies. As participant, the state does more than set the rules; it also helps make actual decisions.

Aside from worldwide trends, this trend may be expected here for wholly domestic reasons. Collective bargaining has a constantly deeper impact on society at large. It is no longer a side-show but is, instead, inextricably bound up with the effectiveness of the total economy.

One such pre-eminent test is the provision of reasonable equality of economic opportunity for women, the aged, the young, the members of minority groups. Another is the rate of growth of the economy; in fact this may come to be the conclusive test. It is a test we have as a nation passed with great distinction in past decades. It it a test we are not meeting even adequately today.

Growth requires many things—investment, research and education. But it also requires acceptance of new machines, and new methods, and new locations; of new work rules that are compatible with this acceptance; of adequate training and transfer programs; of flexibility in seniority provisions and wage systems, and job assignments and union jurisdictions; and of the advance consultation and joint planning which will make progress easier or even possible. And all of these requirements, and others, penetrate into the collective bargaining process.

2. What is the game about? Traditionally, collective bargaining has been about the setting of wages, hours and conditions of work, usually on an annual basis. Increasingly it is about the progress of the industry and thus the economy in general. The coal industry under the urging of John L. Lewis is a case in point; also the recent developments in the West Coast longshore industry, among others. Collective bargaining comes to cover a wider scope, to penetrate more deeply into productive relationships and, consequently, to become more continuous.

3. What are the rules of the game? The old rules, against the use of violence and all the rest, will certainly be continued. But a new imperative will more and more be added to conform in a reasonable degree to the national interest. The national interest will call at least for reasonable growth, reasonable stability, reasonable industrial peace, reasonable equality of opportunity. No industry of size and significance will forever escape this imperative.

THIS IS NOT TO SUGGEST that any of this will happen all at once, nor that it will occur equally in all segments of collective bargaining. Rather this seems to be the general line of development. Collective bargaining began as an exercise in sectional warfare, some even thought class warfare. It is now on its way to becoming an instrument less for sectional welfare and more for national welfare.

The great change in the past generation was the move from largely unilateral to frequently bi-lateral industrial relations. The great change in the next generation may well be a further transition to increasingly tri-lateral, and thus more complex relations. The first great change brought a new emphasis on the interests of the worker; the next great change may bring a new emphasis on the interests of the public at large.

There are now problems and thus, new opportunities. Our economy must be democratic, as it is; it must also be effective, as it not always is. Industrial relations by now are a sufficiently important aspect of the economy so that they cannot escape full responsibility to the national welfare. This is a new age. There are new facts. There will be a new look.

Morgan Says:

Kennedy Administration Faces Test in Enforcing Civil Rights

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ONE OF THE FIELDS the Kennedy Administration has done comparatively little spade work in so far covers the tortured area of civil rights. The subject was not included in the core of the President's legislative program and no task force was assigned to look into it, though defense, agriculture, depressed areas and other problems got exhaustive research treatment.

Morgan

The President did say in answer to a reporter's question that an "analysis" of the matter should be finished shortly in terms of what executive action might be taken to expand civil rights. Although he was quick to defend his selection for housing chief—a Negro—against attack, Mr. Kennedy kept his comment deliberately cautious on the white boycott of desegregated schools in New Orleans—wrong though he plainly indicated it was.

The Kennedy strategy, at least in dealing with this first session of the 87th Congress, seems clearly to avoid heated hassles on Capitol Hill over new civil rights bills and compensate for that by having the executive branch move strongly to enforce legislation already on the books with powers it already possesses. The test of this reasoning will come in performance.

The performance so far in appointments is encouraging. Already Mr. Kennedy has named more Negroes to high government posts than any previous administration.

They include Frank Reeves of Washington to the White House staff—and he may later become a commissioner in the District of Columbia government; George Weaver, special assistant to the Secretary of Labor; Andrew Hatcher of California, associate news secretary to the President; Carl Rowan, Minneapolis newspaperman, as deputy Assistant Secretary for Public Affairs in the State Dept., and the already "controversial" Robert Weaver, a prominent New Yorker, as Federal Housing Commissioner.

THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL has, in a sense, done the Kennedy Administration a valuable service by coming up with a searching and eminently sound 48-page report to the President with 18 major proposals for action by the executive branch to strengthen civil rights and improve race relations. This responsible 17-year-old group of white and Negro southerners has done an unofficial task force job on its own. Some of its top recommendations included these:

- Appointment of a White House staff adviser on race relations.
- Clarification and enunciation of the President's stand supporting civil rights in such a way as to enlist a maximum of southern good will and cooperation.
- Continual review of federal employment to insure non-discrimination.
- Withholding of federal research funds from colleges and universities which restrict admission because of race, creed, color or national origin. (This controversial recommendation had been previously made by U.S. Civil Rights commission.)
- Vigilance by the Justice Dept. to prevent or at least control violence and intimidation connected with school desegregation or sit-ins.
- A White House-sponsored national voter registration drive.
- Requiring government contractors to recruit Negro employes as a condition for getting a federal contract.
- Adopting a policy of encouraging desegregation in federal housing programs.

The Southern Regional Council report demonstrates that the executive can wield wide powers without the need of new legislation. The civil rights problem is caught up in a mixture of cold legal procedures and warm—sometimes hot—human emotions. Except for the telephone calls behind the release of the Rev. Martin Luther King from jail last fall—when political motivation could not be called entirely absent—Pres. Kennedy and his brother, the Attorney General, have not shown an emotional approach to or even—it might be said—an emotional involvement with the problem. In some large respects this may turn out to be beneficial rather than detrimental to the cause of civil rights.

The President said in his inaugural address that we help the underprivileged peoples abroad not just as an anti-Communist gambit, but because it is right. It happens that it is right, not only morally but legally, to help minority groups at home free themselves from the stigma and restrictions of second-class citizenship.

If the Kennedy Administration is strongly enough imbued with this conviction and determined to activate it with dispassion, the technicalities of the approach are secondary. The President, reportedly, is not now disposed to add a race relations consultant to his own staff. What matters more is the depth and vigor of his concern over the problem.

Washington Reports:

United Nations Held Only Hope For Bringing Peace to Congo

THE REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO could become the chronic crisis area of Africa, Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.), member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, heard on 450 radio stations.

Church and Sen. Alexander Wiley (R-Wis.), ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee, agreed that the United Nations is the only hope for peace in the Congo.

Oliver Peterson, of the Bureau of African Affairs of the Dept. of State, was among others heard on the program, pointing out that the Congo, as large as the United States east of the Mississippi, is rich in natural resources, industrial diamonds, copper, gold, tin, zinc, manganese, has large stands of timber and great potential hydro-electric power,

Two Africans were quoted in taped recordings from earlier speeches. Kwame Nkrumah, prime minister of Ghana, was quoted in support of the United Nations and in urging the United States to come out "strongly in opposition to racialism." Tom Mboya, of Kenya, was also heard in warning that "the longer our people live in poverty, disease and ignorance, we shall be playing into the hands of the Communists."

SAID CHURCH: "Situated as it is in the heart of tropical Africa, the Congo (if it were to become Communist) could became a very serious matter for us everywhere on that continent." The Idaho senator visited the Congo during the recent congressional recess. He said that he thought that Communists, through their action in the Congo and the United Nations, "have been seeking to test the mettle of the Kennedy Administration."

Wiley thought the Communists want the Congo "as a stepping stone to take over all Africa. . . . The United States is correct, I believe, in throwing its weight behind the United Nations. The UN, I believe, offers the best hope for peaceful solution of the problems of the Congo."

"It is not only the Congolese problem that is at stake in the UN," Church remarked, "but in a very real sense the future of the Congo itself. Certainly much of the UN's prestige has been put on the line in the Congo. If this venture proves successful, the UN will emerge stronger in the eyes of the world. If it fails, the UN will very seriously, perhaps even fatally, be weakened."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the day comes closer when there will be a rollcall showdown on a major legislative issue between the Kennedy forces and the bipartisan conservative coalition that was narrowly beaten in the preliminary Rules Committee fight.

If the pattern of the past is repeated, the showdown will come when a bill unacceptable to the Dixiecrat-Republican coalition is cleared by a legislative committee. Just as the bill is about to reach the floor, the coalition will offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The rollcall on the substitute will be the pitched battle.

The coalition bill will be carefully drafted to slice down the original proposal without killing it. It is very difficult, obviously, to kill a bill on temporary unemployment compensation or minimum wages or school aid. But the coalition has been highly effective in the slicing-down process.

The technique calls, generally, for the substitute to be proposed in the names of two coalition members—one Republican, one southern Democrat. Sometimes only the southern Democrat's name is used; former Republican House Speaker Joseph W. Martin wrote in his memoirs that this was an extremely useful device for GOP members of the House because it enabled them to appear to be voting for a Democratic bill.

IN THE LAST three years, the technique of the coalition substitute was used three times with great success.

When the Ways & Means Committee approved a surprisingly generous 1958 bill for temporary extension of unemployment benefits, the coalition used a substitute filed by Rep. A. Sydney Herlong, Jr. (D-Fla.) as its rallying-point. The Herlong bill was so restrictive that it aroused then Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell to denounce one feature, but it passed 223 to 165 and the White House supported Herlong and Mitchell had to back down.

The Labor Committee reported out a minimum wage bill in 1960 that would have raised the statutory wage to $1.25 an hour and expanded coverage to 3.5 million workers not then or now protected. In came the coalition's substitute Ayres-Kitchin bill which cut the proposed new minimum wage to $1.15 and expanded coverage only to an additional 1 million workers.

Rep. William H. Ayres is an Ohio Republican, Rep. A. Paul Kitchin a North Carolina Democrat. The substitute was approved by a 211-203 rollcall.

The Labor Committee in 1959 approved a labor-management reporting and reform bill sponsored by Rep. Carl Elliott (D-Ala.). The coalition's desire, in this case, was to toughen the bill against unions and soften it in regard to employers. The Landrum-Griffin coalition substitute was adopted by a 229-203 vote. Sponsors were Rep. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) and Rep. Phil M. Landrum (D-Ga.).

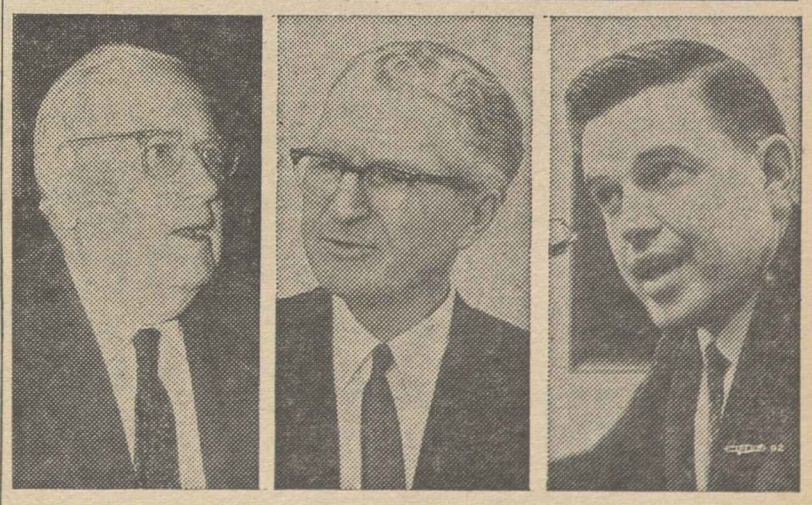
NO REALISTIC MEMBER of the House is naive enough to imagine that the coalition leaders, Democratic Chairman Howard W. Smith of the Rules Committee and GOP Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck, will abandon their weapon of substitute proposals for key Kennedy Administration bills.

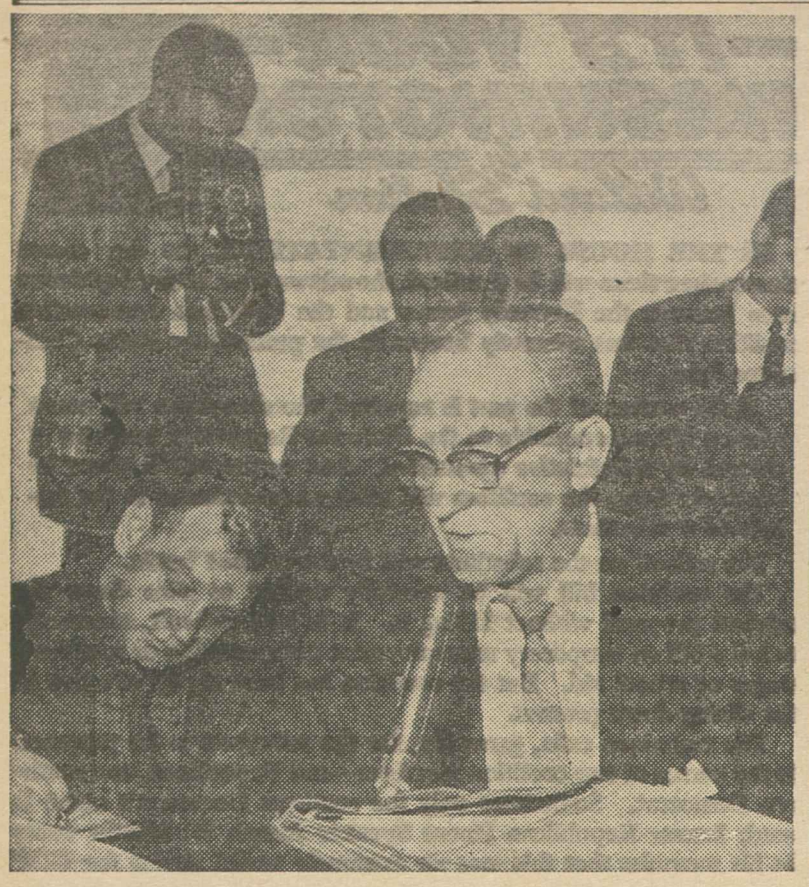
They have 21 more Republicans, presumably amenable to party discipline, than they had in the House in the 86th Congress. Their working relationships with conservative Democrats are in good repair. Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the Ways & Means Committee has refused to sponsor the Kennedy bill for health care for the aged through the social security system.

Mr. Kennedy has advantages of his own. The National Association of Manufacturers notes, regretfully, that school aid and health care bills blocked last year may not be so easily killed this year. "Some changes have been made," says the NAM News, "including the fact that the Kennedy Administration is for the legislation while the Eisenhower Administration opposed it."

Still, on a rollcall showdown, the Administration is going to have to find 20 or 25 votes in the House that are not now in plain view.



THE COMMUNISTS are using the Congo situation to test the Kennedy Administration, Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.), right, asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. On the same program, Sen. Alexander Wiley (R-Wisc.), on left, warned that Congo issues must be handled through the UN. Also on the program was Oliver Peterson of the Dept. of State.



"WE FACE A CRISIS in this land of plenty," Harold Devault, Calumet Township trustee in charge of welfare, told a packed room at the Gary, Ind., City Hall.

THESE ARE THE UNEMPLOYED who jammed into Gary City Hall in mid-afternoon to let visiting Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg know their plight. Gary area has moved into 9 to 12 percent unemployment bracket.

Unemployment Is People, Not Statistics

"ALL I'M LOOKING FOR is a chance to work," Victor E. Shiman (standing) told Goldberg at the hall of Auto Workers Local 927 in Columbus, O. A solemn-faced Goldberg is shown with his arms around two of the younger Shiman children, who were fed sandwiches and soft drinks by the union. Mrs. Shiman (far left) expects a seventh child in March. Shiman has been without regular work since August of 1959.

JAMES FRANKLIN recounts his difficulties in finding work to Goldberg in unemployment compensation office in heart of Chicago's South Side.

"THE GOAL OF THE KENNEDY ADMINISTRATION is to get everybody back to work full time," Goldberg told gatherings of the unemployed, like this one in Detroit. He in turn heard a 61-year-old worker who finds "nobody wants older men," a union leader who said all 300 members of his local "are laid off," another who said 2,100 members in his local will exhaust their jobless pay benefits come March.

THE PEOPLE speak of their troubles at meetings of jobless in Midwest. Ira Nathan (upper left) represented Indiana contractors. "What will we do?" asks Mrs. Joseph Charney (upper right), mother of three and wife of unemployed steel worker, in Pittsburgh. Philip Velasquez (lower left), Chicago steel worker and father of three, says he has had no work for four months. Peter Bevilacqua (lower right), president of Steelworkers Local 1444, Etna, Pa., tells of plant move costing 1,300 jobs.

Court Reverses NRLB:

Decertified Union's Picketing Upheld

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia has upheld the right of a decertified union to continue picketing and carrying the name of the company on a "don't patronize" list.

The court thus struck down an earlier National Labor Relations Board order in a case involving Machinists Lodge 311 and the Machinery Overhaul Co., Inc., of Palmdale, Calif.

The appellate court pointed out that, while the IAM case was before the NLRB, it had decided and the Supreme Court had agreed that minority picketing by a Teamsters' local, in the Curtis Brothers case, was lawful. The same applies to the IAM picketing, the court said.

According to IAM attorneys in the case, the union was displaced from Machinery Overhaul by strikebreakers who voted to decertify the union. The Taft-Hartley Act permits economic strike replacements to vote.

IAM Lodge 311 won a labor board election at Machinery Overhaul in January 1956. The vote was 65 to 28, with two challenged ballots. The union was certified in June 1956.

As the appellate court relates the events, negotiations for a contract went forward for many weeks, the union's proposals including requests for a union shop and check-off. The company's counterproposals omitted the latter terms and the talks stalemated in mid-September 1956. The union struck and picketed from then until Feb. 5, 1958.

In a Board-ordered decertification election in September 1957, the vote was 90 to 1 for "no union," with 14 challenged ballots. The NLRB decertified the union in December 1957.

The NLRB, with one dissent, had adopted the findings of its trial examiner and ruled the Machinists in violation of Taft-Hartley in its picketing and "we do not patronize" publicity, relying largely on the board's Curtis Brothers ruling.

The board argued, according to the court, that the union did nothing to signify an abandonment of its original objectives.

The court said it ordinarily might have accepted the board's presumption that the original union objectives persisted, but the important circumstances of its own and the Supreme Court's rulings in the Curtis Brothers case "interposed" in the present case.

In Curtis, the court said, it found picketing for recognition by a minority union to be lawful. Even though the NLRB amended its Machinery Overhaul order, the court said, the main legal issue already was removed by the Curtis reversal.

Kennedy Uses Powers To Stimulate Economy

Pres. John F. Kennedy, swiftly exercising his executive powers, has moved the government into action along a broad front to, as he put it, ease distress and "stimulate economic recovery and growth."

In the first month of the new Kennedy Administration, various agencies were acting to revive a slumping housing industry, speed up defense contracts, expedite reclamation projects, make immediate federal grants for schools and hospitals, accelerate highway and public works projects, expand surplus food disposal and inject fresh purchasing power through income tax refunds and veterans' insurance dividends.

These executive actions were emergency moves designed to start lifting the nation out of recession.

Kennedy set the tenor of the government's attitude when he declared in his Feb. 2 economic message to Congress that realistic aims for 1961 are "to reverse the downtrend in our economy, to narrow the gap of unused potential, to abate the waste and misery of unemployment and at the same time to maintain reasonable stability of the price level."

Lines of Action

These are the chief lines of government action:

● The Federal Home Loan Bank Board announced it would add over $1 billion to the nation's home building credit to increase the availability of credit and lower its cost by allowing savings and loan groups to borrow more from its banks; by making direct loans to such groups; by lowering down-payments on houses in the $18-20,000 bracket; and by raising the amount which savings and loan groups can lend from their savings.

● Kennedy ordered the Federal Housing Administration to cut its maximum interest rate to 5.5 percent from 5.75 per cent; directed the Community Facilities Administration to cut interest rates on loans to localities or public projects to broaden the projects to be covered; and also ordered a speed-up in Housing and Home Finance Agency projects.

The President also wired 297 mayors "to urge that they review their urban renewal projects" and hasten their completion.

● Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara ordered a speed-up in the award of military procurement contracts worth $650 million and construction projects estimated at $40 million and involving such quickly-produced items as military clothing and weapons.

● Interior Sec. Stewart L. Udall announced that the design and specification staff of the Reclamation Bureau's center in Denver, some 600 people, were put on a 58-hour week to speed up contracts.

● The White House also announced new steps to spend immediately some $350 million in federal grants for schools in federally-impacted areas, for hospital construction and to help communities build sewage disposal plants.

The step-up in federal grants was disclosed by Kennedy in telegrams to 50 governors in which he urged them to speed "genuinely useful" projects. He repeated an earlier announcement of a similar speed-up involving $724 million in federal funds for highway construction.

● Kennedy also had ordered quick action on income tax refunds and asked the Veterans Administration to move up payment of the 1961 dividend of $258 million on G. I. life insurance policies.

● Kennedy directed Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg to take steps to improve service for jobless pay claimants and other jobseekers.

Rail Unions Win Order 'Freezing' Erie Jobs

The Supreme Court has granted a request by rail unions for a job freeze on the newly-merged Erie-Lackawanna Railroad pending a hearing on whether the job protection provisions of the merger agreement meet standards set by Congress. The railroad was ordered not to fire or demote any of its 27,000 employes until the court has ruled on the issue.

The rail unions charged that the Interstate Commerce Commission violated the law by approving merger of the two carriers under conditions which allowed the merged railroad to lay off and demote employes, substituting severance pay and other forms of compensation for actual job protection.

Meanwhile, in Miami, the Railway Labor Executives' Association called on Congress and the President to direct the ICC "to hold up approval of all pending proposals for railroad mergers until their effect upon the national economy has been fully examined."

The RLEA warned that 200,000 of the 700,000 employes in the already unemployment-hit railroad industry are threatened with loss of their jobs under pending merger proposals.

The unions, in their appeal to the Supreme Court, cited a provision of the Transportation Act of 1940 which requires that any railroad merger approved by the ICC include job safeguards which "will not result in employes being in a worse position with respect to their employment" for a period of four years after the merger.

In granting the union request for a temporary job freeze, the Supreme Court also advanced to Mar. 27 a hearing on the case, which is an appeal by the unions from a lower court decision upholding the ICC.

Solicitor Gen. Archibald Cox requested early consideration of the case, declaring that the job protection issue must be decided without delay "in order to end uncertainty and . . . clarify the circumstances under which unification of rail systems in accordance with congressional policy may take place."

At its Miami meeting, the RLEA pointed out that more than 400,000 railroad jobs have been eliminated since December of 1955 and "railroad employment today stands at its lowest level since 1890."

Declaring that "the long-range national interest . . . clearly demands a halt to the approval of additional railroad mergers at the present time," the union chiefs said the proposed consolidations "would transform many railroad communities throughout the nation into new depressed areas and further stem the national program for economic recovery."

Travel Co-op Sees Gain in Understanding

"Travel with a purpose" has proved an effective means of increasing people-to-people understanding, according to Pres. Wallace J. Campbell of the American Travel Association.

Campbell told the annual meeting of the travel co-op that more than 1,500 members of trade unions, co-ops, credit unions and other organizations visited their counterparts in all areas of the world last year on tours arranged by the ATA.

Office Union Asks Vote in Blue Cross

Wilkes-Barre—The Office Employes have petitioned for a National Labor Relations Board election to establish the union's representation rights for the staff of the local Blue Cross organization.

OEIU Pres. Howard E. Coughlin said the campaign here was the start of a nationwide drive to organize office employes of Blue Cross and Blue Shield, organizations administering hospital and medical insurance systems.

Members of the Greater Wilkes-Barre AFL-CIO helped sign up 75 percent of the Blue Cross office workers, with the aid of a labor committee assisted by George T. Brown, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. Brown is serving in a liaison capacity for purposes of the Blue Cross campaign.

Chairman of the local organizing committee was Eugene A. Burke of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Committee members included Pres. Eugene Considine of the local central body.

Goldberg Seeks State Labor Relations Units

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has urged state governments to create tripartite advisory committees of labor, management and public representatives similar to the one Pres. John F. Kennedy has established by executive order.

Addressing a meeting of state labor officials, who came to the nation's capital at his request to discuss economic, employment and legislative matters, Goldberg said that such state committees would be "conducive to better labor-management relations."

In his executive order setting up the 21-member advisory committee, Kennedy gave it the task of making recommendations "with respect to policies that may be followed by labor, management or the public which will promote free and responsible collective bargaining, industrial peace, sound wage and price policies, higher standards of living and increased productivity."

The President gave the committee the immediate tasks of forging recommendations on "policies designed to ensure that American products are competitive in world markets," and to study "the benefits and problems created by automation and other technological advances."

Kennedy directed all executive departments and agencies of the federal government "to cooperate with the committee and to furnish it such information and assistance" as it may require.

Says State Action Needed

Goldberg, designated by Kennedy to serve as chairman of the advisory committee for the first year, told the state labor officials that "comparable action" at the state level was needed because "the problems are so varied and so complex" that there is need for more than merely a national group.

Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne hailed Kennedy's action in creating the advisory commission and pledged his union's full cooperation. "Labor-management relations in this period of economic change," he said, "need the carefully considered recommendations of a group of leading Americans such as comprise the committee."

Church Group Endorses CWA In NLRB Vote

New York—Support of the Communications Workers in a runoff election, now being conducted among 18,000 plant employes of the New York Telephone Co., has been recommended by the executive board of the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists.

In a statement, the board noted that New York plant employes took the "first major step in breaking away from ineffective company unionism" when a majority voted for AFL-CIO unions in a recent election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board.

"It is our earnest hope," the ACTU board said, "that in the runoff election the step will be completed by an overwhelming vote for bona fide national unionism within the AFL-CIO."

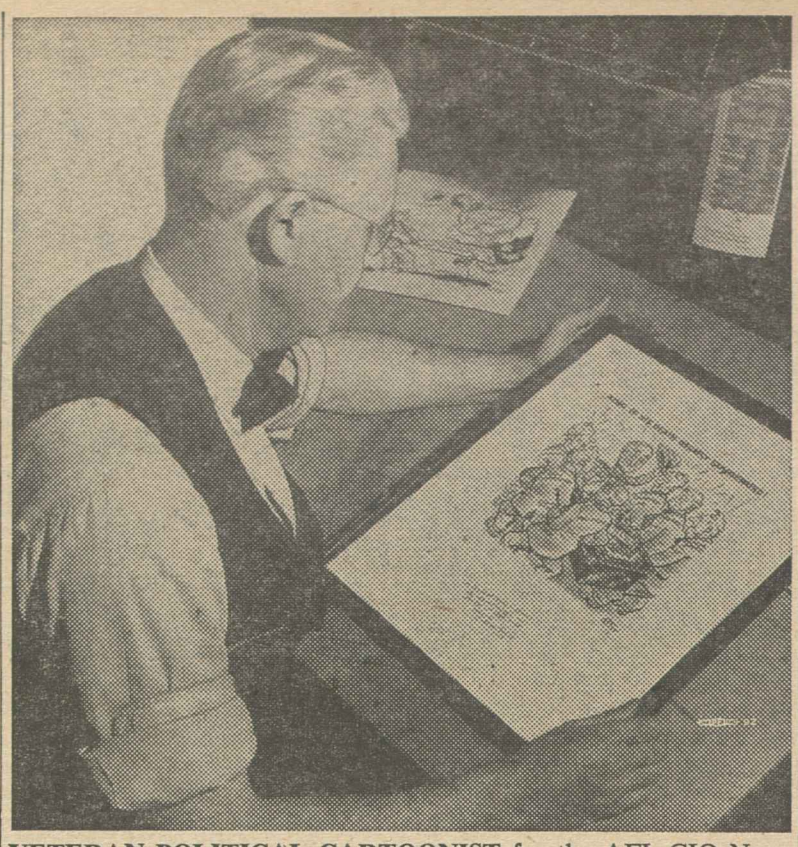
The statement said the ACTU board is convinced that, only by combining the resources of the CWA and the united labor movement can New York plant employes "free themselves from the domination of a powerful nationwide corporation."

In the first NLRB election, union-favoring employes split their votes between CWA and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The runoff election, by mailed ballots, began Feb. 17 and will continue through the first week in March.

ACTU sponsors trade union schools and forums. In 1950 it awarded its Quadragesimo Anno medal to CWA Pres. Joseph Beirne for his work as an active unionist, and for his "peaceful and fruitful efforts" to advance the economic and social status of telephone workers.

N. J. Bill Requires Guards at Manholes

Newark—The New Jersey State Federation of Labor has asked the state assembly to enact a law requiring the posting of trained guards to prevent accidents at all manholes where men are at work below ground.



VETERAN POLITICAL CARTOONIST for the AFL-CIO News and the former CIO News, Le Baron Coakley, who died Feb. 19 in nation's capital, is shown in typical pose at his drawing board. Picture was taken as Coakley framed cartoon on former Pres. Truman's upset 1948 election victory. Original of the cartoon was sent to Truman as election souvenir at request of the President.

'Coak' Dies, Cartoonist For AFL-CIO News

Le Baron Coakley, veteran editorial cartoonist for the AFL-CIO News, and prior to that for the former CIO News, died Feb. 19 at D. C. General Hospital in the nation's capital.

His incisive cartoons on the political, labor and international scene, well known to thousands of readers, carried the familiar signature "Coak."

Coakley's cartoons were also syndicated by the AFL-CIO News Service for use in several hundred labor newspapers across the country. In addition he was a regular contributor to the IUE News, published by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Coakley, 59, was a member of the Washington Newspaper Guild and the Art Directors Club of Washington.

Formerly art director for the Richmond, Va., News-Leader, he came to Washington in 1942 as an editorial cartoonist for the Washington Post and turned to freelance art work during World War II. He was the cover artist for the Washington Redskins' football game programs and designed the emblem for the team's helmets.

A native of Brockton, Mass., Coakley studied at the School of Fine Arts in Portland, Me., and the School of Practical Arts in Boston, and served in the Navy during World War I.

He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Lena Coakley, and two daughters, Mrs. Cornelius Sweeney and Mrs. Frank Galope.

Third State to Act:

N. J. Governor Signs Strikebreaking Bar

Trenton, N. J.—New Jersey has virtually outlawed professional strikebreaking through a law which bans the use of out-of-state replacements for striking workers and makes it unlawful for third parties to a labor dispute to furnish strikebreakers to an employer even when the operation is conducted entirely within the state.

Gov. Robert B. Meyner (D) signed into law an anti-strikebreaker bill passed at the last session of the legislature after Republican leaders in the Senate sidetracked a substitute preferred by the governor.

New Jersey thus became the third state to restrict professional strikebreaking operations. Pennsylvania has had a long-standing law barring third parties from importing strikebreakers into the state and Massachusetts last year enacted a registration and disclosure law aimed at curbing strikebreaking operations.

Enactment of the New Jersey law was hailed by a legislative task force, made up of the presidents of seven unions in the printing trades, newspaper and related fields, which is campaigning for "citizens' job protection bills" in every state.

Pres. Elmer Brown of the Typographical Union announced in Indianapolis that model bills have been introduced in 23 states and are scheduled to be sponsored in the legislatures of an additional 16 states in the near future. "We intend to continue our fight until professional strikebreaking is eliminated," Brown declared.

The New Jersey bill, passed late in 1960, had been on the governor's desk for nearly three months during several conferences on constitutional reservations expressed by Meyner and the apparent ambiguity of a provision reading: "This act shall apply to the importation of union pickets from without the state."

A redrawn bill, somewhat less broad in its outlawing of strikebreaking operations, made no reference to picketing and included an additional provision making it unlawful to transport "three or more persons in one conveyance at one time" through a picket line.

The Democratic-controlled lower house of the legislature unanimously passed the substitute, but it was blocked in the Senate by employer groups, led by newspaper publishers, who launched a full-scale attack on the bill. With only days remaining for the governor to sign the earlier bill still on his desk, the Senate sidetracked the substitute for committee study shortly before a six-week recess.

Meyner then signed the original bill, declaring in a public statement:

"I have done everything I could do to bring the conflicting interests together to agree on a balanced compromise in the public interest. I have taken all the time allowed me by the constitution to accomplish this. Yet one side has refused even to consider a modified version of the bill it unanimously voted three months ago. In these circumstances, I cannot delay any longer."

The bill before the Senate, if enacted, would automatically repeal the bill signed by the governor.

CWA Strike Benefit Ruled Not Taxable

The Internal Revenue Service has reversed itself in a Communications Workers case involving taxation of strike benefits paid to union members, clearing the way for tax refunds to some 1,500 workers who walked the picket lines during 1956 strikes.

CWA filed the case when Internal Revenue ruled that strike benefits were subject to federal income taxes. After a Supreme Court ruling that benefits paid a Kohler Co. striker by the Auto Workers even though he was not a member of the union were a "gift" and not taxable income, CWA pressed for a trial on its test case.

Two weeks before the scheduled start of the trial, Internal Revenue officials notified the court and the union that the government had decided not to contest the CWA claim.

Senate Group Calls for Broadening Of Administration's Health Care Plan

Broadening of Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposals for health care for the aged to include all of the nation's 16 million retired elderly workers has been urged by the Senate Subcommittee on Problems of the Aged and Aging.

The Administration plan calls for hospital, nursing home, outpatient and home health services for the 13.5 million persons receiving social security and railroad retirement benefits.

The subcommittee, headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), endorsed the social security financing principle as "the most efficient and economical solution" but urged that those retired workers not protected by the OASDI system be provided with similar health care financed by appropriations from general revenues.

"The net cost to the federal government," the committee declared, "will be relatively small, since most of the funds will be offset by present federal expenditures for medical care under old age assistance, medical assistance for the aged, and other programs."

Two Bills Introduced

The committee added its voice to the Capitol Hill discussion on health care after Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.) introduced the Administration bill and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), on behalf of a group of 10 GOP senators, proposed a "voluntary" federal-state plan that could involve multi-million-dollar subsidies to private insurance companies.

Cosponsors of the GOP measure were Senators John Sherman Cooper (Ky.), Hugh Scott (Pa.), George D. Aiken (Vt.), Hiram L. Fong (Hawaii), Norris Cotton (N.H.), Kenneth B. Keating (N.Y.), Winston L. Prouty (Vt.), Leverett Saltonstall (Mass.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.).

GOP Leadership Opposed

Despite the move by the 10 Republican senators, GOP leaders continued their opposition to any health care legislation this year. Senate Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and House Minority Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) said that a program of federal grants to the states to provide health care for the medically indigent, passed last year, was sufficient.

The 1960 measure, pushed through Congress by a conservative coalition, provided assistance only in those states providing additional funds for some health care. Only five states—Michigan, Oklahoma, Massachusetts, West Virginia and Kentucky—have thus far taken advantage of the program.

The Javits bill would provide matching federal funds to the states, on a sliding scale based on state per capita income, to provide elderly persons with three optional programs:

- Preventive, diagnostic and short-term illness benefits at a maximum cost to both the federal and state governments of $128 per year.
- Long-term, or so-called "catastrophic" insurance benefits under which the insured person would pay the first $250 of medical care and 20 percent of the remainder. Again the total federal-state cost for such insurance could not exceed $128 annually.
- Private insurance benefits, under which the federal and state governments would pay 50 percent of the cost of private insurance up to a maximum of $60 per year.

Javits estimated that the program would cost $900 million in direct treasury funds each year, of which $450 million would come out of federal revenues and the balance would have to be appropriated by state legislatures.

By contrast, the Administration plan would finance health care by raising the taxable earnings base from $4,800 to $5,000 and by an increase of one-quarter of 1 percent each in the social security tax on both employers and employes.

AT PRESS CONFERENCE in Indianapolis, officers of the Typographical Union report on progress of anti-strikebreaking bill in state legislatures and outline ITU's six-point program to combat recession, including shortening of the workweek. Left to right are Pres. Elmer Brown, Vice. Pres. A. Sandy Bevis and Sec.-Treas. William R. Cloud.

To Bring Facts Into the Open:

Kefauver Slates Follow-Up Probe of Anti-Trust Plot

By David Perlman

Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.), whose investigation of identical bids on sales to the Tennessee Valley Authority helped launch the Justice Dept.'s successful prosecution of 29 electrical equipment manufacturers, is planning follow-up hearings to probe deeper into the conspiracy and to learn "whether similar plans exist in other basic industries."

The hearings, to be conducted by the Senate Anti-trust & Monopoly subcommittee, are tentatively scheduled for late spring. The subcommittee, under Kefauver's chairmanship, has previously explored so-called administered pricing in the prescription drug, steel and auto industries.

One purpose will be to bring out publicly many of the details of the price-fixing conspiracy which up to now have been locked up in grand jury files because the companies escaped public trial through pleas of guilty or no contest. Some of the details are considered important in helping victimized purchasers recover damages for overpayments resulting from artificially high prices.

Kefauver also plans to explore the role of the top officials of the big companies, including General Electric and Westinghouse, who were not indicted and who have asserted that they had no knowledge of the anti-trust law violations of second-echelon officials.

The Tennessee senator indicated to newsmen that he agrees strongly with Federal Judge J. Cullen Ganey who, in sentencing the 29 companies and 44 individuals, declared:

"One would be most naive indeed to believe that these violations of the law, so long persisted in, affecting so large a segment of the industry and finally involving so many millions upon millions of dollars, were facts unknown to those responsible for the conduct of the corporations."

Kefauver also indicated that the subcommittee will seek to determine whether existing anti-trust penalties —presently a maximum of one year in prison and a $50,000 fine for each charge—are sufficiently severe to serve as a deterrent.

"A man can get a year in jail for making a gallon of moonshine," Kefauver noted. He said the electrical company officials, seven sentenced to 30 days in jail and others put on probation or fined, are "getting off mighty light."

In the fall of 1959, after TVA had focused attention on a long series of identical bids and a sharply rising trend of prices from suppliers, Kefauver held three days of hearings at Knoxville and compiled a record of "strange coincidences" in supposedly - competitive bidding which helped touch off Justice Dept. investigations into the field.

After the Justice Dept. obtained facts to present to a federal grand jury, the hard evidence of the conspiracy was obtained through questioning lower-level company officials with knowledge of secret meetings held to divide up the market and rig bids.

Under a 1903 statute applicable to anti-trust cases, witnesses before a grand jury are given immunity from prosecution and consequently cannot refuse to answer questions on the grounds of self-incrimination.

While the general outlines of the conspiracy were revealed in the indictments returned by the grand jury, the detailed evidence was not used because the cases did not go to trial.

NEED FOR BROADENING Kennedy Administration's minimum wage proposals is discussed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler (right) with Rep. NLRB Files 'Bad Faith' Charges Against GE

New York—A regional director for the National Labor Relations Board has issued a complaint charging the General Electric Co. with having refused to bargain in good faith in last fall's negotiations that brought about a company-wide strike by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

IUE Pres. James B. Carey said the complaint was "a further indictment of General Electric management policies" and added that "the attitudes that resulted in the NLRB action are the same attitudes that permitted high executives of the company to participate in a price-fixing conspiracy against the American public."

At its midwinter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., the AFL-CIO Executive Council "applauded" the issuance of the NLRB complaint against General Electric and called for its "vigorous prosecution."

"GE's blatant disregard for its legal and contractual obligations to bargain in good faith and the prohibition against threats or bribes is comparable to its attitude toward the anti-trust laws," the council said. "The criminal penalties for violation of the Sherman Act did not faze the corporate giant. The much milder penalties under the Taft-Hartley Act were totally ineffective to deter GE."

The council said GE's conduct "must be abated not only to restrain its repetition by GE but also to deter other employers who may be tempted to follow GE's anti-union policies."

NLRB Regional Dir. Ivan C. McLeod ordered a hearing Mar. 13 on the complaint, which charged that GE:

- Submitted a counter-offer Aug. 30, 1960 and intended to stand firm and adhere to that offer throughout the negotiations.
- Conditioned negotiation of a new contract on the union's acceptance of the Aug. 30 offer.
- By direct contact with employes tried to persuade them to accept the offer in disregard of the union's bargaining status.
- Through leaflets and newspaper advertisements engaged in personal attacks on the IUE leadership in order to undermine the union.
- Tried to bargain directly with employes at Schenectady, Lynn and Worcester, offering them terms more favorable than those presented to the IUE.
- Refused to furnish on time data requested by the union and necessary for collective bargaining.
- Interfered with an attempt to alter the union's method of voting on the company offer.

Carey, declaring that the NLRB complaint and the recent anti-trust indictments were "directly related," contended that both cases were "the result of policies prescribed by a management with an uncommon concern for profit and an unhealthy ignorance of the needs of the community."

The strike, involving 70,000 IUE members, began Oct. 2, after GE refused to back away from it's "take-it-or-leave-it" offer. It ended three weeks later when both sides agreed to a three-year pact.

Carey Asks Cleanup in Business Advisory Unit

Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers has called on Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges to strip his department's Business Advisory Council of its functions if it fails to remove Ralph J. Cordiner, head of the board of General Electric Co., which was one of the principals in the price-fixing, bid-rigging anti-trust conspiracy.

Carey took sharp exception to a reported statement by Hodges that he will let the Business Advisory Council itself decide whether Cordiner should continue as chairman.

"I find it difficult to understand your apparent belief that you can wash your hands of this affair," Carey wrote.

Quoting a statement by Pres. Kennedy that agencies of the government will be concerned "about the problems of conflicts of interest and monopolistic practices conducted in the American business community," Carey said the Commerce Dept. is "clearly" one of the agencies which should be so concerned.

He added that if the Business Advisory Council "should flaunt its disdain for public opinion by refusing to remove Cordiner from his office as chairman, as well as removing his company and any other electrical company which was involved in this conspiracy from membership in the council, then we believe it is your duty to deprive the council of all prerogatives it may have as an advisory body, and all privileges which it has acquired as a result of its semi-official status."

By Any Other Name It 'Smelts' the Same

Buffalo—Take the "lowly smelt," rename it "Lake Erie butterfish" and promote it as a new product.

This, Pres. Arthur H. Motley of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce told the Buffalo Chamber of Commerce, is an example of how every depressed area of chronic joblessness can rehabilitate itself without federal aid.

Motley, publisher of Parade magazine, said in regard to the Kennedy depressed areas program that the chamber's substitute self-help program has been tested and proved at Erie, Pa., where smelt have been rechristened "butterfish."

Reuther Asks Immediate $1.25 Floor on Wages

An immediate increase in the minimum wage to $1.25 would help ease the current recession by adding $1.2 billion in purchasing power to the economy, Walter P. Reuther, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., has declared.

In testimony presented by IUD Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman, Reuther urged a House Labor subcommittee to enact amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act that would go beyond the proposals of the Kennedy Administration.

The White House called for achieving the $1.25 minimum in three annual steps plus coverage for 4.3 million workers not currently protected. Newly covered workers would receive $1 an hour at the outset, reaching the $1.25 in four steps. No ceiling would be set on hours for newly covered workers the first year, with the 40-hour week not reached until the fourth year.

Reuther said Kennedy's proposal "represents forward progress," but added that "the vehicle is inadequate and the pace too slow."

At the outset of the hearings, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.), chairman of the full House Labor Committee, also was critical of the Administration proposal, declaring it "does not measure up to what I had expected."

The White House, he said, should have introduced the bill "at the maximum"—with an immediate 25-cent hourly increase and coverage for more workers, including restaurant and hotel workers—"and let the responsibility for whittling it down rest" on opponents of the measure.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, leadoff witness at the subcommittee hearings, said the Administration proposal was drawn to give "decent consideration" to conflicting views of those who thought it should go further and those who thought it went too far.

Called "Practical Bill"

"It is a practical bill," the Cabinet officer said, "geared to the necessities of the times and the necessities of the legislative process; a bill that strives for the possible and the attainable, rather than the ideal."

Two spokesmen for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce were among those opposing the measure on the grounds that an increase in the minimum wage would inflate prices, cause layoffs and "export jobs."

Dr. Emerson P. Schmidt, chief economist for the chamber, declared that new minimum wage legislation "would give low-wage foreign producers an additional competitive advantage" because it would "serve the untimely purpose of slowing down exports—and stepping up imports—when just the reverse is needed."

Price Hike Threatened

Eugene B. Sydnor, Jr., another CofC spokesman and president of Southern Department Stores, Inc., of Richmond, Va., said that if the minimum wage were extended to cover the 32 stores of his firm he would have to buy more low-cost imports, raise prices 5 to 10 percent, and lay off some 40 of his firm's 739 employes.

The Reuther testimony said the Administration plan to cover 4.3 million additional workers should be broadened to include hotel, motel and restaurant workers not receiving substantial income from tips; additional logging workers; employes of nonprofit hospitals; seamen on American-owned vessels flying foreign flags; retail and service employes of establishments with $500,000 in annual sales; and laundry and dry cleaning employes of enterprises with annual sales of $250,000.

Reuther expressed "disappointment" that the Administration bill placed no ceiling on hours for newly covered workers the first year "because of the need in America for a shorter workweek now." He urged overtime after 44 hours the first year, 42 the second, and 40 beginning with the third.

Earlier, Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler presented the AFL-CIO's plea that the bill be broadened to include 5.9 million new workers, and urged an immediate $1.25 minimum for those presently covered to "restore the dignity and well-being of millions of Americans."

A 43-page supplement to Schnitzler's testimony, submitted by Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of the Dept. of Research, pointed out that presently only one out of every three workers is covered. The supplement pointed out that improving the Administration proposals would mean immediate wage hikes for 3 million low-paid employes, instead of the 1.9 million who would benefit from the White House plan at the outset.

Ruttenberg's material pointed out that "even $1.25 is inadequate" for the average worker, based on the Labor Dept.'s City Worker's Family Budget which shows that $6,130 a year is needed to enjoy a "modest but adequate" level of living.

Kennedy Asks Federal Aid to Education

Administration's Plan Submitted to Congress

ing on the committee will be representatives from the educational field, labor, management and the general public, plus representatives of the Labor and Agriculture Depts.

The President's school-aid proposal called for a grant to each state of no less than $15 for every public school student, to be distributed according to a complex equalization formula that would guarantee more funds for states with low per capita income.

No matching state funds are required, although Kennedy declared that states would be "expected to maintain" their own efforts "and every state whose effort is below the national average will be expected to increase that proportion of its income which is devoted to public elementary and secondary education."

Kennedy bluntly faced the so-called "religious issue" which had been raised in the 1960 presidential campaign, declaring:

"In accordance with the clear prohibition of the Constitution, no elementary or secondary school funds are allocated for constructing church schools or paying church school teachers' salaries; and thus non-public school children are rightfully not counted in determining the funds each state will receive for its public schools."

The Administration proposal would provide $666 million in the first year of operation, $766 million the second and $866 million the third. Ten percent of the funds allocated to each state annually will be earmarked for each state's "areas of special educational need," Kennedy said. This would include "depressed areas, slum neighborhoods and others," he explained.

Follows Pattern of 1960 Bill

The proposal follows the same general pattern—but not the same financial outlays—of a two-year, $1.8 billion measure, which passed the Senate by a 54-35 vote in February 1960. However, the 1960 Senate bill called for matching state funds in the first year of operation.

The House also passed a school bill last year, clearing a $1-billion measure to provide funds only for school construction, but the bill was later bottled up in the conservative-dominated Rules Committee instead of being sent to a Senate-House conference committee.

Kennedy called the Administration's plan "a modest program with ambitious goals," and said the sums involved were "relatively small" when compared with the more than 36 million children currently attending public schools.

"Nevertheless," he said, "a limited beginning now — consistent with our obligations in other areas of responsibility—will encourage all states to expand their facilities to meet the increasing demand and enrich the quality of education offered, and gradually assist our relatively low-income states in the elevation of their educational standards to a national level."

Workers Lose Jobs, IndustryKeepsProfit

There's a difference between the depression of the 1930s and the current recession in the matter of who bears the burden, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg told the House Ways & Means Committee.

Thirty years ago, he said, "everybody suffered alike"—the workers who lost their jobs, the small businessmen who lost their stores and giant industries which lost a market for their goods.

Today, he said, only the workers and small business are suffering, while big industries have become "almost recession - proof." Goldberg pointed out that steel firms still make "very substantial profits" with production at only 50 percent of capacity, and that General Motors and Ford pay good dividends although retail automobile sales are off sharply.

GENERAL ASSISTANCE NEEDS for families of unemployed are explained by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff during testimony before House Ways & Means Committee on Administration proposals to make 750,000 needy children of unemployed persons eligible for emergency federal aid.

BROADENING OF PRES. KENNEDY'S proposals for temporary unemployment compensation benefits was urged on House Ways & Means Committee by AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank (center). Labor called for flat 13-week extension, in place of one geared to varying state benefit periods; setting eligibility date back to May 1; and aid for those not covered by unemployment compensation. With Cruikshank are Andrew J. Biemiller (left), director of AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation; and Raymond Munts (right) of AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Rules Change Approved by Powell Unit

Members of the House Education & Labor Committee have voted unanimous approval of a major reorganization of committee procedures recommended by Chairman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.).

The rules, which wipe out former jurisdictional lines and create three labor and three education subcommittees, appear designed to assure quick action on key Kennedy Administration proposals.

Heading the labor subcommittees are Representatives James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), Herbert Zelenko (D-N.Y.) and Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.)—all strong backers of Kennedy proposals in the labor field.

In addition, two ad hoc subcommittees have been created. One, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), will study unemployment; the other, headed by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), will take up the question of a possible investigation of the National Labor Relations Board.

Chairmen of the education subcommittees have not yet been named.

In addition to throwing out the old system of having subcommittees handle specific narrow areas of legislation, Powell won approval for rules limiting questioning by each subcommittee member to five minutes; providing for removal of subcommittee chairmen absent for more than three successive meetings; allowing written proxies for both subcommittee and full committee votes.

Hike in Spending Urged for Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Canada's unemployment problem can be solved only by a great increase of government spending in the public sector, the Canadian Labor Congress has told the Senate Committee on Manpower.

Full employment depends on a real increase in national production of 5 percent a year compared with a gain of 1.5 percent from 1957 to 1960, it was asserted in a CLC brief presented to the committee by CLC Executive Vice Pres. William Dodge.

"Something fresh is needed and something fresh on a very large scale," he declared.

Early House Decision On Jobless Pay Seen

The House was expected to act before month's end on a bill temporarily extending unemployment compensation benefits, reported out by the House Ways & Means Committee.

Before clearing the measure the committee sharply altered the Administration's proposal for financing benefits. In place of a permanent hike in the taxable wage base sought by the White House, the committee approved a two-year increase in the payroll tax from 3.1 to 3.5 percent, raising the federal government's share of revenues from four-tenths to eight-tenths of 1 percent.

The committee was still debating Pres. Kennedy's bill to provide $350 million in federal funds for temporary aid to children of the jobless as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Action in the Ways & Means Committee, headed by Rep. Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.), sponsor of the two Administration bills, came as the President received assurances from Democratic leaders that speedy consideration could be expected on 16 "'priority" measures.

Following the weekly meeting of congressional leaders at the White House, Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.) said Congress was ready to move "pretty fast," and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) said Senate committees "are ready and willing to act on the President's program."

Most of the measures on the urgent list deal with stimulating the lagging economy. Others cover aid to education, medical care, government reorganization, ratification of U.S. participation in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, creation of 59 federal judgeships, and easing of restrictions on trade with satellite countries.

Depressed Area Bill

Earlier, Kennedy sent Congress the Administration's $389 million depressed areas bill, calling for administration of the program under the Commerce Dept. instead of creation of a special agency, and a House Banking subcommittee was scheduled to open hearings Feb. 24.

The President also sent Congress his proposals to raise minimum social security benefits to $43 a month from the present $33, to hike benefits for widows, and to permit men to retire at age 62 with reduced benefits. The White House estimated the measure would provide $1 billion in added benefits the first year to 4.8 million persons.

The TUC program proposed by Kennedy called for extension of jobless benefits for a period half again as long as that currently provided by state programs, with a combined federal-state maximum of 39 weeks, for workers who have exhausted regular benefits since Oct. 31, 1960 without finding jobs.

The committee set the eligibility date back to June 30 to cover an additional 125,000 workers who had exhausted jobless pay rights. The program will pump some $1 billion into the economy.

The White House recommended financing the program through a permanent increase from $3,000 to $4,800 in the base wages on which employers pay unemployment taxes, effective Jan. 1, 1962.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, urging swift action "in the dual interests of humanitarianism and economic sense," asked that the bill be liberalized to grant a flat 13-week extension of benefits and to cover workers who exhausted benefits after May 1, 1960.

Church Unit Asks Repeal of 'R-T-W'

Indianapolis—The social justice arm of the Unitarian-Universalist churches in Indiana has called for repeal of the state's so-called "right-to-work" law.

Council Wars on Recession, Plans Bolstering of Unions

Wipe Out Job Bias, Labor Asks

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council declared here that "certain vital steps are necessary . . . to eliminate discrimination in employment" by unions, employers and the government.

The current recession, the council said in a statement on civil rights, "serves to spotlight" the denial of full civil rights. While Negroes constitute 10 percent of the labor force, the council pointed out, they are 20 percent of the unemployed. (See text, Page 7).

The labor movement takes "pride in the great steps forward" but "we cannot be and we are not satisfied. We will not be until there is no instance of discrimination and segregation anywhere, and that especially includes our own ranks," the council declared.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a press conference that all members of the council will receive from Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph a copy of proposals Randolph filed to step up the civil rights fight and said the proposals will be considered at a future meeting. Meany said that Randolph did not request action at the current meeting on his program.

The council called upon the 87th Congress to enact at the "earliest possible time" a federal Fair Employment Practices Act. Even in the absence of such legislation, it said, the federal government as an

Insurance Cuts Vetoed In Wyoming

Cheyenne, Wyo.—Gov. Jack R. Gage (D) has vetoed a labor-opposed bill which would have sharply reduced unemployment compensation benefits and would have made it more difficult for workers who lose their jobs to qualify for compensation.

The bill, pushed through the Republican-controlled legislature by employer interests, would have stripped Wyoming's unemployment compensation law of its most progressive feature—a flexible maximum benefit geared to 55 percent of the state's average weekly wage in covered employment.

Wyoming is one of six states which sets maximum benefits at a percentage of wages rather than a flat dollar amount, thus automatically raising the benefit ceiling as wage levels go up.

Under present law, the basic

Senate Due to Act:

Jobless Benefits Bill Approved by House

By Gene Zack

Congressional leaders forecast final passage by Mar. 15 of a program of temporary unemployment compensation benefits following House passage, by an overwhelming margin, of the TUC bill which the Kennedy Administration has called a key measure in its anti-recession program.

The House approved the bill by a 392-30 vote after shouting down a move by Rep. Noah Mason (R-Ill.) to send the bill back to the Ways & Means Committee.

Sen. Harry Flood Byrd (D-Va.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, indicated hearings on the House-passed measure would be held the week of Mar. 6.

April 1st Target

Democratic leaders in Congress indicated that they expected to have the bill on Pres. Kennedy's desk by Mar. 16 so that the extended benefits could be paid to workers beginning Apr. 1—the target date set by the Administration.

As passed by the House, the bill would extend jobless benefits for a period half again as long as the maximum now permitted under the laws of each state, with a ceiling on combined federal-state aid of 39 weeks of compensation.

Eligible to receive immediate assistance will be some 725,000 workers who have exhausted jobless pay rights since June 30, 1960, without finding work. The Administration has estimated that the temporary measure will also provide benefits to another 2.5 million workers who will use up regular state benefits between now and Apr. 1, 1962.

The measure which reached the House floor from the Ways & Means Committee differed drastically from the Administration proposal in one major respect: the method of financing the extended benefits.

Kennedy had urged that the cost of the TUC plan be met through a permanent increase from $3,000 to $4,800 in the wage base on which employers pay federal unemployment taxes. The increase in the tax base would have become effective Jan. 1, 1962.

The Ways & Means Committee, rejecting this approach, sub-

Votes Assessment To Back Program

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has coupled its attack on the current recession and serious unemployment with programs for strengthening and expanding the trade union movement.

The federation's Executive Council concluded its mid-winter meeting here with a series of actions designed to bring about "necessary growth" in a period of an increasing labor force and rapid automation.

It backed up a new five-point program on organizing, a continuation of its campaign among farm workers, participation in free world labor programs and its continuing activities in the legislative and political arenas by voting a special assessment to raise an additional $2.2 million for federation activities.

And it sharply re-emphasized its determination to stamp out discrimination and segregation everywhere, "especially" in the field of job discrimination.

The council expressed pride in the progress of the fight against discrimination "especially in the trade union movement" but added, "we cannot be and we are not satisfied. We will not be until there is no instance of discrimination and segregation anywhere and that especially includes our own ranks." The statement also called on employers and the government to accelerate the drive on job discrimination. (See story, this page).

The opening sessions of the meeting were dominated by the recession and the unemployment crisis, and the 29-member council laid out a detailed economic program to ease the immediate crisis and provide for long-range growth to insure full production and full employment. The council's program stated clearly that it did not believe that the Kennedy Administration's program goes far enough in certain areas.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, former special counsel to the AFL-CIO, meeting with the council after its policy declarations on the Kennedy program, told them that the President's program faced a tough fight in Congress and that it had been keyed to a realistic assessment of the congressional situation.

The Administration, he emphasized, is "determined to achieve" its goals and is encouraged by the action now taking place on Capitol Hill. The council tendered Goldberg a dinner, thanked him warmly for his past services and wished him success in his new post. (See story, Page 3).

The closing sessions were devoted to a large number of trade union and federation problems as well as to spelling out additional policy positions on Latin America, foreign trade, the balance of payments, housing, education and health care and other areas of concern to organized labor.

These were the major actions on trade union matters:

- Adoption of an organizing program calling for commitment of greater resources and providing for a new approach to technical jurisdictional claims as a preliminary step to settling jurisdictional problems affecting organizing work. (See story, this page).
- Approval of a 3-cent per member per month assessment for a total of 18 cents, spread over a 6-month to 9-month period, to raise $2.2 million. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany explained to reporters that the assessment would take care of the federation's financial problems. The AFL-CIO, he said, has been running in the red for the past year.

The question of finances, he added, will come before the federation's convention in December and probably result in a higher per capita payment. The funds raised by the special assessment will

Executive Council Approves Plan To Meet Twin Organizing Problems

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has mapped a program to achieve "necessary growth" in the trade union movement to meet the "twin problems of an expanding work force and the rapid shift in the character of the work force."

The council adopted a report of its Subcommittee on Organization calling for a five-point program to devote increasing attention and commit greater resources to the problems of organizing the unorganized.

The three-man subcommittee headed by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther and including Vice Presidents L. M. Raftery and James A. Suffridge, declared that an essential prerequisite to "maximum effectiveness" in organizing is to "work out appropriate internal machinery . . . to resolve jurisdictional disputes which dissipate both resources and good will."

It offered the following recommendations "as a preliminary step until a more comprehensive, cooperative and coordinated organizational program can be developed":

- The establishment of a permanent standing Committee on Organization to develop programs and policies "to assure a more effective and adequate effort in meeting the challenge of organizing the unorganized."
- To convene "working meetings of the General Board periodically or at least once a year" to discuss common problems and to achieve a "broader measure of cooperation."
- To instruct the Dept. of Organization to work with all affiliates to develop joint cooperative and coordinated organizational projects, including working out of specific targets.

Organization Aid Specified

● To provide through the Dept. of Organization organizational assistance to all affiliates. In cases where the department is providing aid "to one or more affiliates engaged in organizational work, it shall be the expressed policy of the federation to continue such organizational assistance and to deny the right of any affiliate to block such organizational assistance by the exercise of a paper claim to jurisdiction or for reasons of a completely negative obstructionist attitude. It being understood, however, that where an affiliate feels it has a proper and legitimate equity which is being ignored by the Dept. of Organization, such affiliate may seek redress by appealing to the director of organization or by requesting the matter be reviewed by the president of the federation for decision."

● The decision with respect to staff of the Dept. of Organization is left to the Executive Council in handling the overall question of finances.

In a press conference, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noted that the fourth recommendation of the subcommittee is a "definite policy decision of the Executive Council and gives the federation the right to look into technical jurisdiction claims that have at times prevented organizing activities." He said the policy adopted "will enable us to get organizations to agree and join up in organizing efforts."

The subcommittee's report stressed that a smaller percentage of the total work force is organized today than was the case at the time of the merger of the AFL and CIO in December 1955. It pointed out also that the character of the work force has changed dramatically, with white collar workers accounting for 41 percent of the work force in 1959 to the blue collar groups' 37 percent. The report said this change will be accelerated as automation and new technology are applied even more broadly and added:

"The American labor movement can continue to ignore these basic facts only at great peril and loss of influence not only at the bargaining table, but more importantly, in the broad areas in our national life where economic and social problems must be solved and community and national responsibilities must be met."

Meany said, in reply to a query, that to maintain the ratio of trade union members to the growing size of the labor force, an estimated 400,000 new members must be added by unions each year.

Meany told reporters that the council had approved continuing the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee campaign to organize agricultural workers in the Stockton area of California.

"We're going ahead," he said, although, viewed as an organizing campaign, the two-year program has not been very successful. It is not easy to organize itinerant farm families and a temporary work force, Meany added.

In the area of helping the agricultural workers raise wages and improve conditions, he said, the campaign has been "a tremendous success," with over $12 million added to wages for agricultural workers in the Stockton area last year.

Despite the fact that the campaign did not prove to be an organizing success, Meany said, the federation will continue to operate in the farm labor area because there is a "real social problem involved" and the treatment of farm workers is a "disgrace."

The council made an appropriation of $200,000 for the program after its finance committee reported later in the meeting. Up to that time, the federation had appropriated more than $340,000 for its AWOC activities.

During that period about 9,500 farm workers have paid dues to the organization at one time or another.

Discussing the current strike in El Centro, Calif., Meany said the AFL-CIO will defend itself against various legal actions and grower campaigns aimed at organizing efforts. The federation also will try to get action from the government to eliminate the use and abuse of Mexican nationals who are exploited every year by American farmers and growers, he said, and the subject was discussed with Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg during his visit with the council.

R-T-W Called Key Issue in Indiana in '62

Indianapolis — Repeal of Indiana's so-called "right-to-work" law, blocked by the Republican-controlled lower house of the legislature, will be "the foremost issue" in the 1962 state election campaign, State AFL-CIO Pres. Dallas Sells has predicted.

Failure of two attempts to free the Senate-passed repeal bill from an unfriendly House committee apparently doomed hope for "right-to-work" repeal in the present legislature, Sells conceded. He said labor intends to "throw its full influence into next year's election in both political parties" in an effort to elect legislators pledged to repeal.

Although a number of Republicans had earlier expressed a belief that GOP identification with "right-to-work" forces has been a heavy political liability, only a handful of Republican legislators broke with the leadership on the showdown votes.

Four House Republicans joined 32 Democrats on the losing side of a 56-36 vote against substituting a "right-to-work" repealer for a strike ballot bill reported out by the Labor Committee.

Six GOP members voted for a move to take the repeal bill from the Labor Committee and consider it in committee of the whole. The move lost 56-38. The Feb. 25 issue of the AFL-CIO News erroneously reported that the vote was strictly along party lines.

AFL-CIO Adopts Policy Statement:

World Trade with Safeguards Backed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The 1960s call for improved and expanded trade relations with the free world while assuring "practical, up-to-date, flexible safeguards" for certain U.S. workers and industries against injury from import competition, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council, meeting here, warned also that "the U.S. cannot afford to misconceive its role as that of an isolated, benevolent but fearful Uncle Sam" in dealing with the balance of trade problem and urged a series of measures to prevent an outflow of dollars and goods as well as to encourage the inflow of dollars.

The council supported its statements on trade and the balance of payments with a 150-page documented report prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The trade statement declared that the "labor movement will continue to follow the trade union tradition of supporting the national interest in international trade policy as it has in other U.S. policies," but it warned that while supporting a liberal trade policy "we insist that gradual reduction of trade barriers must not entail a callous disregard for American workers displaced by imports."

The statement laid out a seven-point policy program calling for:

● Retention of the "peril point" provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Act which prevent reduction of tariffs to a point causing serious injury to domestic industries.

● Keeping the present escape clause provisions but applying them only to a whole industry and on a flexible basis.

● Strengthening of the machinery established through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to prevent sudden large-scale influxes of imports from low-wage countries.

● Adoption of the proposed Trade Adjustment Act to provide help for workers, industries and communities adversely affected by imports.

● Safeguarding absolute historic levels of production in significant domestic industries so as not to depress output and jobs in specific industries below their historic norms.

● Development of effective techniques to promote international fair labor standards through GATT and the Intl. Labor Organization.

● Withdrawing special tax devices which encourage U.S. industry to invest in industrialized countries and setting up proper incentives for investment in under-industrialized countries, plus adoption of laws providing for immediate application of full U.S. taxes on profits earned by U.S. firms from the sale of products shipped back to the U.S. from their overseas operations.

The council declared that while trade problems have changed in scope and direction, "the safety measures have not shown enough flexibility and practicality to keep pace with new demands. . . . The results have been a slowdown in trade expansion, no real help for specific industries and workers hurt by imports and mounting threats to reverse the entire U.S. trade policy."

In the balance of payments area, the council reiterated its position that restoration of U.S. economic health is a "basic solution to both the balance of payments and the gold outflow difficulties." It called also for a better balance of dollar inflows and outflows and steps to solve the gold difficulties stemming from "the U.S. role as world banker."

The outflow of dollars, the council said, should be "more tightly controlled" until the situation improves, without resorting to "self-defeating measures" interfering with trade or cutting off military and economic assistance to friends and allies.

The statement called again for strengthening of domestic short-term interest rates to prevent funds from moving overseas in search of higher rates, and spelled out the technical programs necessary for both the short-term problem and the long-range approach to the payments situation.

Trade Agreement Goal Of Japanese Unionist

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Minoru Takita, a leader of the free trade union movement in Japan and a representative of 340,000 Japanese textile workers, declared here that he hoped to create machinery for "reasonable negotiation" of the "potentially serious problem" of the level of Japanese exports to the U.S. of woolen suits.

If this problem can be solved in a "constructive, objective manner," he said, a precedent will have been established "for the solution of other similar and inevitable trade problems that may develop in the future between our two highly industrialized economies."

Takita said he had talked with Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Ladies' Garment Workers Pres. David Dubinsky and William Pollock, president of the Textile Workers Union of America, on the problems of Japanese exports.

Takita is a representative of the 1.2 million-member Zenro, a Japanese trade union center. The concept of free trade unionism in all Asia is a "crucial question," he said, and is a basic reason for the closer cooperation between the U.S. and the Japanese trade union movements "especially in the realm of bilateral trade union exchange."

He warned that trade relations should be resolved so that they will not be magnified out of their true proportion "by those who might wish to destroy the cherished institutions of the free world."

Labor Hailed For Key Role In Fund Drives

The "substantial financial contributions" made by trade unionists played a key role in the "record-breaking success" of the 1960 United Fund and Community Chest campaigns, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has been informed.

Oliver G. Willits, chairman of the United Community Campaigns of America, wrote Meany that the fund drives raised nearly $470 million, an increase of $12 million over the previous year's total.

"Without organized labor's active participation and support," Willits wrote, "this achievement would have been impossible."

The chairman of the UCCA, which coordinates the fund-raising drives in major cities, said that "the countless hours of volunteer service" which trade unionists render as members of voluntary health and welfare board members are also "recognized and appreciated."

Willits also congratulated Meany on the "active personal part" he played in the campaign as vice chairman of the 1960 drive.

The AFL-CIO, through its Community Service Activities operation, participates in the operations of the volunteer welfare agencies with 117 full-time labor staff representatives employed by community chests and funds in 85 cities in 31 states.

be split half and half for the federation's special purposes fund and its general fund. The special purposes fund covers contributions to the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions' Solidarity Fund, the farm workers campaign and other projects.

Meany told reporters that no particular retrenchment campaign is planned as an economy move in federation headquarters but rather a continuation of the no-replacement policy of the past few years. At the time of merger the federation had 613 employes, he said, compared to 499 now. During this period new departments have been created and others expanded.

● Continuation of the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee campaign in the Stockton area of California, with an appropriation of $200,000. Viewed as an organizing campaign, Meany said, the campaign to date has not been very successful, with only 9,500 persons as dues-paying union members at one time or another over a two-year period. But, he stressed, it has been highly successful in terms of helping raise wages and improve conditions for farm workers, with an estimated $12 million added to wages for agricultural workers in the Stockton area last year.

Despite the fact that the AWOC campaign has not proved an organizing success, said Meany, the federation will continue to operate in the area because there is a "real social problem involved" and the treatment of farm workers is a "disgrace." The AFL-CIO, he added, will try to get action from the government to eliminate the use and abuse of Mexican nationals who are exploited every year by farmers and growers. The federation president told reporters that the council had discussed this problem with Goldberg.

● Committed as a pledge, on a tentative basis subject to completion of the reorganization program started last year, $3.25 million to the ICFTU Solidarity Fund over a three-year period and completed contribution of its previously pledged commitment of $220,000.

Aid to African Unions Voted

The council also appropriated $330,000 for special work among the newly emerging trade union movements in the new nations of Africa, including a number of educational projects. The program will be carried on within the general framework of ICFTU policies.

● Refused a separate charter to the Air Line Stewards and Stewardesses Association, presently a division of the Air Line Pilots Association. Meany said the request could not be considered under the federation's constitution and that the council had instructed the executive officers to resolve this internal dispute in the union.

● Laid aside without prejudice until the next council meeting a charter application from the National Association of Post Office and General Service Maintenance Employes, with the understanding that the federation's postal unions would meet with the group to work out some agreement.

● Named a subcomittee of AFL-CIO Vice Presidents George M. Harrison, David J. McDonald and A. J. Hayes to study revision of the Landrum-Griffin and Taft-Hartley Acts and report back to the next council meeting. Harrison will serve as chairman.

● Distributed among all council members an application from a group of federation affiliates to establish a Food and Beverage Dept. of the AFL-CIO, including a proposed constitution and other material. The council, Meany said, will consider the application at the next meeting after council members have had the opportunity to study the material.

● Approved a recommendation of impartial umpire David Cole that the Stove Mounters Union violated the no-raiding provisions of the AFL-CIO Constitution in a dispute involving the Sheet Metal Workers.

Jewelry Drive Supported

● Voted to help the Jewelry Workers in an organizing campaign with an appropriation of $1,000 a month for six months.

● Set the next meeting of the Executive Council starting June 26 at Unity House, the Ladies' Garment Workers vacation resort in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania.

● Set up a subcommittee of Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, James A. Suffridge and L. S. Buckmaster to arrange for a series of regional meetings on unemployment in cooperation with other organizations, to culminate in a national conference. Beirne will serve as chairman of the subcommittee.

In the legislative and foreign affairs area the council:

● Called for "renewed efforts on the part of all branches of the organized labor movement" and of "liberal organizations" to secure passage of health care for the aged under the social security system at this session of Congress. (See story, Page 16).

● Urged improved and expanded trade relations with the free world while assuring "practical, up-to-date, flexible safeguards" for certain U. S. workers and industries against injury from import competition. (See story, Page 2).

● Endorsed a program calling for collective bargaining for federal workers and earlier optional retirement as well as an increase in civil service retirement benefits. (See story, this page).

● Called for an eight-point housing program to stimulate new housing construction and help reverse the recession and urged the President to take executive action to assure that all housing built with federally-insured funds will be available without discrimination of any kind. (See story, Page 5).

● Expressed support for the President's federal aid to education program and welcomed this "assumption of federal responsibility," terming the proposals important first steps in "helping to resolve the basic problems faced by the states and communities in providing adequate education for American children." See story, Page 5).

● Assailed Cuba as a Soviet satellite, adding that it is being "openly and boastfully used as a staging area for the internal subversion and ultimate control of all Latin America."

The Council urged also meaningful implementation of the U.S. Latin-American aid program to assure that the funds would be used for social purposes to aid all groups and strengthen the free trade union movement. (See story, Page 4).

In other actions the council:

● Declared that community agencies must become more broadly representative of the people they serve and the people who help finance them, especially representatives of the labor movement, and announced that the Murray-Green award will go to Puerto Rican Gov. Luis Munoz Marin in May 1962. (See story, Page 5).

● Endorsed the work of the Eleanor Roosevelt Cancer Foundation and urged affiliates to help raise $1 million for the research and fellowship programs sponsored by the foundation. The council voted to give the group $50,000. (See story, Page 4).

● Called on Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina to commute to the time already served the sentences of eight members of the Textile Workers Union of America serving long prison sentences in connection with the 27-month-old strike in Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills at Henderson, N. C.

The council said, "It seems to us that the unusual severity of their sentences resulted from their trade union affiliation, the strike activity in which they were engaged and the inflamed emotions engendered by the long strike."

● Extended "the warm greetings" of AFL-CIO affiliates to the Brewery Workers Union, which will celebrate its 75th anniversary this year, and commended the union "for its contributions to the cause of organized labor in America and to the welfare of the nation during its three-quarters of a century of progress."

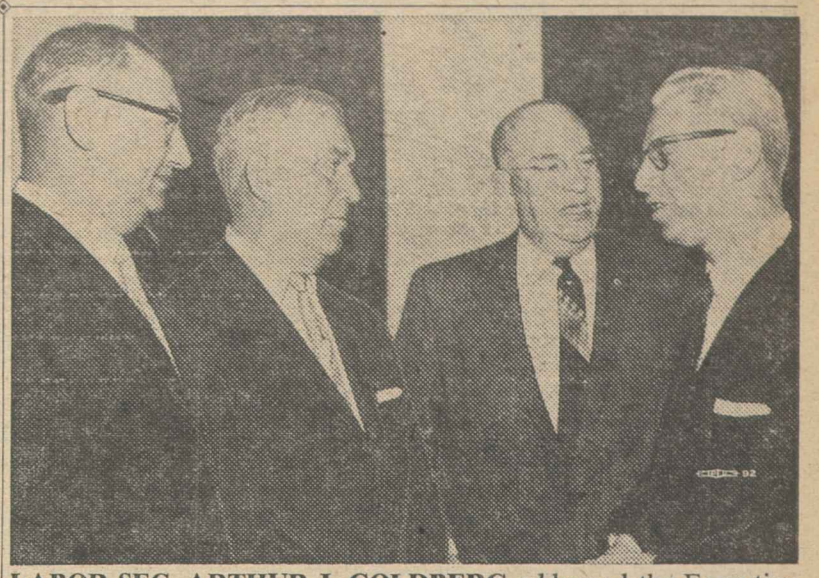
● Endorsed a resolution submitted by the Iron Workers Union that the new bridge to be built between the United States and Canada over the Niagara River between Niagara Falls, N. Y. and Niagara Falls, Ont., be named the John H. Lyons Intl. Bridge, as a tribute to the general president of the Iron Workers Union. Lyons was initiated into the union in 1916 as a member of Local No. 9, the same local that is currently involved in constructing the bridge.

● Urged the Dept. of Agriculture to make surplus foods available to 75 Negro sharecroppers evicted from their Tennessee homes in a dispute allegedly arising from their voting claims last November and directed the federation's Community Service Activities to conduct a "gifts-in-kind" aid campaign. (See story, Page 4).

● Urged greatly increased federal aid to 60,000 Cuban refugees crowded into the Miami area and asked all AFL-CIO affiliates to contribute to voluntary agencies. (See story, Page 2).

● Gave general support to a proposed Franklin D. Roosevelt Memorial in Washington, D. C. Without entering the current controversy over a proposed design, the council urged affiliates to be ready for a fund-raising drive to complete the memorial in the not-too-distant future.

WILLIAM A. CALVIN
Elected to
AFL-CIO Executive Council



LABOR SEC. ARTHUR J. GOLDBERG addressed the Executive Council and was given a dinner honoring him for his many services as former attorney for unions. Left to right are Pres. Alex Rose of the Hatters; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, secretary of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; federation Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh, president of the Stage Employes; Goldberg.

Goldberg Sees Victory For 'Realistic' Program

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg declared here that the Kennedy program is keyed to "reaching necessary goals on a realistic basis" based on "recommendations of the best-informed members of Congress."

The Administration, he emphasized, is "determined to achieve" its goals, indicating that it is aware of the AFL-CIO viewpoint that in certain areas it does not go far enough.

Goldberg's comments came in a crowded two-day visit here that included two press conferences with reporters covering Executive Council sessions, a meeting with the council and a dinner given by the federation's leaders.

On his arrival he told newsmen that the Administration is in accord with the temporary unemployment compensation bill reported out by the House Ways & Means Committee to extend jobless aid to 3 million workers in the next 12 months who will have exhausted their benefit rights.

He commented that he is "encouraged" by the movement in Congress on the Administration's legislative proposals and reiterated the "very serious" nature of the present unemployment situation.

A few hours later at the council-tendered dinner, to which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany welcomed him with a tribute of "affection and esteem," Goldberg touched on the problems inherited from the previous Administration and reaffirmed his conviction that because the trade union movement has always served the public interest there can be no conflict of interest in his present job as Labor Secretary because "I am still doing the work I've done for 25 years."

The following morning he addressed the council, and Meany told reporters that the Secretary had indicated there was "going to be a fight to enact the Administration's legislative program" but that Goldberg was confident of enactment.

Goldberg at another press conference gave reporters copies of a letter of greetings to the council from Pres. Kennedy expressing appreciation for the AFL-CIO's support for the Administration's program.

The Secretary said he is working on measures to improve the lot of migrant farm workers and is formulating plans also for establishing an agency within the Dept. of Labor to study problems of automation.

In reply to a query, he indicated agreement with Meany that the public members of the new Labor-Management Advisory Committee should not become referees between opposing viewpoints.

He said he thought that all members of the committee, including labor and management, were representative of the public, stressing also that the committee is not designed to be a "dispute-settling committee, but a policy committee."

He left the council meeting with a resolution from the federation thanking him for his past services as special counsel and expressing "warmest wishes for success and satisfying accomplishment in his present post of service to the President and the American people."

The Secretary then went on to receive the Herbert H. Lehman medal of the Jewish Theological Seminary for his efforts to bring high ethical standards to American life.

Labor Backs Bills to Benefit U. S. Employes

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has voted endorsement of legislation to benefit both active and retired federal employes.

The council pledged labor's support to a four-point program of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council calling for:

● Union recognition legislation to provide for collective bargaining procedures in the civil service. The statement declared that "consultation with representatives of employe unions, on matters affecting the welfare of their members through the collective bargaining process, would help to solve problems which, by their continued existence, destroy morale."

● Passage of a bill providing financial protection for federal employes involved in accidents while operating government-owned vehicles.

● Optional retirement for federal employes after 30 years of service, regardless of age, without reduction in annuity.

● Increased annuities for retired government employes, with the highest percentage of increase going to those presently receiving the smallest pensions.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL actions were given to reporters covering the mid-winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla., at press conferences conducted by Pres. George Meany, shown right at head of table.

Danger to Latin-America:

Cuba Described as Subversion Center

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Cuba has become a Soviet satellite and is being "openly and boastfully used as a staging area for the internal subversion and ultimate control of all Latin America," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared here.

The present situation in Cuba, the council added, represents the "gravest danger and most serious threat to the unity and stability of the inter-American system and its institutions."

The council outlined its position on Cuba and the general problems of Latin America in a pair of statements analyzing the current political situation, calling for government programs to shore up democracy and to give meaningful implementation to Latin American aid programs.

Commending the policy declarations and actions of the Kennedy Administration in this area and welcoming the return of the "good neighbor policy," the council specifically hailed the U.S. pledge to work with the Organization of American States for the end of tyranny, whether of the left or right, and urged the U.S. to take the lead at the upcoming OAS conference in May at Quito, Ecuador.

Cuba 'Most Serious'

The council backed the measures taken so far by OAS against the "Trujillo tyranny" in the Dominican Republic and repeated its condemnation of the dictatorships in Paraguay and Haiti. But the most serious situation, it said, is in Cuba, where the ideals of social justice, economic progress, civil liberties and human rights "are being betrayed by the Castro clique."

The statement called on the OAS to adopt against the Castro regime the "same punitive measures" voted against Trujillo and recommended the revival of the World War II Committee for the Political Defense of the Hemisphere to work under the supervision of the OAS. The committee was formed to combat Nazi and Fascist agents during the war.

To the workers inside and outside Cuba who are fighting for "national liberation," the council pledged its support of the administrative committee of the Inter-American Organization of Workers (ORIT), which at its recent meeting in Mexico City declared it would not recognize the executive committee of the Cuban Confederation of Workers (CTC) in exile as the representative of Cuban trade unionism. The counsel denounced the Castro dictatorship and pledged its resources to promote unity of Cuban workers struggling against Castro.

Backs Kennedy Request

The Executive Council noted also the failure of the last Congress to grant the U.S. President the power to exclude the Dominican Republic from the re-allocation of the cut from the Cuban sugar quota and commended and supported Pres. Kennedy's request to Congress to cancel the extra U.S. sugar quota now allocated to the Dominican Republic.

In its statement on Latin American aid, the council called on Congress to appropriate the necessary funds for the implementation of the aid program adopted last year and called specifically for the legislation to make clear that the Latin American nations benefiting from social development funds "provide for meaningful participation by the workers' organizations in the programs involved."

The council urged the Inter-American Development Bank to make clear in its regulations that funds for social development will be "used to contribute to the strengthening of free democratic trade unions" and asked that trade union personnel be used on the bank's staff.

The council further called for requirements that assistance provided by the bank or other agencies participating in the program contain pledges that the recipients of the loans "pay at least the wages, hours and conditions of employment that prevail in the countries in which the funds are expended."

Funds which have their origin in the U.S., the council asserted, "should not be used to exploit that segment of the population which the social development program is designed to assist."

U. S. Urged to Take 'More Steps' To Assist Refugees Fleeing Cuba

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor has called for a major step-up in federal aid to thousands of Cuban families fleeing the pro-Communist government of Dictator Fidel Castro.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, holding its mid-winter meeting here, pointed out that there are already 60,000 Cuban nationals in the Miami area, and added that the U.S. must prepare to care for an influx of "more than twice the number" of refugees involved in the 1956-57 Hugarian refugee relief program.

The council adopted a statement commending the Kennedy Administration for its "immediate action to aid the Cuban refugees," but said that "more steps must be taken" to meet the growing need. It called for:

- Providing out-patient medical care in addition to the in-patient hospital care currently being provided refugee families.
- Formulating a program to provide for the distribution of surplus foods through cooperating voluntary agencies, in view of the fact that there is "no adequate public assistance or welfare assistance machinery" available in the Miami area.
- Developing a program for releasing federal funds to voluntary agencies "to enable them to continue the great work they are doing for the Cuban refugees."

At the same time the council called on all affiliates to contribute money to the voluntary agencies to help meet "a desperate need for additional funds." Contributions should be sent to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler for distribution to the agencies currently engaged in the refugee operation.

In calling for an intensification of federal efforts, the Executive Council noted that at the present time the Agriculture Dept. has made surplus food available to the refugees, but that no machinery exists for its distribution. Channeling of surplus foods through voluntary agencies could be worked out jointly by the Agriculture Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, it said.

U.S. Aid Insufficient

At the present time, the statement said, the federal government provides approximately $85 in cash per month for each refugee family qualifying for assistance. "This amount is absolutely insufficient for the needs of a refugee family," the council declared.

The call for further action to meet what the council said was "clearly a national problem" came after the AFL-CIO leaders received a detailed report on the aid program set up by AFL-CIO Community Service Activities.

Acting under a directive issued by the council in January, CSA opened a field office at the Cuban Refugee Emergency Center in Miami to work with voluntary agencies on matters relating to employment, union membership, community integration and social services.

In charge of the field office is Robert E. Flaherty, a member of the CSA national staff, who ran the CSA operation at Camp Kilmer, N. J., during the Hungarian refugee relief and resettlement program four years ago.

CSA also reported that it had assisted the U.S. Committee for Refugees to allocate $5,000 out of a $10,000 grant voted by the Executive Council in January to provide "some direct help for the unfortunate victims of the present Cuban terror." The allocations included $2,500 to the Catholic Relief Services; $1,500 to the Intl. Rescue Committee; and $500 each to the Church World Service and the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society.

The council was also told that AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, chairman of the Community Services Committee, and CSA Dir. Leo Perlis, had met with HEW Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff to propose establishment of an advisory committee composed of labor and social agency officials to assist in the refugee operation.

Labor Seeks $1 Million For Cancer Foundation

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO has endorsed the work of the Eleanor Roosevelt Cancer Foundation and urged its affiliates to help raise $1 million for the research and fellowships programs sponsored by the foundation.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council started the labor support for the drive with a contribution of $50,000. The support for the foundation was announced at a press conference by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Gen. Omar N. Bradley, chairman of the foundation's board of trustees. Bradley expressed his "deepest appreciation" for the "generous support."

Labor's Gift Hailed

He said the labor support will help build new cancer research facilities at hospitals and medical schools and help sponsor fellowships for cancer research and training both here and abroad. He added:

"I know that labor is acting both in support of the fight against cancer and honoring the name which graces this foundation—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. I'm certain that this great lady joins me in this expression of gratitude to the ranks of labor."

Bradley said the foundation has established research centers at the University of Colorado, the University of Utah and at Jefferson Memorial Hospital in Philadelphia and that the organization has a working agreement with the American Cancer Society.

March 27 Set For Start of Safety Class

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Establishment of a National Training Institute to promote safety training among all affiliates of the AFL-CIO has been reported to the federation's Executive Council here.

The institute will open Mar. 27 in the nation's capital, with trainees from national and international unions invited. The course of instruction will be presented in four one-week sessions, with a session scheduled each three months.

Instruction will be provided by teachers employed by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards, and certificates of completion will be given by the Labor Dept. and by the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety and Occupational Health.

The Executive Council also heard a report of the standing committee calling for federal matching grants to state labor departments having safety bureaus and safety programs.

Surplus Food Asked For Families in Tent City

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on the Dept. of Agriculture to make surplus food available to 75 Negro sharecroppers and their families, evicted from their homes in Fayette and Haywood Counties, Tenn., allegedly for voting in the November election.

The council, acting on recommendations submitted by the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept. in consultation with AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, also directed the CSA staff to conduct a "gifts-in-kind" campaign to aid the evicted families who have been living for more than two months in a tent city near Somerville, Tenn.

The AFL-CIO leaders approved a current campaign, conducted by CSA, to supply food and children's clothing to the families as an outgrowth of an earlier council directive. Last January the council voted a $2,000 contribution to the Tennessee State AFL-CIO to launch labor's aid program.

CSA Dir. Leo Perlis said the "limited" campaign currently being carried out was launched following a study by representatives of CSA and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights. Taking part in the investigation were John C. Pierce, CSA field coordinator, and Don Slaiman, assistant director of the Dept. of Civil Rights.

Earlier, Theodore Brown, assistant director of Civil Rights, had made an on-the-spot study of conditions in the tent city as one of the first representatives of a national organization to investigate the problem caused by alleged violations of the Voting Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

Participating in the campaign, Perlis said, are the Clothing Workers, Ladies' Garment Workers, Textile Workers Union of America, Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO and the Long Island Federation of Labor.

Coordinating labor's role in meeting the needs for the displaced families is Matthew Lynch, secretary of the Tennessee State AFL-CIO.

In Addition to Fund-Raising:

Union Voice Asked In Social Agencies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Public and voluntary community agencies in the health and welfare field must become more broadly representative of the people they serve and the people who help to finance them, the AFL-CIO Executive Council has declared.

The council acted in adopting a report of the federation's Community Services Committee which called for the inclusion of trade unionists "in the formulation of agency policies and in the development of agency programs—in addition to fund-raising."

Organized labor generally is credited with raising more than one-third of the funds collected each year to finance voluntary social welfare agencies. In 1960, United Funds and Community Chests across the country—largest group of fund-raising organizations—collected a record $470 million.

The committee's report, presented by CSC Chairman Joseph A. Beirne, an AFL-CIO vice president and Executive Council member, urged all AFL-CIO affiliates, officers and members to learn more about community agencies, to attend board meetings, articulate the needs of the community, develop board membership training classes and to make available the most qualified people to serve on agency boards.

'Debt-Pooling' Rapped

The CSC report also assailed the mushrooming growth of so-called "debt assessment" or "debt-pooling" businesses which purport to help families overburdened with debts. This type of arrangement, the statement said, has often proved to be "an abusive scheme whereby the debtor has been deceived and overcharged and his funds subject to misappropriation."

The debt adjuster "has frequently imposed a heavy economic burden on the already overloaded debtor by charging fees of 25 percent or more," the CSC report said as it characterized the debt-adjustment business as "not economically or socially desirable."

Budget planning, advice and guidance, the CSC report said, is available through the consumer counseling program operated jointly by Community Service Activities and the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and similar guidance is offered by such agencies as the Family Service Association and the Legal Aid Society.

The committee report, approved by the Executive Council, also:

- Approved the presentation of the next Murray-Green Award to Gov. Luis Munoz Marin of Puerto Rico. The award, created in memory of the late Philip Murray, president of the former CIO, and the late William Green, president of the former AFL, is awarded annually for outstanding service in the social welfare field.

The award to the Puerto Rican governor will be made in May 1962, at the closing dinner of the annual National Community Services Conference, instead of at a special award dinner as in the past.

- Called on all AFL-CIO affiliates to provide full support for the $500,000 campaign now underway to establish a Boys' Club in Kansas City, Kan., in memory of the late Charles J. MacGowan, a vice president and Executive Council member of the AFL-CIO and president of the Boilermakers.

- Approved the appointments of six new members of the National Advisory Council to the Community Services Committee. They include: Miss Martha Allen, executive director of Camp Fire Girls, Inc.; Dean Fred DelliQuadri of the New York School of Social Work at Columbia University; Lyman S. Ford, executive director of United Community Funds and Councils of America, Inc.; Msgr. Raymond Gallagher, associate director of Cleveland Catholic Charities; Dr. Berwyn Mattison, executive director of the American Public Health Association; and Dean Charles I. Schottland of the School for Advanced Studies in Social Welfare at Brandeis University.

- Endorsed the Association for Psychiatric Treatment of Offenders and renewed CSA affiliation with the National Social Welfare Assembly and the Council on Social Work Education.

- Pledged continued support of the USO on its 20th anniversary.

In an additional statement, the Executive Council urged general support for the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial to be erected in Washington. The council said it was not taking any position in the controversy over the memorial's design, but urged affiliates to join in the fund-raising drive when it is announced so that construction of the memorial to the New Deal President can be completed in the not too distant future.

School Bill Is Welcomed as Big First Step

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pres. John F. Kennedy's $2.3 billion federal aid-to-education proposal has been hailed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as "an important first step" toward meeting the nation's school crisis.

In a statement adopted at its mid-winter session here the council praised Kennedy for providing the "executive leadership" needed to insure adequate education and pledged that organized labor would "fight hard for legislation to fill (the) education gap."

Optional Use of Funds

The Administration proposals were contained in a bill introduced in the Senate by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) and in the House by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.).

The three-year program would provide up to $15 a year for every public school student, distributed among the states under a complex formula guaranteeing more funds for states with low per capita income. The states would be free to use the money for either school construction, teachers' salaries, or both.

The Executive Council pointed out that labor has "long supported" federal aid to build the 135,000 classrooms needed immediately and said the proposed plan for improveing educators' salaries will "help produce competent teachers to staff the new classrooms which will be built."

The council also hailed Kennedy's proposals for a federal scholarship program to all qualified students, but declared that the plan "would be stronger" if scholarships were given without a "needs" test.

Arco Investigation Stresses Need Of Stricter Atomic Safety Standards

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The recent atomic reactor explosion at Arco, Ida., emphasizes the acute need for re-examination of the safety provisions of the design, construction and location of certain types of reactors, a report to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Fred MacGowan, a member of the federation's Atomic Energy Committee, assigned by Meany to conduct a special investigation of the explosion on Jan. 3, 1961, which took three lives, said: "It is clear that power reactors, henceforth, should approach population centers only to the extent that absolute containment . . . can be guaranteed in the event of an accident. . . ."

He noted that in the Arco reactor case "distance was substituted for containment" by locating the reactor away from population centers, and that the reactor involved was much smaller than any power reactor.

MacGowan pointed out that because of radiation hazards he and his investigators had not had actual access to the reactor nor the advantage of a complete photographic examination of the equipment.

Design Questioned

He said, however, that on the basis of the facts available there is "room to question the design" of the reactor, especially the movement of a single control rod, the working of which "could conceivably have resulted in a nuclear explosion of this type."

The Arco explosion and its investigation have pointed up the AFL-CIO's concern with the location of atomic reactors and the safety problem, especially those of an experimental nature located near large population centers.

Three AFL-CIO unions have waged a successful fight, to the present, to prevent operation of a power reactor near Monroe, Mich., on the basis of the nature of the reactor and its location. The case is currently pending before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Atomic Energy Commission has recently issued a set of proposed new regulations intended to deal with questions of reactor safety and distance from population centers. The AFL-CIO had criticized earlier AEC criteria. The federation was scheduled to testify on the commission's new proposals to renew its emphasis that absolute containment and all other proper safeguards for workers and the public are prerequisites for any reactor located near a population center.

Canadian Labor Aids ILO Institute

Geneva—The Canadian Labor Congress has announced a financial contribution of $2,000 to the endowment fund of the Intl. Labor Organization's new Intl. Institute for Labor Studies.

This was the first grant made by a trade union organization, said ILO Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse in welcoming the grant from CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin.

The French goverment also notified the ILO it had decided to make "an important contribution" to the endowment fund, with the specific amount to be announced later.

The largest contribution to date has been a grant of $750,000 from West Germany. Other grants from the governments of Chile, India, Morocco, Sudan and Tunisia and from employer groups in Peru and Brazil have boosted the total to $895,000.

Housing Policies Sought To Stimulate Recovery

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on Congress "to lose no time in adopting legislation to stimulate new housing construction and help reverse the current serious recession."

The council said that while Pres. Kennedy's action in reducing interest rates on federally-insured mortgages and in speeding up already-authorized housing programs is "all to the good," executive action alone is "obviously not enough."

The council also renewed endorsement of a cabinet-level Dept. of Housing and Urban Affairs already advanced by Kennedy to assure a high priority and effective coordination of government activities in the housing and urban spheres.

The council pointed out that housing starts fell 20 percent last year, depriving families of over 250,000 urgently-needed homes. In turn, building these homes would have provided work for jobless breadwinners in some 500,000 families.

Low Level of Starts

The December 1960 level of housing starts represented an annual rate of less than 1 million and was "undoubtedly a post-war low for the month," the group said, adding that only a minimal rise could be expected this year unless there is prompt and effective action.

The council proposed the following program, while urging executive action to assure a policy of non-discrimination:

- Effective provision of public funds for several hundred thousand homes for low-income families now in substandard dwellings and displaced by urban renewal, highway and other public projects;

- Authorization of $1 billion a year for urban renewal as a first step toward eradicating slum decay and rebuilding cities;

- Low-interest, long-amortization loans for rental and sale housing as well as for cooperative housing, such loans to be available to families and elderly couples and individuals of limited means;

- Authorization to continue Federal Housing Administration mortgage insurance for single-family homes and home repairs:

- Expansion and improvement of cooperative housing programs;

- Adequate funds and positive encouragement for metropolitan planning;

- Funds for housing research and training in housing and planning;

- Authorization to assure continued funds in adequate amounts on reasonable terms for college housing loans.

Kennedy Hails Foes Of School Closings

Pres. John F. Kennedy has singled out for praise the New Orleans teachers, school board members and both Negro and white children and parents who have been "on the frontlines" of the battle to maintain public schools in the face of segregationist opposition.

In a telegram to the Civil Rights Commission's conference on schools in transition at Williamsburg, Va., Kennedy said the nation is indebted to those who have met "the constitutional requirement of desegregation . . . with quiet intelligence and true courage."

He added: "This is no time for schools to close for any reason, and certainly no time for schools to be closed in the name of racial discrimination."

Conference Emphasizes Unions' Community Role

New York—Ways of increasing the direct participation of union members in community life were discussed here by 200 worker education specialists at panel meetings and at a dinner honoring Esther Peterson, new director of the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

The two-day meeting, an annual affair celebrating Washington's Birthday, was conducted by the American Labor Education Service and Local 189 of the Teachers.

Prof. Alice Cook of the New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations at Cornell University headed a panel on changes in the American community. Members described the economic and political power structure of community life and changes brought by the inflow of minority groups and the outflow of middle income families in metropolitan areas.

Prof. Kenneth Clark of City College of New York pointed out that changes in status demand more direct action from labor people in meeting contemporary problems. Other speakers called for more balance in civic leadership, and a return to volunteerism—the "bubble-up" theory of community service in place of the "trickle-down" theory.

Administrative Dir. Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. presided at the meeting which saluted Mrs. Peterson, former legislative representative of the department.

Other speakers on conference panels included Dir. Eleanor G. Coit of the American Labor Education Service; Harry Pollak, AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs; Ben Segal, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Emil Starr, National Institute of Labor Education; and Dr. Saul K. Padover of the New School for Social Research.

ILGWU to Reopen Sportswear Contracts

New York—Contract improvements for some 12,000 sportswear workers in New York, New Jersey and other areas will be sought by the Ladies' Garment Workers in negotiations due to open soon. ILGWU's Local 23, and locals in other areas, will ask employers to schedule contract talks where current agreements are expiring.

Carey Picked For ACTU's 1961 Award

New York—The Association of Catholic Trade Unionists has selected Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers as the recipient of its 14th annual Quadragesimo Anno medal.

Carey, an AFL-CIO vice president and member of the Executive Council and secretary-treasurer of the federation's Industrial Union Dept., will receive the medal at the ACTU's annual communion breakfast at the Hotel New Yorker May 21.

The Catholic laymen's association presents the award annually to a Catholic who has distinguished himself in the application of Catholic social principles. The medal is named after a 1931 encyclical issued by Pope Pius XI on the need for "reconstructing the social order."

Previous recipients have included the late Sen. Robert Wagner, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, U.S. Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, and Msgr. John P. Monaghan, ACTU's national chaplain.

The principal address at the award breakfast will be given by Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.).

For Deep Sea Crews:

NMU to Bargain For 30-Hour Week

New York—The 30-hour week for crews of deep sea ships will be the next major contract goal of the Maritime Union in forthcoming negotiations, NMU Pres. Joseph Curran has informed all members.

Asserting that the American merchant marine should provide the kind of standards that will give skilled, responsible seamen a reason to stay in the industry, Curran called for a shorter workweek to provide more jobs for seamen and to give them more time ashore with their families.

NMU bargainers were asked to call on shipowners, in order to implement reduction of the workweek, to grant extra time off, ashore, for work hours over 30 per week and to agree to pay overtime for more than 40 hours in one week.

Curran reminded members that NMU had pioneered the 40-hour week, paid vacations and overtime pay for the crews of salt water vessels.

"But we have got to face the facts of the industry," he said. "The facts indicate that our emphasis should be on creating jobs and improving the life seamen can get out of their jobs.

"Even the highest wages and perfect working conditions won't answer our problems if seamen are going to have to sit on a curbstone without a job."

Other bargaining goals, the NMU president said, should include wage increases to compensate for living cost rises since the last wage negotiations and improvements in pension, welfare, and employment security clauses in union contracts.

Contracts Expire in June

Deep sea agreements of NMU expire June 15. The union is preparing its contract proposals now and will serve them on shipping lines this spring.

"One of the principal issues concerning our members," Curran said, "is the need for additional time off to be with their families. The payment of overtime after 40 hours doesn't solve the problem of the long separations from their families that seamen, more than workers in any industry, have to contend with.

"A seaman's job should give him a chance for more normal relations with his family, and more chance to participate in community activities."

If Curran's plan is written into contracts, ship crews will be allowed to accumulate time worked in excess of 30 hours but less than 40 hours a week. This could be taken at intervals. The plan would spread employment, Curran pointed out, and will provide additional time off to be added to the vacation time of crewmen.

The proposal for a reduction in the workweek is in line with the thinking of labor generally, the NMU head said, as it grapples with the problems brought by automated machinery.

Fewer Ships Needed

Asserting that fewer ships are needed to carry the same cargo because of improvements in ship handling and cargo handling, Curran cited competition from jet planes and fast luxury liners.

"In the tanker and freighter fields, our shipping has been seriously affected by 'runaway flag' vessels—American ships sailing under foreign flags to avoid American wages and conditions," Curran said. This has brought our shipping to the lowest point since 1938, but it does not mean we are going to stop making progress for seamen."

Meany Raps Proposed Dock Control Extension

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has appealed to New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller to help defeat proposed amendments to the Waterfront Commission Act which, he charged, "would seriously jeopardize the legitimate rights of waterfront workers and their unions."

Meanwhile, the Greater New York Maritime Port Council, comprised of waterfront unions, announced its support of other bills which "would provide an appeals procedure for waterfront workers barred from employment by the Bi-State Waterfront Commission, as provided in federal procedures and they would also bring waterfront regulations into conformity with the Landrum-Griffin Act by establishing a five-year statute of limitations on barring waterfront workers from the docks."

Stronger Powers Sought

The New York-New Jersey Waterfront Commission, according to the maritime unions, has been seeking stronger powers from the two state legislatures to close what the commission regards as loopholes in its present authority.

Meany telegraphed Rockefeller from Bal Harbour, Fla., where the AFL-CIO Executive Council was in session.

Meany said the Mitchell-Amann bills pending in the New York legislature "would unduly and unnecessarily extend the authority of the Waterfront Commission and would present the specter of imprisonment each time workers and their union engage in an economic struggle to secure better wages and improved working conditions."

In addition, Meany protested, "they would expand the present prohibition against the collection of union fees by union officers convicted of a felony by extending this prohibition to union employes generally and to employes of a welfare fund administered in whole or in part by a union and by making this prohibition applicable not only to felons but to those convicted of certain misdemeanors or specified offenses enumerated in this act."

Meany told Rockefeller that labor has utilized its own codes of ethical conduct to remove traitors to union morality and that federal anti-corruption laws are broadly enforced throughout the land. On the Mitchell-Amann bills, he urged the governor to "take such steps as may be proper to bring about their defeat."

The Greater New York Maritime Port Council, in backing bills sponsored by Sen. William F. Condon (R) and Assembly Speaker Joseph F. Carlino (R), charged that under present laws the commission is "complainant, prosecutor, judge and jury in any case involving job rights."

Government, Unions, Employers Called on to Wipe Out Job Bias

employer "must, itself, scrupulously live up to its professions of nondiscrimination."

Indications that the President's Committee on Government Contracts will be strengthened are a "long overdue action," the council said, and it declared that the President "can and should" strengthen the government contracts' non-discrimination policy by: extending the committee's authority to cover all grants-in-aid programs; require nondiscrimination throughout a government contractor's labor force; grant prior certification on the showing of non-discrimination policies; disqualify violators until cause is removed and cancel existing contracts; and develop training and recruitment programs among minority groups.

NLRB Policy Asked

The statement called also on the National Labor Relations Board to make it an unfair labor practice for employers to engage in race-hate campaigns. The council added:

"At the same time we must continue our campaign to eliminate those segregated local unions that still exist. They exist in violation of the AFL-CIO Constitution and the terms of that Constitution must be met in all particulars."

Cooperation Stressed

Queried about his views on the Negro American Labor Council, the federation president told his press conference: "If they want the cooperation of the trade union movement, they should try to work with us and not accept complaints and announce conclusions without hearing both sides."

He added he had no objection to the organization "provided they keep out of our business and attend to their own. . . . Their business ought to be trying to help their people and bring to our attention in a proper and orderly way the things that we feel we can do to be helpful."

The NALC was formed a year ago and is composed of Negro trade unionists. Randolph is president of the organization.

Meany stressed that cooperation is a necessary ingredient in relations with the NALC rather than what he said appeared to be a policy of "criticism and slander." He pointed to a case involving the NALC and a number of New York City members of the Molders and Foundry Workers Union. This group in New York City, he said, protested the lack of Negro leaders in the local.

Meany said he checked with the international union and found that it has barred racial and religious discrimination since it was established in 1859 and has organized thousands of Negroes. He said in the large Chicago local of the union, where the majority of the membership is Negro, all the paid officers are Negroes, and he added that the international union has 11 paid organizers on its staff of whom eight are white and three Negroes. He said that Negroes constitute 27.8 percent of the entire membership of the international union.

Nation's No. 1 Moral Problem: Denial of Civil Rights

Herewith is the text of the AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution, adopted at its Bal Harbour, Fla., meeting, on the issue of civil rights:

THE OVERWHELMING CONCERN of this Executive Council for the plight of our fellow Americans trapped in this recession must not be construed as evidence that we consider this America's only major problem. In fact, this recession serves to spotlight one of the nation's most grievous problems and certainly its No. 1 moral problem—the denial of full civil rights to all of its people.

Negroes constitute 10 percent of our labor force but they constitute 20 percent of the unemployed.

That stark fact highlights a picture that distresses and alarms all Americans who truly believe in equal rights and especially in equality of opportunity.

Daily, the conscience of America is disturbed by the facts of civil rights violations and by the evidences of continued existence of discrimination and segregation which blot the bright banner of democracy. Despite the Supreme Court decisions, segregated schools still exist. Despite the force of public opinion, Americans are still denied equal service, equal opportunity, equal rights, equal housing, and, in some areas, equal justice —solely because of their color, religion or national origin.

THE AFL-CIO is firmly and irrevocably dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. We shall not rest until that God-given right is established in practice.

While we take pride in the great steps forward that have been made in America, and especially in the trade union movement, we cannot be and we are not satisfied. We will not be until there is no instance of discrimination and segregation anywhere and that especially includes our own ranks.

To achieve that goal, we believe certain vital steps are necessary and, high among these, ranks action to eliminate discrimination in employment.

Start at Hiring Gate

Unions have a vital role to play in the elimination of job discrimination from American industry, but the job is not labor's alone. Unions can, should, and do protect through seniority clauses the layoff and transfer rights of all workers, regardless of race, but they do not control the basic hiring practices of management.

It is the employer who must be persuaded—and, when necessary, required—to drop his discrimination policies. In this, government policy can be most constructive.

The labor movement has urged the enactment of federal fair employment legislation (FEPC). It has given prime support for the enactment of state FEPC laws, and the experience in the states which have such laws justifies the enactment of federal legislation.

The AFL-CIO renews its support for a federal Fair Employment Practices Act and calls upon the 87th Congress to enact it into law at the earliest possible time.

In the absence of federal fair employment legislation, there is still much that the federal government can do. As an employer, it must itself scrupulously live up to its professions of nondiscrimination. It must not stop at merely investigating complaints; it must vigorously pursue a program of recruitment and training of qualified Negro personnel for full utilization in government service. As a purchaser of a substantial volume of goods and services from American industry, the government must insist upon nondiscrimination policy as a condition of all government contracts.

Stronger Contracts Committee Needed

The AFL-CIO welcomes recent statements by the President, the Vice President and the Secretary of Labor that the President's Committee on Government Contracts will be strengthened. This is a long-overdue action.

Eight years ago, Pres. Truman's Committee on Government Contract Compliance made several crucial recommendations before leaving office. These included withholding contracts from firms found to be discriminating, termination of contracts where violations occur, liquidated damages, arbitration and injunctive relief.

Eight years later, Vice Pres. Nixon's Committee on Government Contracts wound up its term of office with a set of recommendations that would increase the scope of its operations and would give special emphasis to the training and education of minority groups. It is regrettable that during these eight years no determined action had been taken to strengthen the committee's authority and program.

THE AFL-CIO BELIEVES that even without statutory authority the President can — and should — strengthen the government contract nondiscrimination policy in the following ways:

1 Extend the committee's authority to cover all grant-in-aid programs, in addition to contracts directly negotiated by federal procurement agencies;

2 Require nondiscrimination throughout the contractor's labor force, not confining it merely to those directly engaged in the production of goods and services under contract;

3 Grant prior certification to prospective contractors on the showing of nondiscrimination policies throughout the contractor's plants and offices;

4 Disqualify violators of the nondiscrimination pledge until cause is removed and cancel existing contracts. This single action, as the AFL-CIO members of the committee have long advocated, would put the burden of compliance on those who refuse compliance, the employers.

5 Develop training and recruitment programs among minority groups.

Undoubtedly, such a strengthened program will meet resistance among some employers, and perhaps even some local unions. Prejudices and century-long practices cannot be wiped out overnight by decree. But the work of extending the frontiers of equality must go on. The AFL-CIO pledges to do whatever it can to cooperate with the newly-created committee in the furtherance of this goal.

In the area of private employment, where government contracts are not involved, there is much that can be done as well. The National Labor Relations Board can, and should, make it an unfair labor practice for employers to engage in race hate campaigns, as they do today, in efforts to defeat unions in representation elections.

At the same time, we must continue our campaign to eliminate those segregated local unions that still exist. They exist in violation of the AFL-CIO constitution and the terms of that constitution must be met in all particulars.

To meet all of the civil rights goals of the AFL-CIO, the Executive Council strongly urges every national and international union of this federation to establish a civil rights committee, adequately staffed, to provide leadership, helpful assistance and cooperation to local unions dealing with this problem.

We call on every unit of the American trade union movement to join in a concerted and determined drive to bring equal rights and equal opportunity within the grasp of every American.

Council Asks Tax Reform, Closing of Loopholes

Herewith is the slightly condensed text of the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement on federal taxation:

AS THE RECESSION DEEPENS, it becomes clear that a major step by the government is necessary to put much-needed purchasing power in the hands of consumers. We have urged a major temporary cut in taxes to achieve this result.

We regret that the President has been reluctant to recommend such action, although he plans to reconsider this question at a later date.

It is surprising to find that one tax measure which the President has already announced he is planning to propose, would provide greater tax allowances for business investment. It is claimed that this proposal is needed to spur new modernization of productive facilities. We most seriously disagree.

It seems clear to us that the economy is in the throes of today's recession not for lack of adequate business investment, but for lack of adequate purchasing power and consumer markets.

We strongly oppose any tinkering with the depreciation rates or other tax incentives to business investment as unsound and as providing special unnecessary benefits for business at the expense of other members of the taxpaying public.

The chief area of tax policy in which the President has not spelled out his intention concerns the necessity for comprehensive tax reform. This task is long overdue. Regardless of what tax action is taken to help stimulate economic recovery, we urge the Administration to take a firm and strong position in favor of major tax reform. An energetic comprehensive program of tax reform would yield greatly increased revenue (up to $18 billion) without any change in basic rates.

Tax Structure Corrupted

Over the past 20 years the trend in tax legislation has been away from reform and toward special privilege. The favoritism that has now been written into the tax laws has corrupted the basically progressive income tax structure. The special treatment for dividends, for interest payments, for those who receive capital gains, have all been taken at the expense of those whose incomes come largely or completely from wages and salaries.

We urge Pres. Kennedy to tackle the following basic elements of a tax reform program:

1 Dividends: The special treatment for dividend income granted in 1954 should be repealed. At the present time the first $50 of dividend ($100 for a married couple) income is not subject to any tax, and all dividends above this receive a special 4 percent tax credit. This unique treatment robs the Treasury of close to $400 million a year.

2 Withholding: The efficient withholding system makes certain that 97 percent of all wages are duly reported as income to the tax authorities. However, close to 40 percent of all interest payments, and 10 percent of all dividends received are never even included on income tax returns. A system of withholding must be adopted so that the Treasury will collect taxes which are rightfully due from dividends and interest that now escape taxation. (Revenue yield: up to $1 billion.)

3 Capital Gains: The cancer of capital gains must be attacked. In effect, the tax preferences given to capital gains provide a dual system of tax rates, giving special advantage to upper-income taxpayers who can jockey their income so that a larger proportion of it appears as capital gains subject to a top tax rate of 25 percent.

The widespread adoption of easy money stock option plans is one product of the special treatment for capital gains. We need to recognize that capital gains income should be subject to the same tax rates as income from wages and salaries, making allowance only where such income has accumulated for more than a one-year period. (Revenue yield: up to $4 billion.)

4 Income Splitting: The income splitting provisions adopted in 1958, in effect simply provide a lower rate of taxation for upper-income recipients. These provisions should be repealed. This can most practically be done by requiring all married couples to file joint returns but at the same time providing for them a separate tax table so that the tax on a married couple with a given taxable income is the same as the tax on a single person with that same income. (Revenue yield: $4 billion.)

5 Expense Accounts: The expense account farce must come to an end. No one should be permitted to charge the cost of entertainment as a business expense. In addition, a reasonable maximum limit should be placed on all other types of expense account spending. (Revenue yield: $1 billion.)

6 Depletion: The excessive depletion allowances for the oil, gas and mineral industries should be repealed. These corporations should be allowed to deduct no more than the depreciation allowance received by other industries on their invested capital. (Revenue yield: $1.4 billion.)

7 Estate and Gift Taxes: Little attention has been paid to these taxes which are in drastic need of overhaul. The aim should be to make these taxes a more effective source of revenue by developing a single coordinated system with a single exemption and a single schedule of tax rates. (Revenue yield: up to $1 billion.)

Many other aspects of present tax policies also require revision.

In this process all special interests must be swept aside. Individuals in all income classes are bound to be affected. While workers and other low and middle-income groups are now paying more than their full share of the tax burden, we recognize that some necessary changes may adversely affect their interests as well as the interests of those in the upper-income brackets.

The increased revenue resulting both from these reforms and from the higher levels of income in a growing economy, will enable the federal government to accomplish two objectives:

- It will provide the financial support for any needed expansion in governmental programs in the field of national defense, national resources and welfare needs.
- To achieve a greater measure of equity, it will make possible reductions in tax burdens to those who most urgently are in need of such relief.

The Legacy to Kennedy

THE FLOW of messages from the White House to Capitol Hill on the wide range of problems confronting the nation comprises in effect an inventory of the unfinished business inherited from the Eisenhower Administration—problems that were swept under the rug.

These problems cover the full spectrum of domestic and international affairs from balance of payments to federal aid to education, and perhaps most importantly, the complex approach to providing jobs for an expanding labor force in a period of rapid technological advances.

The simple fact is that the Eisenhower Administration created no machinery of any sort to cope with this major problem of the Sixties; that the new Administration must start from scratch and build up the necessary information and know-how at the very least to make a start on some solutions.

It's not as though the problem was completely unknown. The previous Administration produced figures on a growing and expanding labor force and acknowledged that automation was accelerating rapidly. It produced some of the facts also on the critical needs for more classrooms and teachers but refused to act effectively on its own information.

These and other problems are the inheritance of the Kennedy Administration, an inheritance that is producing previously unanticipated headaches for the new regime.

It is in this context that the first month of the new Administration should be measured, especially its efforts to instill a sense of urgency in a nation that had been told too often that all was well in the best of all possible worlds.

Problem in the Family

DURING THE NEXT 10 years it is estimated that 13.5 million new workers will enter the labor market, a market that is changing in the nature of jobs available.

The labor movement faces the problem of not only maintaining and expanding the percentage of the total work force organized into unions but of achieving this goal in the face of a changing labor force.

The ratio between the organized workers in the blue collar group and the unorganized workers in the white collar group is shifting continuously in favor of the white collars, a group which has shown a resistance to unionization.

As the pace of technological progress accelerates and electronic computers are applied more broadly, the full impact of what has been called the second phase of the industrial revolution will be applied to new fields and in greater depth to basic industries.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has taken a long look at these facts and approved a preliminary organizing program, warning that:

"The American labor movement can continue to ignore these basic facts only at great peril and loss of influence not only at the bargaining table, but more importantly, in the broad areas in our national life where economic and social problems must be solved and community and national responsibilities must be met."

'It's a Two-Man Job'

Former Company Official Says:

General Electric Price-Fixing Traced to Light Bulb Monopoly

The following is excerpted from an article in the Feb. 27 issue of the New Republic, written by T. K. Quinn, who years ago resigned as a vice president of General Electric Co. because, in his words, "of just such practices as those disclosed in the Philadelphia price collusion case":

GENERAL ELECTRIC executives now languishing in jail for their price collusion crimes in the sale of electrical machinery, owe their education in these illegalities, whether or not they know it, to the company's long continued monopolistic practices in the electric incandescent lamp industry.

From the start, freedom of enterprise in manufacture and sale has been restricted by General Electric. Its position today is formidable, like that of other monster-big enterprises, because of the forcible exclusion of other companies over half a century. Today, it would take many millions of capital, not available to new concerns, to develop new know-how and build and equip factories to move successfully into the tightly-controlled electric lamp business.

Competitive efforts have always been hampered and stifled, competition itself rejected as a constructive force. Any representations to the contrary are simply not true. The effect and purpose have been to keep prices and profits high and investment down. Under these conditions, there have been no major innovations or scientific advances for more than 30 years.

However, the lamp profits to General Electric, hidden in its over-all figures, have been enormous, even when loaded with extraneous overhead. There have been bad times, notably during the Thirties, when the lamp profits carried the whole company, although the lamp sales volume was only about 10 percent of the GE total. In fact, lamp profits not only made up for losses in other departments but actually provided an excess that permitted the company to continue its record of steady dividends throughout the deep depression years.

There is no other household, commercial or industrial necessity that has extorted such excessive profits over so long a period for any private interest.

A federal court decision in 1911 held that General Electric and a group of associated companies had violated the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. After this decision GE's control rested on a patent purchased from two Viennese scientists for $400,000 and upon the Coolidge and Langmuir developments. General Electric thereupon proceeded under cross-licensing agreements to fix prices and divided markets in this country and around the world.

THE ELECTRIC LAMP BULB monopoly continues effectively to this day because of its head start and lengthened period of protection during which competitors were excluded.

Today, General Electric still has about 60 percent of the lamp bulb business of the country, Westinghouse about 20 percent, Hygrade about 12 percent and the remaining 8 percent of the business is done by a few small concerns. Prices remain substantially uniform—regulated reportedly, by methods like those used in the sale of electrical machinery for which seven executives were jailed and fined, 37 were fined, and 29 companies were fined—a grand total of close to $2 million.

WHEN THE TVA authorities protested the high prices on turbines quoted by GE and Westinghouse in 1959, and showed that even if labor costs were excluded entirely, the uniform prices were still higher than for the competing British product, GE lowered its prices but promptly increased the prices of electric lamps. Lamps are bought, for the most part, in small quantities where increases are measured in pennies, and markets are scattered. The increases, however, may amount to exorbitant percentage increases.

At a congressional hearing in 1949, Chairman Celler of the House Anti-trust Committee noted that 16 cases had been instituted against General Electric under the anti-trust laws from 1911 to 1947. In addition, eight proceedings were started against the company by the Federal Trade Commission. A number have been filed since 1947. Mr. Celler wondered why the company could not operate under these laws, if they believed in them.

Beyond the extortion, collusion and crime there is the moral effect on the country. The cream of our youth aspires to executive positions in Big Business, positions which they now know to be occupied by men who must be fined and sent to jail. The hypocrisy of our business community has been shown and the end is not yet. We are left with the transparent mystery of why prices continue so uniform in the electric lamp, steel, drug, cement, roofing material and other industries.

Morgan Says:

Come on Over and Visit Us, We Natives Are Friendly Now

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

I'M NOT QUITE SURE what frontier the Senate of the United States is headed for but it's not only new, it's revolutionary. The Senate shouted approval of a bill to establish an international travel office and encourage people from other countries to visit the United States. Chances of House passage are reportedly excellent.

Morgan

This sudden display of the welcome mat unexpectedly hoists traditional American hospitality to the highest official level with a good, hard dollar-and-cents motive. Americans are spending more than a billion dollars more in travel abroad than citizens from far places spend similarly here. By promoting the familiar motto "See America First" beyond our boundaries it is hoped that the drain on the dollar will be eased, by a reverse flow.

That's all very well but do the legislators fully realize what they are doing? They are encouraging foreigners to our shores, foreigners who wear imported clothes and speak English with a funny accent. They'll be all over the lot, taking pictures of the Statue of Liberty, Marilyn Monroe and other restricted areas.

They'll be complaining that all they can get is ham and eggs for breakfast when what they want is a croissont and a good cup of homemade chicory-flavored coffee. They may make disparaging remarks about the natives of Hollywood or Washington. Plainly, an investigation is in order to turn these well-heeled, low-tipping undesirables back at the gates and the man to do it, of course, is Chairman Walter of the House Un-American Activities Committee.

It is indeed largely due to the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act that we haven't been pestered more by gaping transients from abroad. In a grudging tribute to that forbidding legislation, the principal sponsor of the tourism bill, Sen. Warren Magnuson of Washington state complained that "it's sometimes harder to get into the United States as a tourist than it is to break into jail."

Dramatizing their carelessness, no western European countries require visas of Americans. Foreign tourists, by contrast, must get a U.S. visa and not only state full personal particulars but they may be required to produce detailed financial references and, in the case of ladies, declare whether they intend to enter the United States for immoral purposes. Is it wise to lift these restrictions and leave the morals of Miami Beach and Las Vegas exposed and unprotected?

REALISTICALLY I'm afraid the question is academic because the exuberant tenor of the Senate debate on the tourism bill indicates it will be approved with wild acclaim, like a pass to the World Series. One by one senators from coast to coast rose to support the measure, extolling its potential in promoting human understanding, and each taking care to plug the scenic charms of his home state with a free commercial so his constituents would get their share of the travel boom.

There are, admittedly, problems. As the government goes into the tourist promotion business, what does it promote?

Should the colorful "See the USA" posters to blossom on the Champs Elysees, Rome's Via Veneto and London's Strand depict our snow-capped peaks or the migrant farm workers toiling for bare subsistence pay in the valleys? The majestic smokestacks at River Rouge or lines of the unemployed. The Harvard Yard in Cambridge on a spring day with students of almost every hue and nationality chatting amiably, or apoplectic housewives picketing outside McDonough public school number 19 in New Orleans?

Whether it fits handsomely on travel posters or not, I suggest we must be prepared to give our foreign visitors the full picture. Maybe if we show them the good and the bad, side by side, we will be more disposed to look realistically at ourselves, at this country's dazzling beauty and its hideous scars, at our mighty strength and foolish weaknesses.

We have things to be ashamed of but if we don't try to hide them (we can't anyway) our friends may well conclude that we are human too with quirks and failings like theirs, in contrast to the postures of perfection and superiority that our propaganda and policy pronouncements have sometimes seemed to assume in foreign eyes.

Washington Reports:

Farm Leaders, Freeman Seek Effective Agricultural Program

SUCCESS IN SOLVING the farm problem depends "to a great extent" upon a better public understanding of the situation, Sec. of Agriculture Orville Freeman told a conference of farm leaders at the Dept. of Agriculture.

Five farm leaders were heard in a broadcast of the conference proceedings carried on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, now carried on 450 radio stations.

Freeman said that the average American citizen spends only 20 percent of his income for food, compared with 56 percent in Russia, 45 percent in Germany and 42 percent in Japan. "And one hour of work (by American farmers) produces twice as much food as 40 years ago," Freeman said. "The cost of rent, medical care and transportation has increased twice as much as food costs during the past 10 years."

Hershel D. Newsom, master of the National Grange, said that farmers should be organized as industry is "to manage their own production and marketing, and to operate profitably on the basis of costs."

Homer Brinkley, executive vice president of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, thought that farmers should have the right "to grow in cooperative associations and utilize techniques such as mergers, consolidations, joint selling agencies."

MURRAY D. LINCOLN, president of the Cooperative League of the United States, said the surplus food "could be forged into a missile for peace," and farmers should make a "better use of cooperatives . . . from the source of machinery and feed through the delivery of processed food to the consumer."

Charles B. Shuman, president of the American Farm Bureau, declared that "farmers have been hurt more by rising costs than by falling prices."

James G. Patton, president of the National Farmers Union, expressed confidence "in the leadership of Pres. Kennedy and Sec. Freeman," and the hope that all farm leaders would work with "executive and legislative leaders" to develop useful farm programs.

He proposed, among other things, that the Secretary be "authorized to work with advisory committees composed of producers, to develop improved commodity programs for the purpose of insuring incomes to farmers for their labor, management and capital. . . ."

He said the Farmers Union supported a food-use program to meet the needs of the unemployed, aged and handicapped, and an expanded Food for Peace program "including exploration of a multilateral program in cooperation with other free nations."

Economic research under the Dept. of Agriculture and a council of resource and conservation advisers were urged.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE FIRST TEST of power between the Kennedy Administration forces in the House of Representatives and the conservative Republican-Democratic coalition now seems likely to come on the minimum wage bill.

Depending on action by the full House Labor Committee, the wage-hour measure that goes to the floor is certain to reflect compromises in advance by the President. As it was approved by the Roosevelt subcommittee, the bill would extend coverage to about 4 million workers who are not now protected by federal law and would provide gradual application of the terms of the bill to employers. Overtime hours would be reduced in steps; higher statutory minimum wages would be increased in steps to $1.25 an hour.

This is considerably less sweeping than a bill approved last year by a Senate subcommittee headed by then Sen. Kennedy but basically the same as that approved by the full Senate.

Advance compromises have been made on coverage in deference to the political power of restaurant owners; hundreds of thousands of workers are left unprotected in that field.

Still, the compromises are not sufficient to satisfy the GOP-Dixiecrat coalition in the House, which last year gutted a Democratic minimum wage bill with the Kitchin-Ayres substitute.

REP. WILLIAM H. AYRES (R-O.), one of the captains of the coalition, is working to produce another substitute through which the conservatives can try their power. The coalition wants to keep the general framework of the Kitchin-Ayres measure: a statutory minimum wage no higher than $1.15 an hour and sharp limitations on the added number of workers to be covered, to a maximum of 1.5 million.

The rollcall on the coalition substitute last year was exceedingly close; the conservatives won by only a 211-203 vote. The party breakdown showed that Republicans voted overwhelmingly—121 to 27—for the substitute, a ratio of nearly five to one. The Democrats were able to deliver less than a two-to-one ratio against the substitute.

Now the Republicans have 21 more members in the House. Their leaders are expert technicians in the framing of legislation to attract the maximum number of votes to achieve the general objective they have in view.

The Kennedy Administration therefore faces a series of problems. It can try to block the substitute by refusing it clearance in the newly enlarged Rules Committee—but if so it must also have strength enough to block piecemeal amendment or other parliamentary attacks on the floor.

In a showdown, in short, it must persuade a substantial number of the 90 Democrats who voted for the substitute last year to change sides and support the Administration, or it must attract a substantially larger number of northern Republicans to reject the domination of their party by the conservatives.

In the Congress during the Eisenhower years, there was a series of tests in which Democrats attempted to override presidential vetoes; they were never able to do it on a major bill against which the White House had set itself.

The likelihood is that the struggle between the Kennedy Administration and the House conservative coalition will be equally extended and will involve another series of tests involving, in the end, the prestige the President is able to command for his purposes.

FROM THE SOUTH, the headlines tell principally of the demonstrators who have blocked effective school integration in New Orleans or politicians who have fomented mobs and invited massive legislative resistance to integration orders.

But Malcolm Bryan, president of the Federal Reserve Board of Atlanta, points out that the South cannot expand and industrialize, giving new opportunity to all its people, without investment of capital from other states and countries.

Potential investors "are not much concerned with our social opinions," he says, "but they are concerned with our ability to govern ourselves and to maintain law and order."

Labor Political Groups Plan Merger in Chicago

Chicago—Provisional merger of the Cook County branch of Labor's League for Political Education and the Cook County Political Action Committee has been achieved here.

The two units tentatively formed a joint Committee on Political Education and formal merger will be completed when the Chicago Federation of Labor and the Cook County Industrial Union Council are united in one central body.

John E. Cullerton, LLPE chairman, was named temporary chairman of the new COPE operation, with Sec.-Treas. Paul Iaccino of PAC as COPE secretary and Earl Quinn, executive secretary-treasurer of LLPE named as COPE executive director.

Cullerton pointed out that joint headquarters of both political units were previously established in each congressional district and that there had been general agreement on policies and methods.

How to Buy:

Many Families Can Cut Taxes By Using 'Long-Form' Return

By Sidney Margolius

THERE'S NO REASON why moderate-income families should not save all they can on taxes. Well-to-do taxpayers have accountants and lawyers to find all possible legal tax-savers. If you don't take time to keep your tax to the legal minimum, you'll simply pay more than your share of the tax load.

Biggest mistake working families are likely to make is to use the easy-to-fill-out Form 1040-A—the punch-card form. This allows you a standard 10 percent allowance for deductions. It does not permit you to itemize deductions, nor to exclude sick pay received while ill or injured.

Before you take this easy way out, try figuring out your tax on either Form 1040W or Form 1040. These forms do allow you to itemize your deductions and also claim a "sick pay" exclusion.

We aren't going to try to cover all possible deductions. They are listed in the instructions with your tax forms, and also in the government's booklet, "Your Federal Income Tax," 40 cents from the Superintendent of Documents, Washington 24, D.C., and the more-detailed Lasser's "Your Income Tax" ($1.95 in stores). Instead we want to bring you up to date on tax deductions of special current importance, which you can use if you itemize deductions:

HURRICANE DAMAGE: People who suffered damage to homes, cars, boats, shrubbery or other possessions in last fall's hurricanes, can deduct for such damage on the long forms under "Other Deductions." You can deduct only for that much of the loss not reimbursed by insurance.

You also can deduct for damage to your house, car, other possessions from other sudden natural causes as fire, freezing, landslides and blizzards.

Another type of deductible loss wage-earners often overlook, is non-reimbursed collision damage to your car, even if the accident was your own fault, unless you were "willfully negligent" as in driving while drunk.

WORKING YOUNGSTERS: If your dependent child worked part time during vacation or after school, and taxes were deducted from his pay, make sure he files a return. The refund to which he may be entitled will not arrive automatically. It must be claimed. The child can take himself as an exemption on his own return, and you still can take him as a dependent as long as you provide more than half his support.

DEPENDENT PARENTS: A recent change in the tax laws helps taxpayers who provide the major support of dependent parents or parents-in-law. Now you can deduct the entire medical expense of dependent parents over 65, not just the amount over 3 percent of your income as in your own case.

In figuring out whether you pay more than half the support of a dependent relative, and so can claim him as an exemption, you can include the value of a room or apartment you provide as well as cost of his food, entertainment, transportation, clothes and medical care.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION: An increasingly important deduction for wage-earners, in these days of upgrading skills, is the cost of training or courses needed to keep up your job skills. You can't take a deduction for education you take to get a new or better job. But you can deduct for training to maintain or improve skills required by your job. In that case you can deduct costs of tuition, books and other equipment, and also lodging and transportation if you take this training away from home.

STRIKE BENEFITS: The Internal Revenue Service always has insisted that strike benefits are taxable income. However, the service now agrees with a recent court ruling that at least in the case of benefits regarded as gifts to needy strikers, and not as recompense, the benefits are tax exempt.

SICK PAY: Be sure you subtract from your taxable income any legally tax-free sick pay. You can exclude from taxable income up to $100 a week of sick pay received after the first seven days of an illness. But if you were hospitalized at least a day, or were absent because of injury, you are entitled to a sick-pay exemption for the first week of illness too. You subtract the excludable sick pay from your taxable income on page 1 of the long form.

Workmen's compensation payments are fully tax exempt without the above limitations.

COLD WAR EXPERTS on the third "Briefing Session" program were Theodore Kaghan, left, editorial writer for the New York Post, and Edgar Ansel Mowrer, veteran news analyst, author and broadcaster.

On 'Briefing Session' Program:

Panel Terms Berlin Symbol of Freedom

WHETHER THE UNITED STATES can "negotiate" with the Soviet Union over the status of West Berlin may be debatable, but under no circumstances can we surrender this symbol of freedom.

This was agreed by the panelists on "Briefing Session," the public affairs television series presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center. The third program in the series is entitled "Berlin—Cold War Thermometer."

Appearing with Edward P. Morgan, the permanent host and moderator, were Edgar Ansel Mowrer, veteran foreign news analyst and author, and Theodore Kaghan, editorial writer for the New York Post.

Disagreement between the two guests centered on what could and should be done in seeking an accommodation with Russia.

Kaghan, while stressing that West Berlin must remain free, denied that "this makes Berlin unnegotiable."

"The solution to Berlin is part of a peace solution," he said, "and that involves all of Germany, and it involves making not only Berlin negotiable, but considering the possibility that NATO is negotiable."

MOWRER, on the other hand, feared any indication that West Berlin would be involved in a compromise would tend to drive all West Germany into neutralism or "swing politics." Any change whatever, he said, must be acceptable to the West Germans, for "geographically at least," Germany is essential to the defense of Europe.

"Any monkeying with the Berlin situation that results in something that the German people as a whole consider a surrender by the United States will bring about a vast strain," Mowrer added.

"Negotiation does not mean surrender," Kaghan retorted. "Some way must be found to get what we want in Europe, which is peace and liberty without military action."

However, both men praised Pres. Kennedy's statement that our policy on the defense of West Berlin was unchanged; and Kaghan expressed the view that because of the change in administrations, "for the first time in quite a while the Russians are much more puzzled about what we might do than we are about what they will do."

The discussion was preceded by a filmed history of the Berlin crisis, with narration by John MacVane.

Air Safety Next Topic

THE MOUNTING problem of air safety will be examined by the fourth program in the "Briefing Session" public affairs television series. Under the title "Aerial Traffic Jam," the panelists will examine the causes and possible cures for the recent series of air disasters.

Clarence Sayen, president of the Airline Pilots Association since 1951 and a former commercial pilot, and Francis McDermott, executive director of the Air Traffic Control Association, will be guest panelists.

Sayen, a native of Michigan, holds both bachelor's and master's degrees in geography and economics. He has been an officer of the pilots' union since he landed his last Braniff plane in 1949, and has served on numerous government bodies concerned with aviation. He is also a board member of the American Arbitration Association.

McDermott was an air traffic controller in Chicago and Cleveland before joining the Civil Aeronautics Authority staff in 1953. Later he was technical adviser to the director of research and development in the Federal Aviation Agency. He has held his present post since January 1960.

"Briefing Session" can now be seen over 30 TV stations at convenient viewing hours. At least 17 more stations will be added to the list in the next two weeks.

Economy Not Growing, CLC Warns:

12% Unemployment Feared in Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Unemployment may reach a peak of close to 12 percent of the labor force, or 750,000 workers, before the winter is over, the Canadian Labor Congress predicted in its recent annual report and recommendations to the federal government.

The probable actual peak will be about one worker in every seven, or in the neighborhood of 14 percent, because self-employed and family workers are included in the labor force, the CLC said.

The presentation dealt with a wide variety of matters, with the emphasis on unemployment. It was given by CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin accompanied by other union officials to the Canadian government headed by Premier John G. Diefenbaker.

"The fact is that our economy is just not growing fast enough to provide jobs for all the people who are looking for them," the CLC said.

"To take a very simple illustration, from December 1956 to December 1960, the labor force, seasonally adjusted, rose by 604,000 but the number of jobs, seasonally adjusted, rose by only 295,000. There is a long-run trend of rising unemployment. In each recession, unemployment is worse than in the one before; after each recession, it settles down at a higher level than in the one before."

Slowdown in Growth Cited

The CLC maintained that the main reason for high joblessness is a slowdown in Canada's rate of growth.

"From 1950 to 1956 inclusive," the brief recalled, "our gross national product in real terms—goods and services, not just money—rose 5.6 percent per year. From 1957 to 1960 inclusive it has risen only about 1.4 percent per year. . . .

"We have to get the rate of growth up and keep it up. We see no possibility of doing this except by a massive expansion in the public sector of the economy, without reduction in the private sector. We believe this involves temporary deficit financing. We are convinced that with the present massive underemployment of both plant and manpower, this does not involve any danger of inflation."

The CLC hailed moves the government has already made to meet the jobless crisis but urged it to "go further and faster in the same direction, and not to be frightened off by the direful warnings of people who are fighting the old war against inflation instead of the new war against unemployment."

"We urge you particularly to take prompt action to get people back to work now," the labor body's brief asked, "by cutting taxes on small incomes and raising old age pensions and family allowances."

Asks Full Employment Act

The CLC also called for enactment of a full employment act which would make full employment a matter of national policy and which in addition would establish a council of economic advisors that would make periodic reports on the Canadian economy.

In addition it asked for strengthening of the federal Dept. of Labor, particularly by expanding employment service facilities.

It urged a step-up in the implementation of the comprehensive national health plan; an increase in pension benefits now pegged at $65 a month and their payment to all at age 65; and a plan to make industrial pensions "portable" so workers will not lose them as they move from job to job.

"The unemployment insurance fund, which stood at over $900 million, is now at a low ebb," the CLC declared. "This is partly due to the severe unemployment which has not been effectively dealt with. But it is also due to the fact that payments have been made out of the fund which should have been paid from other sources."

Canada Job Picture Worst Since 1930s

Ottawa, Ont.—Unemployment in Canada rose to 10.8 percent in January, miring the nation in its worst crisis since the Great Depression.

An additional 165,000 Canadians became unemployed between December and January, boosting the total to 693,000 or nearly 11 percent of the workforce. The jobless totals are expected to show seasonal rises in reports for February and March.

The January total was a record high for any month since the 1930s and the over-the-month rise also was a record.

CHILDREN OF New York City union members, who attended camp last summer under the sponsorship of the Central Labor Council's Community Services Committee, are entertained by Clown Joe Madden at jamboree held to launch labor's 10th annual camping program and publicize the summer camping opportunities available at low cost to youngsters from union families.

N.Y. Unions Launch New Camp Season

New York—More than 250 children of this city's trade unionists watched goggle-eyed at a juggling clown and a trained dog act, and sang and danced to the tunes of a western-style band. This was punctuated by all the cake and soft drinks they could do away with as they participated in a jamboree to launch the 10th season of the camping program of the Ceneral Labor Council's Community Services Committee.

The children, some of more than 500 who attended camps in 1960 by referral of the committee, were brought together to initiate the registration for the 1961 season and to publicize the information that camping opportunities are available at low cost to the children of Gotham's union members.

Camping subcommittee chairman Sam Kovenetsky, who heads Local 1-S of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Workers, was master of ceremonies for the proceedings and welcomed the children and their parents. He also introduced Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the Central Labor Council, and Michael Sampson, chairman of the body's Community Services Committee.

First Reunion

"This is the first jamboree, or camping reunion, we've had," Kovenetsky said, "and from the way everyone is enjoying it, the next one will be bigger and better."

Van Arsdale praised the work of the subcommittee and explained that many children would not have the opportunity for camping vacations without the devoted cooperation of the members of the group and of the Community Services Committee.

Many local union officials attended to welcome the members and their offspring.

Participating in the jamboree were Margie Coate, Al Knopf and Katharine Jizi, of AGVA and Musicians' Union Local 802; Sam Heller of Retail Clerks' Local 150, which along with American Bakery and Confectionery Local 405, supplied the cake and soft drinks; Charles Cresanti of Textile Workers Union of America, New York Joint Board, which supplied the hall; and Bunny Connoly, camp program coordinator.

Consumers League Asks Aid to Farm Workers

The National Consumers League, outlining its policy for the coming year in the wake of its annual meeting, pledged full support to the Kennedy Administration's priority anti-recession program and proposed an added point: action to aid farm workers.

Sen. Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.), addressing the League's meeting, forecast "a bitter fight" but final passage by Congress this year of the Kennedy program of aid to depressed areas, medical aid for the aged under social security, a housing bill, federal aid to education and an improved federal wage-hour law.

Metcalf scorched the former Eisenhower Administration for leaving the nation in what it called "a rosy situation" when unemployment and jobless pay exhaustions had risen so sharply. Metcalf forecast permanent improvements in the jobless pay system in this session.

The league's directors proposed "the reform of Public Law 78, the enactment of a federal minimum wage for farm workers and the protection of their right to bargain collectively." Under Public Law 78, some 440,000 Mexican nationals (braceros) are imported each year for work on corporate farms.

Mrs. Esther Peterson, assistant to the Secretary of Labor and director of the Women's Bureau, told the delegates that "the New Frontier is a moving frontier which seeks to meet the problems we anticipate as well as those we know that exist."

"Action is necessary," Mrs. Peterson declared, "vigorous action that is aimed at unemployment, ill health, hunger and distress at home.

"Work is needed to provide consumer protection, to deal with the hazards of radiation, to meet the problems of automation."

Mrs. Peterson, a member of the league for many years and a former labor lobbyist and workers' education leader, reviewed the economic situation and the proposed remedial legislation to deal with low-wage groups, depressed areas and the elderly.

The conference also heard a discussion of "citizen action to support New Frontier programs" by three Washington veterans, warning that public support was needed by Kennedy. They were Hyman H. Bookbinder, AFL-CIO legislative representative; Benjamin H. Read, legislative aide to Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) and Joseph L. Rauh, attorney and vice-chairman of Americans for Democratic Action.

In its statement of policy for the coming year, the league's directors called for increased safeguards against the dangers of atomic radiation and for greater consumer protection.

Texas Labor Fights For Migrant Unit

Austin, Tex.—The Texas State AFL-CIO has strongly protested a move in the state legislature to deny operating funds to the Texas Council on Migrant Labor and, in effect, "destroy that agency."

Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown and Sec.-Treas. Fred H. Schmidt, in protesting to the Senate Finance Subcommittee, expressed "amazement" at the action of the Legislative Budget Board.

Observing that the council operated on an appropriation of only $10,000 this year, Brown and Schmidt said they "could not help but marvel that $50,404 is recommended to establish a quail hatchery while many of our 105,000 Texas migrants live in housing not fit for animal habitation."

Election Set to Fill House Vacancy

Tucson, Ariz.—Democratic and Republican party primaries will be held Mar. 7, with a special election May 2, to fill the 2nd Congressional District seat left vacant when Stewart L. Udall (D) resigned to become Secretary of the Interior. The dates were set by Gov. Paul Fannin (R).

Seven Democrats running for the House seat include Morris K. Udall, a Tucson lawyer and brother of the Cabinet member; William F. Hendrix of Tucson, a vocational agriculture teacher; H. Earl Rogge, Jr., a Tucson lawyer; former Rep. Harold A. Patten; and William Netherton, James Carreon and Jay Bateman.

Mac C. Matheson, whom Udall defeated last November by a vote of 95,000 to 75,000, is expected to be unopposed in the Republican primary.

Employes Left Behind As Firm Shifts Plant

Muncie, Ind.—A long struggle by the Auto Workers to keep open the 43-year-old Acme-Lees plant here has ended in a management decision to move the plant, but not its 135 workers to Cullman, Ala.

When the members of UAW Local 459 asked the right to move with the job, management said only resident help would be hired in the Alabama city. The effect will be to kill the local as well as the members' jobs.

Average age of the Acme-Lees workers is 54. Some employes have never worked in any other plant. One of the veterans is Andy Chandler, tool and die heat-treat man who helped produce parts for the old Star and Durant auto before the union was organized 24 years ago.

Dir. Ray Berndt of UAW Region 3, who will pay the final bills as administrator of Local 459, recalled this bit of recent history:

During 1958 contract negotiations, management said employes would have to take a wage cut and increase production to keep the company in a "competitive position." Workers took cuts of $40 to $60 a week and speeded up production standards as much as 100 percent on some jobs.

Management continued to lose money, and production standards were increased again. The decision to move, the UAW said, resulted from too much high-priced managerial help and outdated production methods.

GE's Cordiner Resigns as Head Of Business Advisory Council

Ralph Cordiner, board chairman of General Electric, has resigned as head of the Commerce Dept.'s Business Advisory Council in the face of sharp criticism arising out of his company's admitted criminal anti-trust law violations.

Cordiner said he resigned so that he could devote his full time to the affairs of GE whose president, Robert Paxton, suddenly retired because of ill health.

Meanwhile the problems of GE's top management were compounded on two fronts—threatened damage suits by purchasers of heavy electrical equipment during the period covered by the anti-trust indictments, and union demands—to be aired at a stockholders' meeting—that the company clean house of executives involved in the conspiracy.

Legal officials from 60 large cities, at a meeting in Washington, D. C., set up a committee to explore the possibility of a combined multi-million dollar civil damage suit against the 29 electrical manufacturers involved in the price-fixing and rigged bids conspiracy. Purchasers are entitled to recover triple damages for overpayments resulting from the anti-trust law violations.

Justice Dept. to Aid Cities

Chicago's corporation counsel, John C. Melaniphy, who heads the committee, said Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy has promised to make available documentary evidence uncovered in the government's investigation of the conspiracy.

Melaniphy told newsmen that one of the city officials present at the conference reported that General Electric representatives have applied "pressure" in an effort to forestall an anti-trust suit. He did not identify the city.

Cordiner and others in the GE top echelon face the annual meeting of GE stockholders Apr. 26 at Syracuse, N. Y.

On the agenda are four proposals submitted by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—which holds GE stock through the union's pension fund—calling for:

- Dismissal of GE officials guilty of violating anti-trust laws.
- A suit by the company to recover damages from officials responsible for illegal acts resulting in fines against the company or damages paid to customers.
- Repayment by guilty officials of bonuses and stock options given them by the company.
- Formation of an impartial committee to determine whether Cordiner or any other director or officer of the company "reasonably" should have been aware of the illegal conspiracy.

While Cordiner disavowed knowledge of the anti-trust violations and said they were against expressed company policy, U.S. Dist. Judge J. Cullen Ganey, who sentenced the 29 companies and 44 individual defendants, said it would be "most naive indeed" to believe that top officials of the companies were unaware of the conspiracy.

In other development, individual stockholders of both GE and Westinghouse have sued the companies, 36 GE directors and officers and 32 Westinghouse officials, demanding that the company executives be held personally responsible for company expenses arising out of the anti-trust violations.

Carey Had Asked Ouster

IUE Pres. James B. Carey, a week before Cordiner's resignation as Business Advisory Council chairman, had called on Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges to strip the council of the advisory functions if it failed to oust Cordiner. He also said the council, a continuing blue-ribbon group of the nation's big business executives, should remove from membership representatives of all of the companies involved in the conspiracy.

Hodges had said earlier that it would be up to the advisory council itself whether Cordiner should continue as chairman. In announcing his resignation as chairman, Cordiner said he will continue as a member of the advisory council.

Pulp-Sulphite, IWA Discuss Merger Plan

Portland, Ore.—The current status of merger talks between the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers and the Woodworkers has been discussed at special regional meetings held here and in Vancouver, British Columbia.

Woodworkers' Pres. A. F. Hartung and Pulp-Sulphite Vice Pres. S. A. Stephens, who headed their respective union delegations at the two meetings, said the sessions were designed to explain the progress achieved to date to members in the two areas most vitally concerned with merger.

The meetings, held in the two centers with the largest concentrations of Pulp-Sulphite and IWA members, constituted another step in the implementation of a 10-point working agreement that has been in effect for several years, Hartung and Stephens said in a joint announcement.

IUE Locals Face Charge by NLRB

Six local unions of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have been charged with unfair labor practices on the basis of complaints by the General Electric Co. against IUE pickets for disorders alleged to have occurred during the GE strike last October.

The National Labor Relations Board set Mar. 20 for a hearing on complaints of picket line disorders filed by GE against two Schenectady locals of IUE, and Mar. 27 for hearing a complaint against IUE Local 320 of Syracuse, N. Y.

A complaint by the latter local that GE had threatened employes with disciplinary measures, suspended union members without cause and offered inducements to employes crossing picket lines was dismissed by the Buffalo regional office of NLRB.

GE complaints against IUE Locals 254 and 255 of Pittsfield, Mass., will be heard Mar. 20, and against Local 201 of Lynn, Mass., on Mar. 23.

By Rejecting Panel Report:

GE Seen Fomenting Atomic Plant Strike

By Eugene A. Kelly

Richland, Wash.—Charging the General Electric Co. with fomenting a strike at the $1 billion Hanford Atomic Products plant here by refusing to accept the recommendations of a presidential panel, 19 unions representing 3,200 production and maintenance workers have asked the White House to persuade GE, the government contractor here, to accept the proposals.

Warning that the Hanford Atomic Metal Trades Council may be forced to strike Mar. 14, Pres. James A. Brownlow of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. asked Pres. John F. Kennedy for "immediate and appropriate action" to have GE comply with the recommendations of an Atomic Energy labor-management relations panel to settle a dispute over contract terms.

Unions have agreed to accept all panel recommendations including those adverse to the unions, but GE has declined to accede to the recommendations, the council charges.

"Our men do not wish to strike at Hanford," Brownlow told the President. "They have indicated a complete willingness to settle this long-standing bargaining dispute wholly on the basis of the panel's settlement recommendations.

"Unless prompt presidential intervention succeeds in bringing General Electric to a willingness to accept this settlement, our members appear to have no alternative but to strike to achieve a satisfactory settlement."

No Strikes Here

The Hanford plant makes plutonium for the AEC, with GE the plant operator. Since the Metal Trades Council won representation rights in 1949, there never has been a strike at Hanford, the council said.

Meanwhile residents of the plant area—Richland, Pasco and Kennewick—signed petitions asking for settlement on the basis of panel recommendations. The petitions, with 4,550 signatures, were sent to Senators Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) and Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) asking the senators to intervene.

Cyrus S. Ching, former head of the federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, is chairman of the Atomic Energy labor-management relations panel. He named four members to review the facts and make recommendations—O. S. Colclough, R. W. Fleming, Charles O. Gregory and Russell A. Smith.

The panel stepped into the dispute last Oct. 25 when GE and the unions were unable to agree on terms of a new contract. It recommended these contract changes:

- A three-year agreement effective Oct. 3, 1960.
- A 3 percent increase, effective Oct. 3, 1960, of the paid salary rate then existing, in line with the company's offer to the unions; in addition, the unions should have the option of a 4 percent increase effective Apr. 2, 1962, or a wage reopener in March 1962.
- An increase in the shift differential to 21 cents as of Oct. 3, 1960, and an additional increase to 22 cents effective Apr. 2, 1962.
- An increase in paid holidays to eight as of Jan. 1, 1961.

The panel urged the council to drop its demand for time and a half pay, plus holiday allowance for holidays worked; improvements in vacation allowances, sick leave, safety committees, and a new article providing a joint committee to study apprentice training programs.

Panel members also suggested that eight other proposed contract changes be withdrawn and later made six supplemental recommendations which the unions accepted.

The Metal Trades Council listed 10 recommendations which the unions accepted though they represented victory for GE's viewpoint; nine recommendations in line with the union viewpoint; no recommendations in line with union proposals accepted by management unconditionally.

The council said in a public statement:

"The fundamental Hanford question is thus posed. Should GE's private policies, conceived by a corporate few in support of wholly private purposes, prevail over public policies established by the President of the United States?

"We are asserting that the public interest demands supremacy. The government simply cannot promote a presidential process for peaceful settlement of atomic energy labor disputes at government plants and, at the same time, financially subsidize a private corporation in its efforts to avoid such a presidential process and render it useless."

Labor Battles for Schools in Louisiana

Wages Historic Fight In New Orleans Case

The following report was written by Ed Lashman, assistant editor of the Union News, publication of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers:

Virtually the only voice of reason in Louisiana today is the voice of the labor movement. The New Orleans school crisis involving the token integration of two elementary schools under order of the federal courts has produced strident opposites of opinion that leave practically no room for a logical approach to other problems.

If the city police work at maintaining law and order while hysterical harridans shriek imprecations at the pitifully few six-year-old girls being escorted into school by U.S. marshals, they are considered all-out integrationists.

If a parent voices the opinion that he would prefer to maintain the pattern of segregation but believes survival of the public schools is more important, he is either a segregationist or an integrationist, depending on the extreme view held by another parent.

City Is Calm

Actually the city is calm except for the pockets of passion in the areas immediately surrounding the two schools affected by a combination of the court order and the Louisiana Pupil Placement Law which resulted in the admission last November of four little girls into the first-grade classes in Frantz and McDonough No. 19 schools.

But the embers are smoldering, ready to be fanned into flame in an instant. On these, well-organized White Citizens Councils constantly blow the breath of hate.

For, make no mistake, there is a substantial force at work to close the public schools of New Orleans, and eventually all of Louisiana, rather than permit one Negro child to go to school with whites.

Tragically, this feeling has found particular focus in the areas of two schools involved—working class neighborhoods where the parents feel they cannot afford the expensive alternative of sending their children to private schools and so must fight to maintain segregated public schools

Inflamed by Legislature

The final aggravation frustrating any effort at moderation has been the fact that the Louisiana legislature has been called into several consecutive inflammatory special sessions by Gov. Jimmie Davis—one-time singer of songs and author of "You Are My Sunshine," and now a latter-day Orval Faubus.

This, then, is the situation in which the Louisiana labor movement found itself when it felt compelled to support labor's historic hundred-year fight for free, public education. It took no stand on the issue of segregation versus integration, and even today takes no such stand.

The issue is simple, leaders of the Louisiana State Labor Council and the New Orleans Central Labor Council say. Free, public education is essential to the welfare of working people and has historically been urged and defended by trade unionists. In this crisis in New Orleans, they are suddenly on the front line of that fight again. And they are sticking to their guns regardless of segregation or integration, refusing to be sidetracked.

Way back on Aug. 18 of last year, the New Orleans Central Labor Council adopted a resolution clearly stating its position, reaffirming its stand for "open public schools, offering equal educational opportunity to all, versus closed public schools with educational opportunity denied to all except those whose financial status permits the expensive luxury of paying the bill for already overburdened private school facilities."

The labor council saw the dangers in the crisis clearly and spelled them out dramatically: delaying of education for all, interruption for some who would never resume it, a rising tide of delinquency, the disadvantages to New Orleans school children unable to compete successfully with youngsters in other sections of the nation, the impossibility of producing Louisiana's share of badly needed technicians and scientists in the cold war, the loss of some $28,000,000 in trade spent by the Orleans Parish (county) school system, the loss of a corps of trained and dedicated teachers, the possible loss of accreditation of state public schools thus denying college opportunity to Louisiana children, the strangling of new industrial expansion.

So the council called on the public, the press, civic and trade groups and members of the legislature to join in urging the Governor to keep public schools open.

The resolution was overwhelmingly adopted, though there have been some strong criticisms and letters of protest. Council Pres. Pat Stoddard (member of the Typographical Union) shrugs philosophically because this is to be expected. He sticks doggedly to his guns: The labor movement is for public education and that's the ground on which he'll fight. Forever, if need be.

On Nov. 16, after literal rioting in the streets, the New Orleans Central Labor Council issued a public statement appealing to members and their families and the public to maintain peace and calm in the school crisis. Stoddard's statement commended the police and offered the hope that union members would not subject police officers to abuse for doing their duty to maintain order.

The council also supported a statement calling for orderly behavior issued by some 100 community organizations and then adopted other resolutions commending the mayor and the police and calling on the legislature to consider the harm caused by not paying school board employes their salaries.

Perhaps the most serious crisis for the labor movement came when Gov. Davis initiated action for a 1-cent sales tax increase and tied it to a need for new money to finance grants-in-aid to parents who wanted to send their children to private, segregated schools.

PAT STODDARD, New Orleans Central Labor Council president, who has led fight to save public school system.

Here was the most serious test for the Louisiana State Labor Council. Again, labor found it had a traditional position to support—basic opposition to any form of regressive taxation. Yet here, again, they found themselves assailed by the opponents of integration.

In fact, State Labor Council Pres. Victor Bussie (member of the Fire Fighters) pointed out, the council lost two affiliates during the fight. One local union disaffiliated because it felt the council was supporting integration, and one local union disaffiliated because it felt the council's stand was segregationist.

Bussie can chuckle about this and say it shows how straight down the middle the council's position is, but it is a clear indication of the pressures of the situation. Bussie tells of legislators showing telegrams and letters from union members urging votes for the sales tax increase.

Time after time as Bussie testified on behalf of the Louisiana State Labor Council in opposition to the sales tax increase, legislators tried to discredit him and force him to state his personal views on the issue of segregation versus integration.

But Bussie maintained successfully that his personal views were not at issue. "I am testifying as president of the Louisiana State Labor Council and all I will discuss is the official position of the council," he insisted to one committee member.

The council has consistently taken the position that it is for free public education. It has opposed legislative action to remove from office Orleans Parish school board members and employes. It has supported the continuance of the free text book and free lunch programs.

And its greatest triumph was the defeat of the sales tax increase in the state Senate after it had been adopted in the House of Representatives.

Despite the fact that the Louisiana constitution requires a two-thirds vote on tax measures, this was no mean achievement considering the passions of the school crisis, a deeply ingrained corruption in Louisiana politics, and substantial blandishments available to the governor helping him to influence legislators to vote for the tax.

Actually the State Labor Council was the only organization out front fighting the sales tax increase. "We didn't have the votes ourselves," Bussie said, "but we were able to give leadership and we helped focus opposition to it from many groups and individuals."

LOUISIANA STATE LABOR COUNCIL helped fight off higher state sales tax proposal linked to segregated schools battle. Left to right, seated: Sec.-Treas. E. J. Bourg, Pres. Victor Bussie and K. G. Flory, Dept. of Legislative and Political Activities. Standing: Jack McCarthy, public relations director, Vice Presidents Leroy Landry and Louis Sahuque; C. M. Shaw, former vice president.

One other problem faced by Louisiana labor in the sales tax fight was the threat of an effort to reinstate the Louisiana "right-to-work" law which labor successfully fought to have repealed several years ago.

Not only did this not deter the State Labor Council in its fight, but Bussie reports that many legislators who were for the open shop law in the past, also worked with labor against the sales tax and vowed they would never support R-T-W as a punitive measure.

A further gain has been the promise of future opposition to R-T-W by many business leaders who came to have new respect and understanding of Louisiana labor in the sales tax fight.

What effect the defeat of the sales tax increase will have on the fight to continue segregation remains to be seen. Many people who opposed it are clearly for segregated schools. There was also much question about the financial condition of Gov. Davis's administration and much suspicion that the tax was needed to bail him out even more than it was to finance private, segregated education.

Two things, however, are certain. Loss of the sales tax revenue does help in the fight to keep public schools open. And Louisiana labor can take quiet pride in the fact that it would not be deterred from fighting for the best interests of its membership and the public generally despite the emotional pressures generated by the New Orleans crisis.

That it won the first battles in that continuing war is a tribute to the skills of its leaders and to the substantial broad-based community support it has developed by patient, reasoned advocacy of its positions.

Management Urged to Back Extended Benefits

St. Louis—The Kennedy Administration's bill to extend jobless benefits would help bolster the economy until an expected spring upturn and management would be making a mistake to oppose the legislation, Assistant Sec. of Labor James J. Reynolds declared here.

Reynolds, a former corporation vice president, was the featured speaker at a banquet climaxing a labor-management conference sponsored jointly by AFL-CIO Region XV, the Industrial Relations Club of Greater St. Louis and Washington University.

Reynolds told some 300 delegates that the Kennedy Administration recognizes the national economy is in "serious difficulty" and has framed immediate and long-run programs.

Unemployment compensation over the years "has served management very well" by boosting purchasing power and in turn increasing production, he said. The extension of jobless pay would pump nearly $1 billion into the economy, Reynolds emphasized, and would help "get us over the hump by spring."

Delmond Garst, AFL-CIO regional director, cautioned at an earlier session that "the problem of the unemployed will not end" with the end of the current recession.

Fewer Workers Needed

"The history of each recession in the machine age," Garst said, "is that when it ended, new techniques of production were introduced which required less manpower."

The present recession, he warned, will have a "much more severe impact on the workers" than in past periods because of the rapidity with which industry is converting to automated production here and abroad, the application of automation to white-collar fields and the rapidly-growing work force.

Garst pointed out that 65 percent more cars can be produced today with no more workers than were employed in 1947. In the chemical industry, he added, production rose 27 percent from 1956 to 1960 and the work force shrank by 14,000.

"Industry and the workers are, in a sense, riding in the same boat," Garst commented in urging a joint approach to ease the impact of the new technology. He warned the next 10 or 20 years could mean "vast social and economic disruption" or greatness.

Federal Aid Urged

James W. Click, director of District 8 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, told a panel session that the federal government should aid labor and management in retraining and relocating workers displaced by automation and help create jobs in hard-hit areas.

John Crane, Rexall Drug Co. labor relations director and president of the sponsoring employer group, pointed out that the St. Louis area has been at a standstill of about 800,000 jobs—the same total it had in 1949.

'Right-to-Work' Bill Rejected in New Mexico

Sante Fe, N. Mex.—The New Mexico House, by voice vote, shouted down a so-called "right-to-work" amendment to the state constitution and then went on to pass labor-backed minimum wage and mine safety bills.

The House killed the "work" proposal, which would have put the amendment on a referendum ballot at the next general election, by adopting an adverse report of the Labor Committee.

Although New Mexico voters, in a 1948 referendum, rejected a constitutional ban on the union shop, each session of the legislature has seen renewed efforts by business groups to push through a "work" law.

The House gave 49-to-11 approval to a Senate passed minimum wage bill which will raise the general wage floor from the present 75 cents an hour to $1. Workers who receive part of their income through tips remain at a 65-cent floor, but other service workers will have their minimum raised from 65 cents to 80 cents over a nine-month period. Their minimum goes up by 5-cent steps every three months. The Senate is expected to concur in minor amendments made by the House.

Supporters of the bill defeated, by a 38-22 vote, a labor-opposed amendment which would have stretched out the raise in the service-workers minimum by requiring a six-month wait before each 5-cent step-up.

The mine safety bill, establishing a five-member state mining board to enforce safety measures, passed the House by a 38-26 vote after having apparently been killed earlier that same day on a 30-30 tie vote.

One of the representatives who had voted against the bill in the morning session switched and moved for reconsideration. The House agreed, on a 36-27 vote to take up again the operator-opposed safety measure. The Senate has not yet acted on the proposal.

Housing Discrimination Barred in Pennsylvania

Harrisburg, Pa.—The Pennsylvania legislature has passed, and Gov. David L. Lawrence (D) has signed, a labor-backed bill barring discrimination in the sale, rental or financing of housing because of race, color, religion or national origin.

The bill converts the Pennsylvania Fair Employment Practices Commission, which is headed by State AFL-CIO Co-Pres. Harry Boyer, into a Human Relations Commission responsible for ensuring compliance with all of the state's anti-discrimination laws.

In addition to enforcement of housing and employment equal rights laws, the Human Relations Commission will also take over the administration of the state's Public Accommodations Act. Previously no state agency had responsibility for enforcing this law, which requires that all public accommodations be offered without discrimination.

House Republicans were rebuffed in attempts to add eight amendments to the bill weakening its impact and extending exemptions. As passed, by a vote of 121 to 76, the only exceptions are for owner-occupied single houses and duplexes in which the apartment is used by the owner as a residence. The law has a strict enforcement provision and permits the Human Relations Commission to initiate investigations without waiting for a complaint to be filed.

Boyer, who was recently reappointed to another five-year term on the Pennsylvania FEPC, which he has headed since its creation in 1956, described the new measure as "an extremely good bill."

The campaign for the anti-discrimination measure was spearheaded by the Pennsylvania Equal Rights Council, made up of labor, religious and community groups. Roland Sawyer, housing consultant for the Steelworkers served as campaign director, assisted by Steelworkers' Civil Rights Dir. Frank Shane and legislative representatives of other AFL-CIO unions.

In signing the bill, Lawrence predicted it will have "an enduring effect in helping to eliminate widespread deterioration of available housing for those who are discriminated against."

He said dropping of racial barriers which have bred overcrowded slums will alleviate the state's economic and social problems. The new law is effective Sept. 1, 1961.

Engineers Back on All But Western

Striking members of the Flight Enginers have returned to work at five airlines but continued their walkout against a sixth as a three-man commission named by Pres. John F. Kennedy prepared to hold hearings and issue recommendations.

The engineers called off their strike against the five airlines when management agreed to recall them and resume flying service during a 90-day period which the President gave the commission to assemble the facts. The three fact-finders are Prof. Nathan Feinsinger, chairman; Prof. Richard Lester and Prof. J. Keith Mann.

Western A Holdout

The strike started Feb. 18 against Pan American World Airways and spread to other lines—American, Eastern, National, Trans World and Western. Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg got all parties except Western to agree to a 90-day truce. Western said it had fired all Flight Engineers and would resume flying after training pilots to qualify as engineers.

Goldberg said the strike was caused by the fear of FEIA members that a National Mediation Board decision on United Air Lines would jeopardize their seniority status and their union's bargaining rights.

Meanwhile Kennedy named a separate three-member emergency board to investigate a strike involving 260 Machinists who work as flight engineers on Northwest Airlines. These board members have 30 days to make a recommendation: Prof. Paul Guthrie of the University of North Carolina, chairman; Benjamin Aaron, University of California at Los Angeles; Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., attorney.

The IAM withdrew its picket lines when the presidential order was issued but said management has recalled few of the 260 strikers or 2,500 locked-out mechanics and ground service workers.

In a telegram, IAM Pres. Al J. Hayes told the emergency board it cannot hold hearings until all parties to the dispute are in compliance with the Railway Labor Act and the presidential order establishing the board. Northwest is not in compliance, Hayes said, because it has failed to return all IAM members to their former status.

The Railway Labor Act and the executive order require that the status quo be maintained during a 30-day period while the board is holding hearings, and for 30 days afterward.

Despite Medical Price Rise:

Living Costs Show First Dip in Year

By Robert B. Cooney

The Nation's cost of living declined slightly in January, marking the first decrease in retail prices since January 1960, the government has reported.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported the Consumer Price Index dipped by 0.1 percent between December and Jnuary to 127.4. This means the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.74.

An accompanying report showed that factory workers' spendable earnings—that is, take-home pay—remained unchanged between December and January. But, the report disclosed, since January a year ago spendable earnings fell about 2.5 percent due to reduced hours of work and worker purchasing power was sliced about 4 percent due to the higher cost of living.

"Every major group, except medical care, either declined or was unchanged over the period," the monthly report noted.

The decline in the overall index was caused primarily by sharp price cuts in women's and girls' coats and women's suits—reflecting end-of-season sales; by a more than seasonal decline in used car prices; and by lower prices for eggs, fresh tomatoes, fresh fruits and fresh milk.

Hospital Costs Up

"The medical care index rose by 0.3 percent, primarily as a result of higher rates for hospitalization and surgical insurance and hospital rooms. Small scattered increases were also noted for professional services," the report said.

Robrt J. Myers, deputy commissioner of labor statistics, cautioned reporters that the medical care index is not weighted heavily enough to have much of an impact on the overall price level.

The medical care index has outrun every other sub-group in the over-the-year increases.

The January CPI, at 127.4, is 1.6 percent higher than January a year ago.

The medical care index is 3.3 percent higher now than a year ago. In breaking down this category, Myers reported these over-the-year rises: hospitalization insurance, up 8.8 percent; surgical insurance, up 3.2 percent; hospital room rates, up 5.9 percent; professional services, up 2.6 percent and prescriptions and drugs, up 1.3 percent. The last-named item has decreased for the past five months.

Myers said of the span of recent months that "in retrospect this will look like a fairly stable period."

Few Wage Adjustments

On cost-of-living adjustments, the wages of 1 million workers in the auto and related products industires and in some farm equipment firms will remain unchanged since the quarterly rise compares January's 127.4 to October's 127.3.

However, some 61,000 workers will receive increases. A different formula will bring a quarterly hike of 1 cent an hour to most of them. Several thousand truckers in Virginia and the Carolinas will get two-cent increases on a semi-annual adjustment.

Some 12,000 employes of the Chicago Transit Authority will have their wages reduced by one-half cent an hour because of a drop in that city's CPI.

The accompanying report showed that factory workers' spendable earnings "were steady and buying power was virtually unchanged" between December and January.

Spendable earnings—which means take-home pay after deduction of social security and federal income taxes—were $79.97 for a factory worker with three dependents and $72.44 for a worker without dependents, the same as in December.

The report said earnings normally drop back in January from "overtime-heightened" levels of December. But this time, the report explained, December earnings were down due to severe snowstorms cutting hours of work.

For 1960 as a whole, the report continued, spendable earnings averaged $81.05 for a worker with three dependents and $73.49 for a worker without dependents, nearly one percent higher than in 1959.

But "real" spendable earnings —after take-home pay is deflated by increases in the cost of living —reduced worker purchasing power by about one-half percent below 1959, the report said.

"Real" spendable earnings in 1960 averaged $64.07 for a worker with three dependents or 124 percent of the 1947-49 average which is used as the base period.

Jobless Benefit Rolls Highest in History

The number of workers drawing unemployment compensation soared to a record high of 3.4 million in early February, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Twenty-nine states showed increases, with Wisconsin, Virginia, Maryland, New York, Missouri and Pennsylvania experiencing the sharpest rises.

The new record of 3.4 million was for the week ending Feb. 11, a boost of 32,200 over the previous record the week before. The 8.4 percent rate equaled the previous record rate of April 1958 and compared to 5.6 percent of those eligible or 2.3 million drawing benefits a year ago.

Shoe Union Wins Raise for 10,000

Haverhill, Mass.—Locals of the United Shoe Workers in northeast Massachusetts recently voted to ratify a uniform area-wide contract benefiting 10,000 workers in 45 factories making women's novelty footwear.

Agreement on the two-year contract was reached with employer representatives just before a deadline that threatened to produce the first area-wide strike since 1943. A short walkout in a dozen factories preceded a settlement by all the employers in less than a day, USWA Sec.-Treas. Angelo Georgian said.

Forty-four shops in seven communities agreed to a wage increase of 5 cents an hour effective Jan. 1, 1961; another 3 cents to be paid into a pension fund next Jan. 1; two consecutive weeks of vacation every July; liberalized insurance, vacation and holiday benefits, and a minimum wage of $1.26 an hour for learners.

USWA Pres. George Fecteau headed the union negotiators.

In 4 L-G Rulings:

Labor Board Bars Picketing by Unions

The National Labor Relations Board, applying the Landrum-Griffin Act's restrictions on picketing to four precedent-setting cases, has ruled against the unions in all instances.

The board handed down interpretations in various circumstances of the 1959 labor law amendments imposing restrictions on recognition or organizational picketing unless the union petitions for a board election within 30 days.

So-called "informational" picketing is permitted, but the meaning of the permission remains unclear.

These were the cases:

● Hod Carriers Local 840 and Blinne Construction Co., Kansas City, Kan. Union picketing here protested alleged unfair labor practices by the company.

● Hotel and Restaurant Workers Local 681 and Crown Cafeteria and Peter W. Irwin, Long Beach, Calif. The union's picketing appealed to customers not to patronize the non-union cafeteria.

● Hotel and Restaurant Workers Locals 89 and 1 and the Stork Club Restaurant in New York City. The board said this involved publicity picketing and stoppage of deliveries.

● Teamsters Local 705 and Cartage and Terminal Management Corp., Chicago. This involved the issue of whether a union had a right to picket to require an employer to hire his predecessor's employes.

In the Blinne case, the Hod Carriers sought recognition from a subcontractor on the basis of union designation cards from all the employer's three laborers. Blinne rejected the demand, the board said, and transferred one worker. The union filed unfair labor practice charges and picketed with "unfair" signs for over 30 days without filing for an election.

The NLRB, by a 4-to-1 decision, ruled that the new law permits only a "currently certified" union to engage in recognition picketing. The union contended that picketing by a majority union, though uncertified, was not unlawful.

The majority of Chairman Boyd Leedom and Members Philip Ray Rodgers, Joseph Alton Jenkins and Arthur A. Kimball rejected the union's argument that Blinne's alleged unfair labor practice excused the picketing.

Fanning Dissents

Member John H. Fanning sharply dissented, saying that Blinne's transferral of the worker "for the avowed purpose of destroying" the union majority prevented a test of the union's right to recognition and lawful picketing. He said the board should have taken up instead the employer conduct, arguing Congress could not have intended "so incongruous and meaningless" a restriction as the majority decided.

In the Crown Cafeteria case, the board said the Hotel and Restaurant Workers lacked a majority of the employes, but picketed when the cafeteria opened in May 1959, and later picketed during dining hours with signs describing the place as "non-union" and unfair.

The majority of Leedom, Rodgers and Kimball overturned the trial examiner's finding that the picketing was protected since it did not stop deliveries.

The majority held that the picketing involved recognition or organizational purposes and that the ban on such picketing is "particularly applicable" where a union does not represent a majority.

Jenkins and Fanning, dissenting, argued that the "informational" proviso was intended to apply to recognition or organizational picketing.

In the Stork Club case, the Hotel and Restaurant Workers began organizing late in 1956. In January 1957, Stork fired several workers. Two union locals demanded reinstatement and a contract, claiming the allegiance of 80 of the 100 employes. Stork refused and there began three years of interrupted picketing, with the case in and out of state and federal courts.

An NLRB four-member majority ruled the union's picketing from Nov. 13, 1959, to Jan. 15, 1960, involved a recognition purpose and violated the law. The Landrum-Griffin restrictions went into effect Nov. 13. Even without a recognition demand, the picketing after Jan. 15 "seriously interfered" with deliveries, the board said, adding that the Stork Club manager was uncontradicted in testimony that "we had to buy two trucks and hire truckdrivers and pick things up all over town."

In the Cartage and Terminal Management case, the employer began handling local Chicago pick-up and delivery for Riss, an interstate motor freight carrier, using the Riss terminal as headquarters.

Riss had a contract with the Teamsters; Cartage and Terminal discussed with the union a pact covering the new operation; the union insisted on a wage guarantee from Riss. Cartage and Terminal then hired its own workers instead of the former Riss employes and the union picketed with "strike" signs.

The four-member NLRB majority rejected the union argument that the dispute was over job terms and conditions merely because recognition had once been offered.

Member Kimball, in dissent, argued that the wrong provision of the law was being applied, that the picketing as an alleged violation of the law fell under another provision of Taft-Hartley.

Wage, Fringe Gains Won by IAM at United

Bomb insurance of $100,000 for each of the 9,000 Machinists at United Air Lines installations is included in a new contract on which IAM members are balloting at 30 air terminals.

In 10 months of negotiations, union and management representatives agreed on these major features of an 18-month agreement:

● Raises ranging from 11 to 15 cents an hour, retroactive to Dec. 1, for hourly rated members, who now get from $1.65 to $3.20 an hour; increases of $19.25 to $24.25 a month, effective Apr. 1, for guards now getting $346.50 to $386.50 a month.

● Paid vacations ranging up to 3 weeks after 10 years, 4 weeks after 20 years on the job, in place of the present limit, 3 weeks after 12 years.

● Payment by the company of half of the cost of sickness and accident insurance, instead of the present one-quarter of the cost.

The contract also gives employes the right to refuse to work in a bomb scare area, and increases shift premiums by 2 and 3 cents an hour, according to J. L. Reeves of Burlingame, Calif., general chairman of IAM Dist. 141.

ARGENTINE union leaders visited AFL-CIO headquarters on a recent trip to the United States. They were welcomed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, seated right, and Serafino Romualdi, AFL-CIO inter-American representative, left. Standing are Henry Rutz, AFL-CIO international representative; Hector Nobile, Commercial Employes; Oscar Rubilar, Transport Workers; Carlos Conde de Cons, Oil Workers; Fernando Daimasso, Public Service Union; Hugo Mancinelli, Railway Workers.

NLRB Reopens Case Involving Jurisdiction

The National Labor Relations Board has set aside a five-month-old decision and reopened a case in line with a recent Supreme Court ruling which ordered the board to decide which union gets the work in a jurisdictional dispute.

The board acted on the first motion filed since the high court's decision of Jan. 9. The case involves Safeway Stores, Inc., trucking operations at Wilmington, Del., and Locals 107, 639 and 660 of the Teamsters.

The board said that Local 107 struck and picketed after Safeway rearranged its operations to have drivers of Locals 639 at Landover, Md., and 660 at Kearney, N. J., transport meat products from Wilmington for sale in the Washington and New York areas.

The NLRB remanded the case to its Philadelphia regional office for hearings to gather more evidence on which group is entitled to the work "consistent with the principles" of the high court's decision.

In its Jan. 9 decision, the Supreme Court unanimously decided that the NLRB must rule which union is entitled to the work when it considers an unfair labor practice charge growing out of an inter-union jurisdictional dispute.

Involved TV Dispute

That case involved a 1957 dispute in which the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Theatrical Stage Employes both claimed jurisdiction to do the lighting for a show planned by the Columbia Broadcasting System.

The NLRB ruled that IBEW could not require CBS to give the lighting contract to IBEW members rather than to CBS stagehands who belonged to IATSE.

The board added, however, that its ruling was not to be interpreted as assigning the work to IATSE. The Supreme Court said the board must make an affirmative decision on precisely that point.

The court said the Taft-Hartley Act requires the NLRB to decide such a dispute affirmatively on its merits unless there is a voluntary means to adjust the issue and the employer and labor groups agree to be bound by it.

The National Joint Board for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes in the Construction Industry —made up of contractor groups and AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. unions under an elected chairman—was cited as an example of a voluntary approach on which the board might rely.

The board said that, prior to the Supreme Court's January decision, it held generally that an employer was free to make work assignments without strike pressure by a union, with two main exceptions. One exception would be if an employer was evading his board-certified union in assigning work; the other would be where an employer was bound by agreement to assign disputed work to the claiming union.

ICFTU Gives Full Support to UN in Congo

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has pledged to United Nations' Sec.-Gen. Dag Hammarskjold the "full and unreserved support of many millions of workers in the free world" in the current Congo crisis.

"Firmly hope you will continue action to save Congo from anarchy and misery," ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu said in a telegram to the UN executive.

The declaration of ICFTU support came as the Soviet Union was rebuffed in its effort to force the secretary-general's resignation and have UN forces withdrawn from the Congo.

The Canadian Labor Congress also wired its support of Hammarskjold and the UN to Howard Green, Canada's secretary of state for external affairs.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO Executive Council had urged a UN inquiry into "the brutal murder of Patrice Lumumba," former Congolese premier, and declared its full support of Hammarskjold.

The ICFTU also appealed to the UN to create an international commission to inquire into the death of Lumumba.

Workers' Support Asked

ICFTU Pres. Arne Geijer and Becu cabled Congolese Pres. Joseph Kasavubu and the ICFTU-affiliated General Federation of Congolese Workers (FGTK), urging support of the UN and "joint workers' action to avoid bloodshed and promote unity and stability."

The ICFTU message to FGTK Federal Sec. Cyrille Adoula drew this prompt response:

"Labor movement Congo, conscious of gravity of situation, will do everything possible to avoid civil war."

Court Approves Special Teamsters' Convention

The three-year-old monitorship of the Teamsters came to a virtual end when U.S. District Judge F. Dickinson Letts in Washington, D. C., authorized the union to call a special convention for the purpose of electing officers.

James R. Hoffa, who has served in effect as provisional president under the recently dormant Board of Monitors, is expected to seek re-election along with other officers named originally at a 1957 convention, the legality of which was attacked in court by a group of dissident members.

The convention is planned for mid-May.

The monitorship was created in January 1958 by Judge Letts as a compromise ending of the court assault on the legality of the 1957 convention.

Major challenges to Hoffa's administration of the union marked many activities of the monitors, and at one time a hearing was asked before Letts on charges that Hoffa had misused union funds.

A series of decisions by the U.S. Court of Appeals disrupted this program and the chairman of the monitors' board, Martin F. O'Donoghue, resigned. The appellate court declined to uphold other proposals of the monitors backed by Judge Letts.

A federal indictment charging Hoffa with fraud involving Teamsters funds in a Sun Valley, Fla., real estate promotion is pending. Hoffa's counsel has asked dismissal of the indictment.

Woolworth Rehires Five With Back Pay

Newark, N. J.—Clerks' Local 21 here has announced that under a settlement agreement with the F. W. Woolworth Co., five employes who were fired for joining the union have been reinstated and will get $3,646 in back pay. The Menlo Park store also agreed to post a notice saying all employes are free to join, or refrain from joining, a union.

J. V. Kearney Boiler Makers' Officer, Dies

Jersey City—Funeral services have been held here for John V. Kearney, vice president of the Boiler Makers who died of a heart attack on board a train as he returned to his Philadelphia office.

Last rites were held at St. John's Catholic Church here. Union Pres. William A. Calvin has announced that the union has set up a memorial fund in tribute to Kearney and that contributions may be sent to union Sec.-Treas. H. E. Patton at headquarters in Kansas City, Kan., in lieu of flowers or other expressions of sympathy.

Kearney joined the Boiler Makers in 1928 while working at his trade in the construction field. He was elected business manager of the union's Dist. 3 in 1933 and served in that post until his election as an international vice president in 1945. Survivors include his wife, a son and two daughters.

Tells Senate Committee:

Labor Renews Plea On Wage-Hour Law

Modernization of the Fair Labor Standards Act raising the minimum wage immediately to $1.25 and extending coverage to 5.9 million more workers would stimulate the national economy and help eliminate the depressed class of the "working poor" in America, the AFL-CIO has declared.

Andrew J. Biemiller, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, told a Senate Labor subcommittee that establishment of the FLSA in the depression year of 1938 and its improvement in recession-ridden 1949 and in 1955 "helped touch off an improvement in employment."

Administration's Bill Inadequate

Biemiller told the subcommittee headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) that the Administration bill —calling for achieving the $1.25 wage floor in three annual steps and extending coverage to only 4.3 million new workers—"falls short of the clear and present need."

Earlier, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, testifying on behalf of the Administration proposals, said that raising the minimum to $1.15 immediately, $1.20 at the end of the first year and $1.25 after two years represented a "moderate, step-by-step approach" that would not "unduly hamper business and will not have adverse employment effects."

A House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) reported out the Administration's wage-hour bill with two changes: a minimum of $1.25 in the second year, instead of the third, and the shaving of some 300,000 workers from the total of those newly covered. The bill was scheduled for immediate action in an executive session of the full House Labor Committee.

Signifying a hot floor fight on minimum wage legislation, House Republicans were drafting a substitute measure raising the wage to only $1.15 and covering only 1.5 million more workers. The GOP plan, similar to one which the Republican-southern Democratic coalition substituted for a broader committee bill in the 86th Congress, is being drafted by Rep. William Ayres (R-O.).

Area Bill Advances

The minimum wage action came amid these other developments:

- A Senate Banking subcommittee neared completion of hearings on a $389 million area redevelopment bill with testimony from Goldberg, Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges and Agriculture Sec. Orville Freeman.
- Pres. Kennedy told his Mar. 1 press conference that he would issue an executive order "in the next few days" to toughen enforcement of anti-discrimination policies in hiring by the government or its contractors. The President said the order would "strengthen the employment opportunities, both in and out of the government, for all Americans."
- A House Agriculture subcommittee approved two emergency farm bills, bolstering prices on corn and feed grain, and Chairman W. R. Poage (D-Tex.) forecast floor action on the Administration proposals the week of Mar. 6.

In his testimony on minimum wage legislation, Biemiller expressed labor's disappointment that the Administration proposal placed no ceiling on hours for newly covered workers for the first year. Kennedy had urged the waiver on hours the first year to help business adjust to the new law.

The AFL-CIO spokesman said the theory "has no basis in fact," and declared that "the concept of an hours ceiling is not to build up overtime pay, but to discourage overtime work." He added that a limitation on hours would encourage employers to cut their workweek from as much as 54 hours and hire more workers "to fill in the gaps."

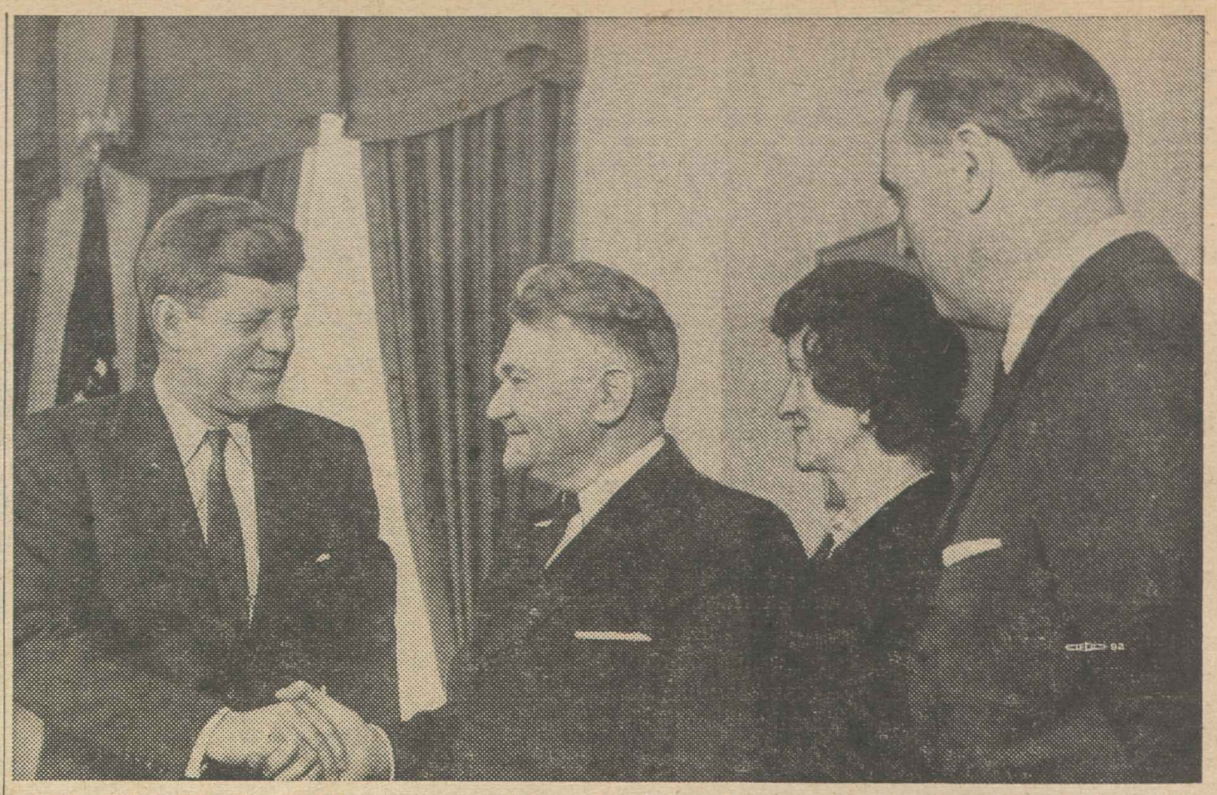
He disagreed sharply with spokesmen for the business community who contended that a higher minimum is "inflationary," and said the record of employment improvement in the past when the law was improved proves that these are "baseless fears."

Joblessness Persists

Goldberg, testifying on the depressed areas bill, warned the Banking subcommittee headed by Sen. A. Willis Robertson (D-Va.) that an end to the current recession would still leave deep pockets of misery in the 76 major and 152 smaller areas of chronic unemployment.

Hodges spelled out the need for action on the bill providing for loans to hard-hit communities to build facilities that will attract new industry and urged that Congress adopt the Administration plan of putting responsibility for the program under the Commerce Dept.

The AFL-CIO earlier urged creation of a special agency to handle area redevelopment, as contained in a depressed areas bill introduced by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.).



15TH MILLION PERSON to receive old-age benefits under social security system, Anthony A. Oeding, a member of the Machinists from Florissant, Mo., receives congratulations at White House from Pres. John F. Kennedy. Accompanying him are Mrs. Oeding and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff.

Machinist Is 15th Million Beneficiary

A retired member of the Machinists—whose career in the aircraft industry spanned the era from the days of "baling wire and hope" to the space age—has become the 15 millionth recipient of benefits under the social security system.

Anthony A. Oeding, who retired as a model builder for the McDonnell Aircraft Corp. in St. Louis, Mo., after 34 years in the aircraft industry, was honored by Pres. John F. Kennedy and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff at special White House ceremonies.

Oeding joined the IAM in 1933. Six years earlier—in May 1927, the same month that Charles A. Lindbergh made his historic trans-Atlantic solo flight —Oeding started work for the Curtiss-Wright Co., manufacturers of Lindbergh's "Spirit of St. Louis."

He was foreman of the Curtiss-Wright model shop during World War II and when the St. Louis plant closed in 1945 he went to work for McDonnell, the firm which is building capsules for the exploration of space.

Oeding, who makes his home with his wife in suburban Florissant, Mo., will receive a union-won pension of $70 a month in addition to his social security benefit check of $120. Mrs. Oeding will become entitled to a wife's benefits when she reaches the age of 62.

'Business Week' Still Favors Health Plan

"Business Week" magazine has once again thrown its weight behind the financing of health care for the aged through the social security system.

An editorial in the Feb. 18 issue of the magazine said there was "no better alternative to social security" for accomplishing the "essential" job of "spreading the burdens of old age over the years when people are younger, are working, and have more adequate incomes."

"Business Week" first endorsed the principle of social security financing of health care for the aged during 1960's debate on the Forand bill.

Labor Urges Fresh Push To Enact Health Care

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Renewed efforts" by all affiliates of the trade union movement and "liberal organizations throughout the country" are needed to assure congressional passage this year of legislation providing health care for the aged under social security financing, the AFL-CIO Executive Council has declared.

The council said that the Anderson-King bill, backed by the Kennedy Administration, "provides the framework for a sound, constructive program" that would aid 14.2 million senior citizens now receiving retirement benefits through the social security and railroad retirement systems.

Removal of Fees Urged

The federation's top governing body, however, recommended changes in the Administration plan to eliminate the deductible charges under which beneficiaries would be required to pay the first $10 of hospital costs a day during the first nine days in the hospital, and which would force the elderly to pay the first $20 of outpatient clinic diagnostic services.

"The aged citizens of the nation should not have to make such heavy initial payments themselves," the council said. "The additional cost can be met either through a later step-up of contributions or a long overdue increase in the wage-base ceiling."

The bill introduced by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) and Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.) would provide up to 90 days of hospital care, 180 days of nursing home service plus community visiting nurse service. The AFL-CIO hailed the bill's intention to "encourage the use of alternative forms of care."

The council charged that despite the fact that Kennedy put forward only a "modest proposal," the American Medical Association "and its satellites have once again raised the false flag of 'socialized medicine,' " and declared that "the politically minded members of the medical hierarchy are fighting human progress."

Javits Effort Deplored

The AFL-CIO leaders expressed regrets that the commercial insurance industry had joined the AMA leaders in opposition to an adequate health bill, and said they "deplored the continued efforts by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) and others of his party in support of essentially the same unworkable federal-state approach which Congress so decisively defeated last year."

The Javits proposal, the council said, "depends on appropriations from general revenues, bases benefits on an income test, and diverts federal funds to the profits of commercial insurance companies."

The statement declared that there is a "ground swell" of public opinion in support of using the social security system for financing health benefits for the aged. The most recent demonstration of this demand, the council said, was the "overwhelming support" given this approach by the recent White House Conference on the Aging.

Jobless Benefits Slash Vetoed in Wyoming

maximum is $47 but beneficiaries may receive up to $6 additional in dependent benefits for a total of $53.

The Republican-supported bill would have repealed the percentage formula, reduced the present maximum including dependents' allowances to $47, reduced benefits to workers leaving the state to search for employment by 25 percent, doubled the disqualification penalty to six weeks and cancelled six weeks from the duration of benefits for unemployed persons who were not actually laid off from their last jobs.

'Impossible'

The governor, in vetoing the bill, commented on the profusion of amendments made by the legislature which he said would make the program "impossible to administer." The legislature, he added, "seemed confused" and he suggested that it might want to study the issue in greater depth at a future session. The 1961 legislature adjourned shortly after passing the bill.

At the same time, Gage vetoed another union-opposed bill which would have removed the state labor commissioner from the Wyoming Employment Security Commission.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Paul Shafto described the legislative session as "greatly disappointing" to labor. He was sharply critical of the refusal of the GOP leaders to permit minimum wage legislation to reach the floor of the House or the Senate.

stituted a two-year hike in the payroll tax from 3.1 to 3.5 percent, with all of the added revenue scheduled to be channeled to the federal government. This will raise the federal share of payroll taxes from four-tenths to eight-tenths of 1 percent.

Despite the committee's refusal to go along with the permanent increase in the tax base, the House-passed measure adheres to the Administration's basic principle that the cost of the TUC program should be borne by all employers. Normal benefits are financed out of the taxes paid to each state by the employers in that state.

In calling for an across-the-board system of financing TUC, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg told the Ways & Means Committee that "since no state is a self-contained economic unit, we should not expect a state to carry alone the crushing burden of long-duration unemployment."

IUD Asks Crusade for Legislative Goals

Anti-Slump Bills Urged By Reuther

By Gene Zack

Public support must be rallied behind the AFL-CIO legislative program in order to insure congressional action to halt the recession and meet a wide range of unsolved problems, 1,000 delegates to the 1961 legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. have been told.

The primary task for unions affiliated with the department, IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther declared in his keynote address to the two-day conference, is to "implement the federation's legislative program."

"We must mobilize the American people in a crusade to get Congress to act," Reuther declared. "Let's roll up our sleeves and go to work—to get America back to work."

Delegates were urged to utilize labor publications, leaflets and educational programs to stimulate a barrage of letters to members of the House and Senate in support of labor's legislative goals and thus help offset letters from business groups opposing anti-recession measures.

In meetings before and after a day on Capitol Hill urging congressmen and senators from their home states to give speedy approval to both short-range and long-range measures backed by the united labor movement, delegates heard:

- Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg declare that the Kennedy Administration welcomes honest differences of opinion with the labor movement and does not expect labor to "rubber stamp" all of its programs.
- Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Senate majority whip, warn that the nation "must not underestimate the depth or the seriousness" of the recession and declare that the government "cannot be content with anything short of putting idled people back to work."
- Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) praise industrial unions for their "broad view of civic responsibilities" and declare that labor has done more "than any other force in the country" in providing "political and economic opportunities for Negroes."
- Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee, caution the Kennedy Administration that "compromise solutions are not the way to attack the problems which confront us." This was an apparent reference to earlier criticism by Powell that White

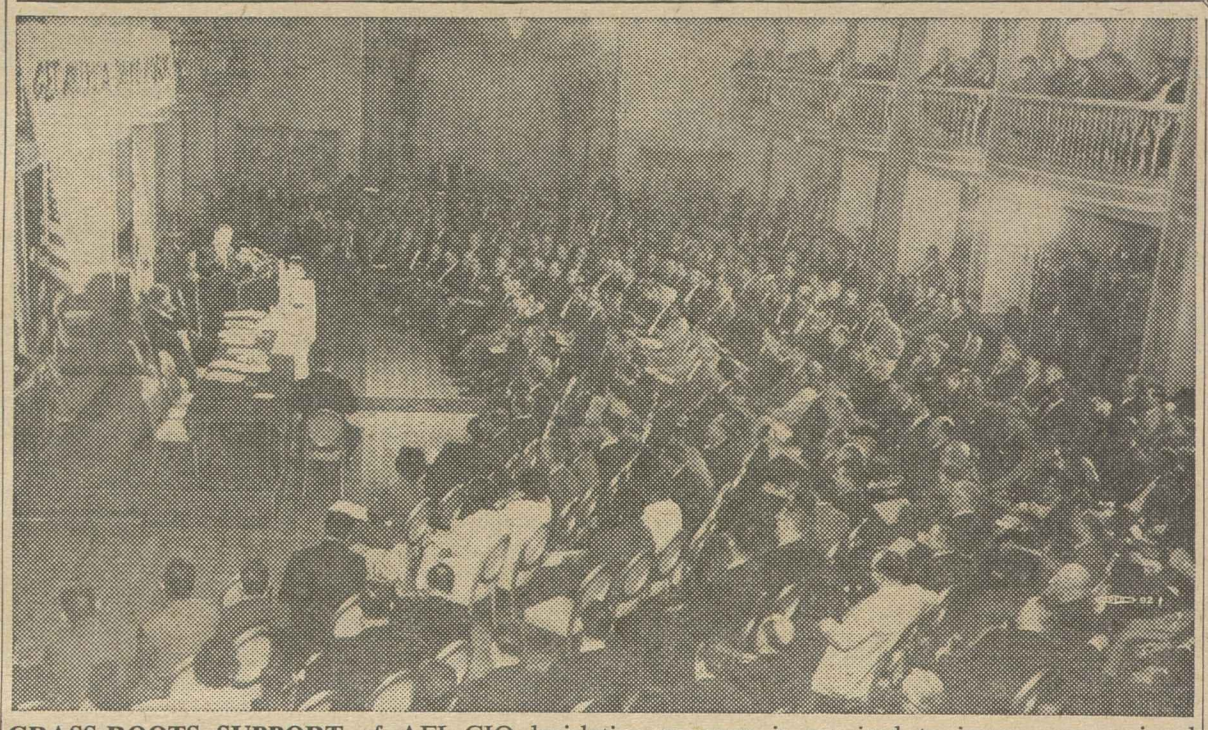
Joblessness at 5.7 Million Is Highest Since Mid-1941



GRASS-ROOTS SUPPORT of AFL-CIO legislative program is required to insure congressional passage, Walter P. Reuther, president of AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., told 1,000 delegates to two-day legislative conference at Washington's Mayflower Hotel. Delegates also spent time on Capitol Hill urging action on labor's program.

Rate Inches Up to 6.8% In February

By Robert B. Cooney

Unemployment hit 5.7 million in mid-February, the government has reported, calling it "the highest level since the summer of 1941."

A greater-than-expected rise of 320,000 jobless since mid-January, while employment rose slightly, nudged the key seasonally-adjusted rate of unemployment to 6.8 percent of the civilian work force.

The 6.8 percent rate, up from January's 6.6 percent, was a record high for postwar Februaries.

The long-term unemployed—those out of work 15 weeks or longer—jumped upward by 285,000 to a postwar February record of 1.6 million.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg told a press conference the latest jobless figures "underscore again the pressing need for the President's program to relieve the immediate hardships of our record unemployment, additional unemployment benefits for those without work and aid to depressed areas" as well as long-term programs.

Goldberg issued summary figures on the job situation in line with an announced policy of making data public as soon as available. The summary is based on data gathered in Census Bureau household surveys; a more detailed report based on payroll data is set for Mar. 14.

Goldberg also estimated that by Apr. 1, a total of 720,000 men and women will have ex-

In Major NLRB Vote:

New York Telephone Workers Pick CWA

By David L. Perlman

New York—Eighteen thousand New York Telephone Co. plant workers have ousted an unaffiliated union and picked the Communications Workers to bargain for them in one of the biggest National Labor Relations Board elections in recent years.

The mail ballot—a runoff—gave the CWA 8,156 votes to 7,700 for the unaffiliated United Telephone Organizations, which had held bargaining rights for the past 24 years.

CWA won its biggest organizing victory on the union's second try. Only 15 months ago, when the AFL-CIO union made its first bid to represent the downstate telephone repairmen, installers and other plant workers, the unaffiliated union won with 62 percent of the vote.

That first election campaign, however, produced a hard-core nucleus of more than 500 active supporters who set up a continuing in-plant organizing committee.

They attended CWA schools and organizing workshops, and donated thousands of hours to personal contacts among their fellow-employes. During the weeks preceding the runoff election, they took part in "Operation Telephone," a program of personal calls to each of the 18,000 workers scattered throughout New York City, Long Island and other downstate suburban areas.

The representation battle moved to the runoff stage after an initial three-way contest which included the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. On the first vote, the unaffiliated UTO led the balloting but the combined vote for CWA and IBEW was greater.

Meany Flays Pension Deal With Cross

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has denounced as "legalistic highway robbery" a proposed agreement under which James G. Cross would resign as president of the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers and receive a quarter-million-dollar cash settlement in exchange for the dropping of a U.S. District Court suit charging him with misappropriation of union funds.

The agreement—reached between the B&C executive board and the so-called Local Union Reunification Committee, which brought the legal charges against Cross, B&C Sec.-Treas. Peter H. Olson and the B&C board—also would indemnify Cross for any damages and the costs of legal actions which might arise out of his presidency of the union. The $250,000 was described as a settlement of pension claims.

The court set Mar. 23 as the deadline for filing of formal objections to the proposed settlement and scheduled further hearings for Mar. 29.

Meany declared he was "aghast" at the proposed deal, terming it an "unconscionable proposal (which) violates every single shred of common decency."

The AFL-CIO president noted that the union was expelled by the federation's 1957 convention "for failure to remove Cross from the presidency because of a long list

Kennedy Orders New Steps to End Job Bias

Pres. John F. Kennedy, in a far-reaching move aimed at stamping out discrimination in hiring by the government and its contractors, has created a new President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and armed it with broad enforcement powers.

In a statement accompanying his first executive order in the civil rights field, Kennedy said he was establishing "vastly strengthened machinery . . . to insure that Americans of all colors and beliefs will have equal access to employment within the government and with those who do business with the government."

The President said his executive order spelled out "sanctions sweeping enough to insure compliance." They authorize the committee to:

- Publish the names of contractors or unions found violating its directives.
- Recommend suits by the Justice Dept. to enforce the non-discrimination clauses in contracts.
- Terminate any contract because of job discrimination.
- Forbid contracting agencies of the government to give new business to companies that discriminate unless and until the companies demonstrate they have changed their policies.

At the same time Kennedy said he had ordered a "complete

Labor Backs Kennedy's School Plan

Conditions in America's schools constitute a "national disgrace," the AFL-CIO has declared in calling for congressional approval of Pres. John F. Kennedy's $2.3 billion federal aid-to-education bill as a "moderate and balanced first step" toward meeting the school crisis.

The Administration's three-year program of federal grants—which states could use, at their own discretion, for public school construction, teachers' salaries, or both—has the "sincere support" of organized labor, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, chairman of the federation's Committee on Education, told a Senate Education subcommittee.

For more than 130 years, the

At Glass Bottle Blowers Convention:

Minton Calls for Unity to Spur Legislative, Bargaining Gains

Los Angeles—A new call for the merger of unions in the glass industry has been isued here by Lee W. Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers Association.

Minton told nearly 700 delegates to the 62nd convention of the 119-year-old union that informal discussions for a merger have been making "some progress," and that a successful merger would result in a union of more than 130,000 workers.

He noted that a new committee has been "tentatively formed" among glass and related unions and said that if this committee is activated, "it will aid us immeasurably in such areas as tariffs, legislation, contract comparison and research development."

Minton declared that organized labor must be more politically active than ever, saying that "we are still faced today, as we have been in the past, with a coalition of reactionaries from both major parties."

Labor, he said, can "throw off the shackles of anti-labor legislation" only by not "blindly endorsing a political party as a whole." He called for a vigorous effort to repeal Section 14-B of the Taft-Hartley Act which permits state laws prohibiting union shop contracts.

National Bargaining Urged

Minton also said the GBBA must press for national bargaining agreements, noting that in 1960 for the first time area bargaining was achieved on the West Coast where a contract was negotiated for all but one of the companies in the industry.

Delegates cheered a proposal that plants should be shut down on holidays and that vacations be made compulsory. Minton said too many of the union's 54,500 members are working for the triple-time on holidays and accepting cash in lieu of vacations, resulting in fewer jobs.

A major goal of the AFL-CIO, Minton said, is medical care for the aged through the social security system, a plan which "has become a number one issue in the nation."

Calling the AFL-CIO position "a sound one," the GBBA president warned, however, that "we dare not depend on politicians alone to provide this needed care." He said the GBBA is now in the process of seeking a joint union-management fund for the purpose of providing medical care for the aged.

Minton spelled out the AFL-CIO legislative program in detail, and said it is up to all union members to contact their representatives in Congress as "other interests contrary to ours do every day. As long as we are not heard from, representatives and senators have a right to assume we are not interested in passage of such legislation."

Minton also called for a change in the name of the GBBA to the Intl. Union of Glass Workers.

Delegates were asked to approve a constitutional change which would increase dues by 25 cents a month for the payment of convention costs, eliminating the present method of requiring the payment of two months' dues every two years to finance convention costs. Conventions of the union are held every four years.

California's Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown told the convention he will continue to press for an expansion of liberal state social legislation.

Declaring that more progressive legislation has been adopted since Democrats won control of the state legislature in 1958 than in the previous 50 years, Brown said these gains were made possible only with the support of organized labor.

Labor, Brown said, "acts as the lobbyist not only for itself but for all the citizens of our state."

He noted that a so-called "right-to-work" law was defeated in California in 1958 by the combined efforts of labor and Democratic Party leaders, and pledged that if the "right-to-wreck proposal or a comparable issue comes up again, I will again join you to defeat it in the interest of all citizens."

Thomas L. Pitts, president of the California AFL-CIO, said that while this state has many problems, "we are tackling these problems jointly with the Governor and I believe that we can succeed."

Union Wins $100,000 Jobless Benefits Claim

Elkhart, Ind.—More than 500 Continental Can Co. employes here stand to collect an estimated $100,000 because their union refused to take no for an answer when members were denied unemployment compensation benefits during a seven-week lockout in 1958.

A unanimous decision by the Indiana Appellate Court upheld the claim by Papermakers & Paperworkers Local 1049 that the 1958 plant shutdown resulted from the action of the employer in locking out his workers after a brief, unauthorized work stoppage participated in by about 85 workers in protest against the firing of one employe.

The men were directed back to work by their union the next day but found the plant gates barred to them. It was nearly two months before the plant was reopened.

The court decision, which is subject to appeal to the Indiana Supreme Court, reversed the action of the state employment security division and its review board in denying the unemployment compensation claims on the grounds that state law prohibits payment of benefits to workers idled as the result of a labor dispute.

Declaring that "it would be difficult for reasonable minds to reach the conclusion that the work stoppage (after the brief wildcat episode) was caused by the union or the employes of this company," the court said:

"When the employer uses the lockout as the cause of unemployment, he cannot, by such action, deprive the employe of his benefits under the Employment Security Act."

Local 1049 Pres. Clement A. Nikta hailed the court decision as a major "breakthrough" in interpretation of the state's harshly restrictive unemployment compensation law.

New York AFT Seeks One Bargaining Unit

New York—A five-member advisory commission appointed by the Board of Education is hearing arguments to determine the date and terms of an election among the public school system's 40,000 teachers here.

At the first hearing Mar. 3, representatives of the United Federation of Teachers, New York local of the American Federation of Teachers, urged the commission to let all the system's teachers decide whether they want one union to represent them, instead of permitting separate units of elementary and secondary school teachers.

No 'Balkanization'

"There is no basis in law, in tradition or in current practice for separating teachers into differing bargaining units," said David E. Feller and Henry Mayer, attorneys for the UFT. "There is one school system, administered on a unified basis, and collective bargaining should not create a Balkanization of the system."

Commission members who will decide how and when the election is to be conducted are Prof. George W. Taylor of the University of Pennsylvania, chairman; David L. Cole and Walter Gellhorn, arbitrators; John A. Krout and Clara Tead, educators. Taylor was chairman of the President's Board of Inquiry in the 116-day steel strike of 1959.

The UFT staged a walkout last Nov. 7 in protest against what the union said were unsettled grievances, including the date of a bargaining election. The strikers returned Nov. 9 when assured that their grievances would be discussed and no reprisals would follow.

The New York AFL-CIO moved to restore peace to the classrooms by naming a special committee to state the case for the Teachers—Pres. Jacob Potofsky, Clothing Workers; Pres. David Dubinsky, Ladies' Garment Workers, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the city central body. As a result of their mediation with the mayor and Board of Education, the board decided to let an advisory commission review the facts.

Screen Actors Vote For Dues Increase

Hollywood, Calif.—Members of the Screen Actors Guild have approved an increase in dues by a 3-1 majority, SAG Pres. George Chandler has announced.

Out of 6,049 ballots cast in a nationwide mail referendum, 4,459 favored the dues revision and 1,590 were opposed.

The dues increase, which amounts to between 50 and 75 cents per member per month, marks only the second revision of dues in SAG's 24-year history, Chandler said.

Kohler Takes Appeal To Supreme Court

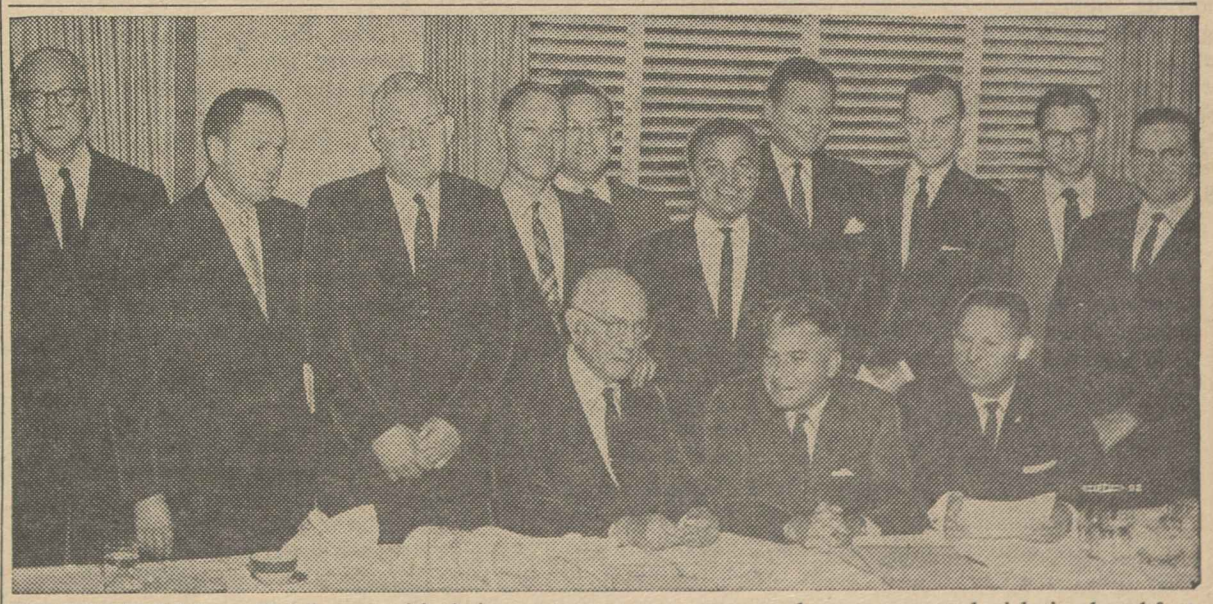
The Kohler Co. of Kohler, Wis., locked in a seven-year strike struggle with the Auto Workers, has appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court to order that the court phase of the battle take place in Chicago rather than the District of Columbia.

Last August the National Labor Relations Board found Kohler guilty of a series of unfair labor practices in the strike which began in April 1954, and ordered the rehiring of the great majority of some 2,000 strikers.

Kohler appealed the NLRB decision to the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago. UAW Local 833 appealed that part of the NLRB ruling which upheld the firing of a group of 77 strikers, and the NLRB itself filed a petition for an enforcement order, both acting in the District's Court of Appeals.

Last November the District Court denied a Kohler motion to transfer the entire case to Chicago, and the Chicago Court agreed the case should be heard in Washington.

Kohler has now asked the Supreme Court to reverse the lower courts. The high court is expected to decide in a matter of weeks.



KENTUCKY labor officials met with their senators, congressmen and governor at a legislative breakfast in the nation's capital. Left to right are: standing, Sen. Board Overrules IAM:

Northwest Walkout Hearing Under Way

St. Paul—The Machinists have challenged the right of Northwest Airlines to take part in a presidential emergency board hearing until it has resumed normal operations, but the three board members overruled the IAM request for a postponement and started the hearing with testimony by company witnesses.

Some 29 flight engineers represented by IAM went on strike Oct. 11 when the company ordered them to take pilot training and they refused on the ground it would place them in the jurisdiction of another union, the Air Line Pilots, and jeopardize their seniority and job status.

Walkout Expanded

Another 231 IAM members joined the walkout Jan. 9 when the company began using supervisors and pilots as flight engineers. The management halted all but two daily flights and laid off 2,500 ground personnel also represented by IAM.

The union withdrew its picket lines Feb. 24 when Pres. John F. Kennedy set up a board to hear the facts and make recommendations. Management has refused to call back most of the strikers and ground personnel and IAM Pres. Al J. Hayes charged that the company had forfeited its right under the Railway Labor Act to present its case to the inquiry board. The union contends both parties were required to restore operations as they existed before the strike.

A union request for postponement of the hearing here was denied by the three board members, Prof. Paul Guthrie of the University of North Carolina, the chairman; Benjamin Aaron, University of California at Los Angeles; and Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., attorney. After Northwest management completes its testimony, IAM Airlines Coordinator Frank Heisler will ask, he said, for a recess of at least two weeks to prepare rebuttal testimony.

Meanwhile these other developments occurred:

● U.S. District Judge Burnita S. Matthews first issued, then withdrew an order directing Northwest Airlines to end the lockout, resume full flight operations and recall to work all flight engineers and ground personnel.

The order was issued when IAM lawyers told the court that Northwest violated the Railway Labor Act by refusing to resume full flight operations and failing to restore all affected personnel to work. The company challenged the charge, and the court said IAM was free to file a formal petition for a restraining order.

● The union filed a $1.5 million damage suit against Northwest on behalf of members who were kept out of work after the engineers' strike ended.

Another emergency board has been named by Kennedy to hear the facts in a dispute involving the Flight Engineers and six airlines. FEIA members struck Feb. 17 against Pan American World Airways in a dispute over contract terms. Engineers on five other lines also left work in what the union said was an unauthorized walkout, but all FEIA members returned to work except at Western Airlines, where the strike continued, when the presidential emergency board was set up.

Behind the walkout, said FEIA, was the engineers' fear that they would lose seniority and job status because of a National Mediation Board ruling that one union should represent pilots and flight engineers.

OPERATION TELEPHONE was credited with a major assist in the Communications Workers victory in a representation election among 18,000 New York Telephone Co. workers. CWA supporters are shown making phone calls to their fellow employes during the campaign.

Ohio Labor Rally Hits GOP Jobless Proposal

Columbus, O.—A statewide Ohio AFL-CIO rally on unemployment here has sharply denounced a Republican-sponsored unemployment extension bill which would make it more difficult for workers to qualify for full jobless benefits.

Three thousand delegates, half of them unemployed, unanimously adopted a resolution calling on Gov. Michael V. DiSalle (D) to veto the bill if it clears the legislature. Both branches of the Republican-dominated legislature have passed the measure and it was assigned to a conference committee to reconcile differences in language.

As passed by both houses, the 13-week extension of benefits—from 26 to 39 weeks—would not take effect until "triggered" by a statewide unemployment rate exceeding 6 percent for three successive months.

This, labor charged, would ignore the plight of hard-hit cities and regions within the state.

The GOP bill would also have the effect of reducing benefits to lowest-paid workers, eliminating benefits during periods of enforced "vacation" as a result of plant shutdowns, deducting severance pay from jobless benefits and increasing the penalty for workers who are unemployed after quitting their jobs.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Phil Hannah told the rally that the Republican approach in the legislature "was to give with one hand while trying to take away with the other."

State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Elmer F. Cope said if the GOP had really favored extension of benefits "they would have supported extension without crippling amendments."

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., called for support of a national legislative program geared at getting America back to work. "If you let your congressman know you want to get back to work," he said, "America will be put back to work."

CWA Wins Vote in Unit Of 18,000

the runoff race, the AFL-CIO threw major support to the CWA campaign.

United Labor

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a letter to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, had expressed the hope that the phone workers "will mark their ballots for the Communications Workers of America, AFL-CIO."

The city's central labor body also called for support of the CWA in the runoff.

Beirne said the support voiced by Meany and the work of AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Michael Mann and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City Central Labor Council helped put the AFL-CIO union ahead in the final runoff.

At the same time that the downstate workers were discarding an unaffiliated union, a unit of some 6,200 upstate plant employes eliminated still another long-established unaffiliated group, the Empire State's Telephone Workers Organization. A three-way NLRB election resulted in a runoff between CWA and IBEW, with the unaffiliated union out of the picture. Mail balloting is under way with the votes to be counted on Mar. 21.

Sears Complies with Arbiter's Award But Boycott by Consumers Continues

San Francisco—Two Retail Clerks unions here have advised the San Francisco Labor Council that Sears Roebuck & Co. was in full compliance with the Jan. 1 arbitration award handed down by Arbiter Arthur C. Miller.

More than $125,000 was being paid to union members who had been "replaced" nearly nine months ago after they refused to cross the picket lines of Production Machinists, Lodge 1327.

RCIA Pres. James A. Suffridge said in Washington that while Sears has agreed to abide by the arbitrator's decision in the San Francisco case, the "consumer boycott must continue in full effect."

Suffridge said that "Sears must show its willingness to reverse its rigid open-shop policy." He pointed out that in San Francisco and Seattle as well as many other areas, "Sears has unilaterally and arbitrarily set aside union-shop agreements which have been in effect for 20 years or more."

The union will continue to seek, he declared, "an end to Sears' harassment and discrimination against union members and an end to anti-union 'brainwashing' sessions carried on in Sears stores."

There are many issues still unsettled in San Francisco, Suffridge added, "including back pay for union members who participated in boycott activities." The arbitration award is but one battle in a long war, he commented, and the struggle will continue.

The arbitration settlement represented wages lost by employes as a result of their replacement last May plus earnings lost when employes were put back to work in lower-paid departments or reduced by the Many short-hour employes who were only recently called back to work or who were put back to work on fewer hours than prior to the Machinists' strike were also compensated for lost earnings.

In addition, employes were paid for back vacations and for medical claims while they were off the job; profit-sharing benefits accruing to them during the period were also restored. Seniority adjustments, imposed on the discharged employes by the company for the period they were off, have all been corrected. And all payments carried interest at 7 percent from Jan. 1.

While 144 members of the two unions had been listed in the court and arbitration proceedings, the final settlement was estimated to apply to about 175 employes in all.

The negotiations that wound up the prolonged dispute followed legal action by the Clerks' unions to force Sears to comply with Miller's Jan. 1 arbitration award. As a result of the settlement the unions' court actions were withdrawn.

Department Store Employes Union, Local 1100, and Retail Shoe and Textile Salesmen's Union, Local 410, described the conclusion of the dispute as a "tremendous victory for trade union principles."

The contest broke in May 1960 when more than 400 Sears employes respected the picket lines of the Machinists' local. Returning to work during a temporary interruption in the Machinists' strike, the employes were abruptly told they had been "replaced" for an indefinite period.

The company action was promptly labeled a violation of contracts and, when the company failed to alter its position, the Labor Council called for a consumer boycott which was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the National Chain Store Committee of the Retail Clerks Intl. Association.

NLRB Backs Right To Wear Union Pin

The National Labor Relations Board has upheld a trial examiner's finding that the Floridan Hotel at Tampa, Fla., was guilty of unfair labor practices in forbidding its employes from wearing union buttons and threatening members of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes with discharge if they defied the order.

The hotel had claimed that some of its customers might be offended by the sight of a union emblem.

of documented and proven instances of improper activities repugnant to trade union morality."

He added that the case now before the court involves "sworn complaints that this man 'misappropriated and misused the funds and property of the union to his own private and personal profit.'"

The pending suit alleges that over $100,000 in B&C funds had been used to pay legal costs in defending Cross against charges of raiding the union treasury; that union funds were used to buy and maintain Cross' Palm Beach, Fla., home; and that various personal expenses for Cross and his wife—including food, automobiles and entertainment—came out of the B&C treasury.

"I just can't understand," Meany said, "how so-called labor leaders and so-called labor lawyers could instigate such a case and then agree to a settlement which rewards the defendant for the very acts complained of.

"If the funds of the union members have been misused and misappropriated, then these workers should not be further penalized by having to pay a quarter of a million dollars to this defendant.

"If the so-called Local Unions Reunification Committee had sound grounds for its charges that this man flouted the fiduciary responsibilities of his office, then it is a rank violation of common decency for this group to propose that the union guarantee to defend him and to pay any judgments that might be returned against him out of the funds of the workers he has misrepresented.

"This proposed settlement is a clear case of legalistic highway robbery. No right-thinking person can approve or condone it."

At the time the agreement was announced, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg ordered an investigation of the deal by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor-Management Reports "to determine if the Landrum-Griffin Act or any other law administered by the Labor Dept. is being violated." The investigation is still under way.

IUD Asks Crusade for Legislative Goals

Pay Hike Won By ILGWU For 90,000

New York—A new three-year agreement providing 5.5 percent wage boosts for 90,000 dress workers in nine states has been approved by the Ladies' Garment Workers and five employer associations representing 2,300 jobbers and contractors.

Agreement on the new pact was reached three days in advance of a strike deadline set by the ILGWU for affected members in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Maryland, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, and part of Delaware.

$3 Minimum Increase

Union negotiators headed by Charles S. Zimmerman, general manager of the ILGWU Dress Joint Council, were congratulated by Pres. David Dubinsky of the union in a message from the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Miami Beach for obtaining "modest and essential improvements" without a general strike in the industry.

Under the agreement, dressmakers will get a 5.5 percent wage increase effective Apr. 1, higher minimums, a uniform piece-rate schedule for operators and finishers, 6.5 guaranteed holidays and other improvements, including a guarantee that all workers shall get increases of at least $3 a week.

Increases in minimums, Zimmerman said, are $7 for cutters, $5 for samplemakers and drapers, $4 for examiners, $3 for cleaners. For pieceworkers, increases in minimums are $5 for operators and pressers, $5.20 for finishers.

Morgan Announcer Heads AFTRA Unit

Frank Harden, who has been the announcer on the Edward P. Morgan and the News program since its beginning and who was previously on the John W. Vandercook program for the AFL-CIO, has been elected president of the Washington-Baltimore local of the Television and Radio Artists.

TWO TONS of food and clothing, contributed by members of Office Employes Local 2 in Washington, D. C., along with $450 in cash donations, were sent to nearby Hagerstown, Md., a hard-hit distressed area where thousands of families have been jobless for many months. OEIU's donation was distributed to needy families through the Salvation Army. OEIU officers and committeemen are shown with the Hagerstown trucklift.

House Group Launches Investigation of NLRB

A House investigation will open Mar. 13 to determine whether the National Labor Relations Board had "perverted" federal labor laws through administrative decisions, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, has announced.

Powell told the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. legislative conference that a special subcommittee headed by Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.) has been granted "full investigatory and subpoena powers," to probe the labor board and its general counsel, Stuart Rothman.

The New York Democrat declared that if the Dent subcommittee finds that the NLRB and its general counsel "have perverted the intentions of Congress," he will "recommend effective measures to right this wrong."

Noting that some of the members who served on the board during the Eisenhower Administration either had already left office or would be departing shortly, Powell said they will be "called back."

William Pollock, president of the Textile Workers Union of America which has actively sought an investigation of the NLRB, welcomed Powell's announcement and urged that a Senate committee undertake a similar investigation.

Pollock, in an address to the IUD conference, emphasized that the new Kennedy Administration "is not anti-labor," and that under the new President's leadership "the complexion of the NLRB is likely to change." He contended, however, that Eisenhower appointees in the past had "usurped powers which the Congress never intended them to have" and that a "thorough congressional investigation is vital" in order that changes be made to prevent abuses in the future.

Conference Urged to Spur Congress to Act

House proposals on minimum wage did not go far enough.

● Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.), chairman of a House Labor subcommittee, forecast congressional passage this year of a housing bill, depressed areas legislation school aid and medical care for the aged under social security despite "sharp battles" and exceedingly close votes.

Reuther declared that he had "unlimited faith" that Kennedy would "provide the leadership that America needs," but cautioned that "without our help he will not get action out of Congress to meet the problems of the present emergency and to meet the long-range needs of America."

The IUD president said he supported the Administration's 12-point program for economic recovery, but reiterated criticism expressed earlier before the Joint Economic Committee that it would be "unwise" to wait until April, as Kennedy had indicated he would do, before making a decision on tax cuts to reverse the downtrend.

Job Situation Worsening

"The situation is going to get worse," Reuther said as he again urged Kennedy to give stand-by authority to institute a $10-a-week cut in withholding taxes for a 10-week period when joblessness hits 7 percent. "If we wait until April," he continued, "it will take time while the economic snowball of recession picks up momentum. The longer we wait to take affirmative action, the harder the job will be."

Reuther expressed the hope that the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy, slated for its first meeting at the White House Mar. 21, would come up with ideas to "harness the abundance of automation and use it to meet the unfilled needs of the people."

In the last 10 years, he said, the work force grew at the rate of 850,000 a year while in the '60s the growth of the work force will be at the rate of 1.35 million per year. This will call for creation of 26,000 new jobs each week to take care of the new workers, he said.

Automation Impact Felt

In addition, Reuther declared, automation and technology will displace 28 million workers in the next decade, requiring the creation of 54,000 new jobs each week to meet this need.

The total of 80,000 new jobs each week, Reuther said, means that to take up the slack, the American free enterprise system would have to create every five weeks an enterprise similar to General Motors, which employs 400,000 workers; a business like U.S. Steel, with its 200,000 employes, every 2.5 weeks; or an operation like duPont, with 80,000 workers.

Powell told delegates that Congress "must constantly be reminded of what the Democratic Party proclaimed it stood for during the course of the campaign, because there are strong and influential forces at work which are trying to keep our national efforts oriented toward the same direction that we found it in—on the wrong side of dead center."

Decrying the "lengthening lines of jobless breadwinners before the surplus food disposal centers," the New York Democrat pledged an early study of the causes and effects of unemployment and the human impact of expanding automation "so that progress in production will not be measured against mileposts of human misery."

Civil Rights Action Urged

Powell also called for action in the field of civil rights, vocational training, Taft-Hartley revision and aid to education and said that if Kennedy achieves his goal of making education available "to all who are willing and able to pursue it . . . there will be no need for me or anyone else to implement it through legislation." This was an apparent reference to so-called Powell amendments which blocked aid-to-education bills in the past. On one occasion the civil rights rider was offered by GOP forces who wrote it into the bill, thus ensuring heavy southern Democratic defections, and then voted themselves to kill the bill.

Try Living on $40, Reuther Asks Foes

Congressmen who oppose raising the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour should be required to live on the present minimum of $40 a week "until they change their minds," Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told delegates to the IUD legislative conference.

"It's easy for a congressman to oppose minimum wage when he has his $25,000-a-year salary, socialized medicine at Walter Reed, and even subsidized haircuts," Reuther said.

But if the $40-a-week wage were imposed on opponents of the wage bill, he declared, "we'd get action in a hurry."

NLRB Bars Struck-Work Clause As 'Hot-Cargo' Pact 'Subterfuge'

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that clauses covering refusal to handle struck work, contained in contracts of the unaffiliated Lithographers, are illegal and were designed as a "subterfuge" to circumvent the Landrum-Griffin Act's prohibition against "hot cargo" agreements.

The board, in its first findings of violation of the "hot cargo" ban contained in the 1959 labor legislation, ruled against Lithographers Local 17 in San Francisco and Local 78 in Miami, Fla.

The clauses in question gave the union the right to terminate the contract if management requested employes to handle work not produced under union conditions or work produced in a shop involved in a strike or lockout. Another challenged clause barred disciplinary action against any employe refusing to handle non-union or struck work.

The NLRB ruled in the two cases that the effect of the new clauses was "precisely the same as if the employer had agreed in so many words that he would not handle non-union products" since an employer would not "realistically" handle such work if to do so "would confront him with the possibility that his entire contract would be reopened for renegotiation."

"Congress was intent upon outlawing 'hot cargo' clauses no matter how disguised," the NLRB said. It added that L-G's prohibition against either "express or implied" agreements of this nature meant that the law was aimed at "every possible subterfuge" designed to achieve the effect of a "hot cargo" clause.

In a parallel action, NLRB General Counsel Stuart Rothman announced he had authorized "hot cargo" complaint proceedings against new "protection of rights" clauses in contracts of the unaffiliated Teamsters. The contracts involve the Southern Conference of Teamsters and IBT Local 728, Atlanta, Ga.

The charges, filed by Brown Transport Corp. of Atlanta, Ga., attack IBT clauses which declare that it will "not be a violation of this agreement" for an employe to refuse, as an individual, to cross a picket line or to handle struck goods even though the contract specifies that employers still are free to do business with struck firms.

The Teamster agreements contain a "hazardous work" section under which it is agreed that if either a court or the labor board subsequently finds that IBT members must cross picket lines, management will reimburse them with triple pay; provide them with triple life, hospital and medical benefits; and furnish "adequate protection against possible injury" to either the employe or his family.

Bakeries Indicted In Anti-Trust Case

Jacksonville, Fla. — A federal grand jury here has indicted five baking companies on charges of having rigged bids on sales to Navy installations in northern Florida and southeastern Georgia. In a separate anti-trust indictment, six bakeries were charged with illegally fixing wholesale prices on bakery goods sold to supermarkets and other retailers in the area.

The three biggest firms—Ward Baking Co., American Bakeries Co., and Southern Bakeries Co.—were named in both indictments.

Rep. Thompson Has Answer for Doctors

Members of the medical profession who oppose health care for the aged through social security on the ground that it is "unconstitutional" are getting a stock answer from Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.).

Thompson told delegates to the legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. that he has been sending the following answer to these critics:

"If you know as little about medicine as you do about constitutional law, your patients are in a hell of a shape."

Unemployment Up In New York State

Albany, N. Y.—Unemployment in New York State in mid-January hit the highest level since the 1949 recession—557,231 or 7.3 percent of the state's labor force.

Labor Commissioner Martin P. Catherwood, in announcing the figures, forecast that a continued trend would put into effect between April and July the state administration's "trigger point" program of extending jobless pay for 13 weeks.

Catherwood said the January report was based on a new formula through which the federal government is seeking to achieve a uniformity in state jobless reporting systems. The old formula would have put New York's jobless at 660,000, since it counted the partially employed and those waiting to start collecting jobless pay.

In AFL-CIO Testimony:

Bracero Program Hit as 'Colonialism'

The AFL-CIO has assailed the 10-year-old Mexican Contract Labor Program as a form of "imported colonialism," and has called for a complete overhaul of the program coupled with plans for its "final termination."

Testifying before a House Agriculture subcommittee, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said that "even the temporary extension" of Public Law 78 would be "unconscionable" without adoption of measures to protect American workers from adverse effects and to safeguard Mexican field hands (braceros) from exploitation.

Biemiller noted that although the law was enacted 10 years ago as a "temporary" measure to meet an agricultural emergency, the law remains on the statute books and proposals currently before Congress would continue it for at least four more years.

The AFL-CIO spokesman said reforms of the law should include guarantees to American workers of comparable wages, transportation and workmen's compensation; prohibitions against using Mexican nationals in any activity other than temporary and unskilled field work; a ban against employment of braceros by any enterprise where American citizens do not make up at least half of the work force; and a bar against using Mexican nationals as strikebreakers.

Without these safeguards, Biemiller declared, the use of foreign labor would continue to depress the wages, work standards and job opportunities of American agricultural wage earners.

The Meat Cutters filed a statement with the subcommittee strongly opposing any extension of Public Law 78 "which does not provide the necessary reform of the program." The union said that failure to modernize the law would contribute to continuation of "the greatest social injustice in our nation—the scandalous poverty and underprivilege of 2 million American farm workers."

Testifying for the National Consumers League, Daniel H. Pollitt, associate professor of law at the University of North Carolina, also called for reform of the program to guarantee that "it will no longer be used to depress American farm labor wages and working conditions."

Representatives of three agricultural organizations—the American Farm Bureau Federation, the American Association of Nurserymen, and the National Cotton Council—urged continuation of the program which brings in some 500,000 Mexican nationals annually. In separate testimony the agricultural groups contended that American workers refuse to do the type of "rough field work" performed by the braceros.

Double Standard Scored In Price-Rigging Cases

Haverford, Pa.—Machinists' Pres. Al J. Hayes has scored the "double standard" applied to unions, contrasting the general reaction to the jailing of electrical corporation executives for price-fixing with the passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act which was aimed at "much less corruption" in a few unions.

The answer seems to be, Hayes said in an address at Haverford College, "that business, government and the press have not accepted unions as a necessary part of a just society."

Because of this lack of acceptance, Hayes added, "a constant attack is maintained against the organizations of workers—no matter how great their contributions nor how small their transgressions."

Hayes said he thought it was "now time for business spokesmen to re-examine this traditional attitude" toward unions.

The union leader, an AFL-CIO vice-president and chairman of the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Committee, had this to say about the recent price-fixing case:

"In the first place, you will note that the individuals involved—even those who have gone to jail—have not been removed from their jobs.

"They have not been disowned even though management claims they were acting without approval from the top. Many will return to jobs paying $100,000 a year and more.

"I have seen no indication that the National Association of Manufacturers or the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is planning to expel or discipline these corrupt companies in any way. By contrast, when corruption was shown to exist in the labor movement, the AFL-CIO moved swiftly to expel, suspend and discipline the affected unions.

"I have seen no signs of outrage on the part of the senators and congressmen who claimed that corruption in a few unions was sufficient reason to impose harsh restrictions on all unions.

"None has suggested that the Landrum-Griffin Act should be extended to give government the right to police the internal affairs of all corporations. None has suggested that the individuals convicted be barred from holding further corporate offices. None has suggested enactment of a so-called 'bill of rights' for consumers or small stockholders.

"When one of these corporate officials stated recently that price-fixing and contract-rigging are the normal way to do business in a free enterprise system, I saw no evidence of editorial outrage in the nation's press."

It appears there is a double standard by which labor and other groups are judged, Hayes declared.

The reason for the double standard is lack of acceptance of unions in a time and in an industrialized society where the "impersonalization" of work makes the need for unions greater than ever, Hayes said. Unions deserve a fuller understanding of their role in preserving individual dignity, he added.

11,300 Listeners Ask Morgan Transcript

In less than four weeks, 11,300 listeners have sent written requests for a transcript of Edward P. Morgan's commentary on business morality, based on the conspiracy in the electrical industry. Morgan's broadcast received so much favorable notice that the text was printed by the AFL-CIO and offered to the radio audience.

Eric Peterson, Retired IAM Officer, Dies

Bradenton, Fla.—Eric Peterson, a member of the Machinists since 1913 and secretary-treasurer from 1945 to 1959, died following a heart attack suffered in Tampa and was buried here. He was 66.

Peterson started work as a railroad call boy in Rawlins, Wyo., and became an apprentice machinist. He joined the IAM in 1913 while the local lodge was on strike, and remained active in the union until his retirement 18 months ago. In January 1961, he was a delegate to the White House Conference on Problems of the Aging.

Peterson was appointed to the IAM field staff in 1929 after holding elective offices in locals at Rawlins and Deer Lodge, Mont., where he worked for the Milwaukee Road.

He was elected a general IAM vice president in 1940, and general secretary-treasurer in 1945. He mechanized procedures so that on his retirement the records of nearly 1 million members were completely up to date. He trained and supervised the IAM's staff of 24 traveling auditors who make periodic inspections of union financial accounts.

In 1957 Peterson was a member of a special AFL-CIO committee that drafted a code for union accounting and financial controls which later was approved as a supplement to the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Code on Financial Practices.

IAM Pres. Al J. Hayes and Sec.-Treas. Elmer E. Walker flew to Florida for the burial services. The survivors include Peterson's wife Theresa; a son, a daughter, seven grandchildren and two brothers.

Idaho House Balks at 'Agricultural R-T-W'

Boise, Ida.—A so-called "agricultural right-to-work" bill, which labor charged would have banned union shop agreements in many of this state's principal industries, has died with the adjournment of the Idaho legislature.

The Senate-passed bill was sidetracked in the House shortly before adjournment by a 29-to-25 vote to "postpone indefinitely." Five Republicans crossed party lines to vote with 24 Democrats against action and three Democrats joined 22 Republicans in opposing postponement. An earlier motion to table the "right-to-work" bill had failed on a 28-to-28 tie vote.

While supporters of the "work" bill described it as necessary protection for farmers with perishable crops, opponents pointed out that the sweeping language of the bill could apply to potato and sugar-beet processing plants and the entire transportation industry in the state.

The definition of "agricultural labor" in the bill covered persons working in food processing, packaging, freezing or the transport of "any agricultural or horticultural commodity."

Several legislators opposing the bill pointed out that Idaho voters had rejected a "right-to-work" proposal in a 1958 referendum.

A Major Anti-Bias Step

PRES. KENNEDY'S first executive order in the civil rights field is a major step in the campaign to eliminate discrimination in employment.

The strengthening and expansion of the anti-discrimination machinery through the creation of a new President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity holds out real promise that "Americans of all colors and beliefs will have equal access to employment within the government and with those who do business with the government."

The President's action came a few days after the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted a resolution at its mid-winter meeting welcoming indications that proposals to strengthen the committee were under consideration. The council declared that "even without statutory authority the President can—and should—strengthen the government contract non-discrimination policy."

The AFL-CIO hopes that the new committee will look into the federation's proposals that its authority be extended to cover all grant-in-aid programs, that it require non-discrimination throughout a contractor's labor force and that it will in fact disqualify violators of the non-discrimination pledge until cause is removed and cancel existing contracts.

As the Executive Council declared: "Prejudices and century-long practices cannot be wiped out overnight by decree. But the work of extending the frontiers of equality must go on. The AFL-CIO pledges to do whatever it can to cooperate with the newly created committee in the furtherance of this goal."

A Triumph for Unity

A UNITED LABOR MOVEMENT, utilizing its full strength on behalf of the AFL-CIO, can produce results. That's the story of the Communications Workers' victory in New York City.

After years of preparatory work and on the heels of an election defeat only 15 months ago, the CWA last week succeeded in winning representation rights for 18,000 telephone workers in New York City.

The victory over the long-entrenched "independent" union was put together by the joint efforts of the New York City AFL-CIO, many workers who first voted for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and then backed the CWA in the runoff test, and the support of other groups interested in seeing that city phone workers were represented by a bona fide AFL-CIO union. The federation nationally and regionally gave major backing.

It can be done elsewhere in other industries if the same display of unity and strength is brought to bear.

More Workers, Fewer Jobs

THE SEEMING PARADOX of employment reaching an all-time high in February 1961 while unemployment hit the highest level in 20 years is one of the major headaches afflicting the economy.

Employment reached a record high because of the nation's population growth and the continuing expansion of the labor force. Unemployment reached a 20-year high for the month because the labor force is increasing sharply while automation and technological change, plus the slump in production and sales, are taking their toll in jobs.

An economic pickup will cut some of the joblessness but it will take an economy operating at full capacity to begin to absorb the unemployed caught up in the dilemma of more workers looking for a decreasing number of jobs.

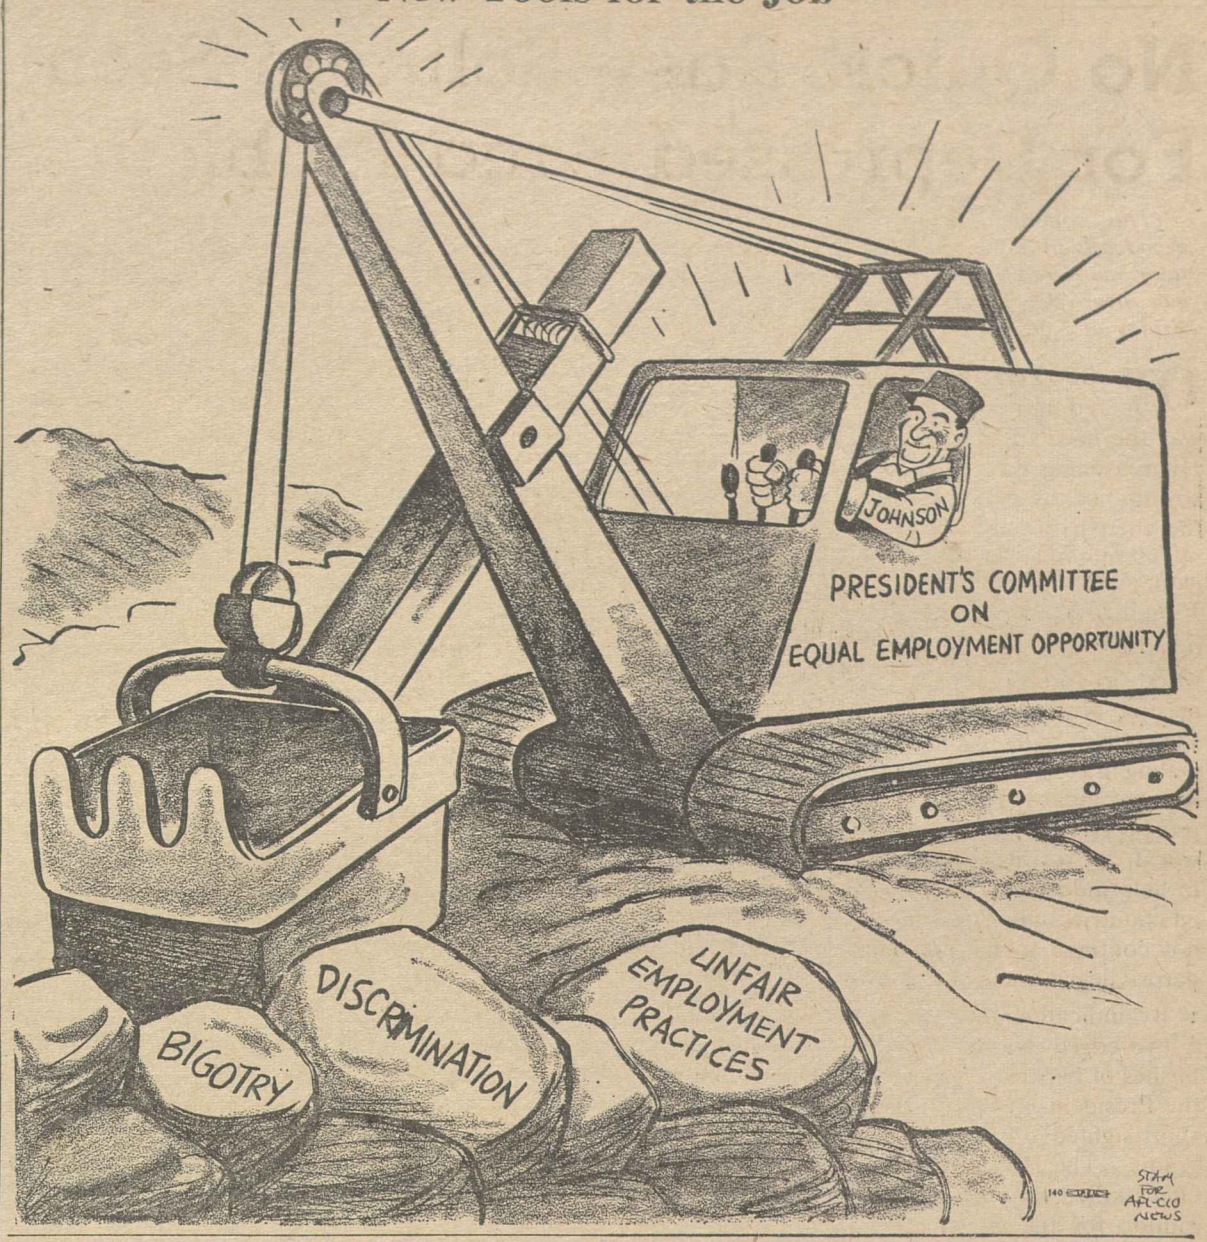
New Tools for the Job



A Milestone in Education:

Labor, Management 'Negotiate' Textbook for Detroit Schools

By Hal DeLong

LABOR AND MANAGEMENT, in response to a call from the Detroit public schools, have blazed a new trail. What is perhaps the first "negotiated" textbook in history has just come off the presses—Labor Management Dynamics—published by the Detroit Public Schools to teach teachers how to present the labor-management story in the classroom.

It is devoid of dictum in its presentation of historically controversial subject areas, including the pros and cons of the "right to work" issue, the Taft-Hartley Act, the closed shop, the union shop and protective tariffs. Its mission is to provoke analytical inquiry, record the facts (agreed upon by both factions after long periods of discourse which generated more light that heat although the latter was in abundance) and to challenge teachers to employ intellectual awareness of all shades of gray that lie between the black and white of opposite points of view.

Labor Management Dynamics was intended as an answer to a long-standing need. Both groups have periodically charged that the schools were not treating the story objectively; both have cited cases in point in unequal time and space in instruction and in textbook. The pulse of the public at the time of textbook writing has often dictated the treatment both labor and management received in the published text.

Detroit teachers said, "Give us direction in this field of labor-management. We are told that this is a delicate area of teaching and that we must be careful. We need more facts. As teachers we want and need to see the totality of this vitally important relationship in order to stimulate critical and objective thinking on the part of our students."

WITH THE BLESSINGS of Dr. Samuel M. Brownell, Detroit superintendent of schools and former U.S. Commissioner of Education, a group of educators under the leadership of Miss Elsie Beck, director of social studies for the Detroit schools, received a vigorous nod from both labor and management when invited to participate in this writing project.

Both sides assigned well-informed and articulate consultants to shepherd their causes. Management was represented by Robert C. Waldron, director of industrial relations for American Motors Corp., and a veteran management negotiator. Robert Storer, vice-president of Manufacturers National Bank, Detroit, represented another specialized area. Labor's experts included Al Barbour, president of the Wayne County AFL-CIO, and Brendan Sexton, co-ordinator of organization, Automobile Workers. Twenty-five others, including many dedicated and capable school people, worked on the two-year project.

When the Citizens Advisory Committee on Detroit School Needs pronounced its recommendations for school improvement two years ago, it clearly outlined a "plan for a sequential program of economic understanding throughout the school system which would orient students to the economy of this nation." This was endorsed by both labor and management of Detroit, as well as public school educators.

Brownell, in a foreword to the book, says: "It is essential to the well-being of the nation that these young people understand the role of both labor and management: how each is dependent upon the other, contributes to the well-being of the other, and works with the other."

ALTHOUGH WRITTEN specifically for Detroit teachers and upper senior high school students, it has application for schools and interested citizens throughout the entire country. The multiple roles of the individual and the growth of American business are traced and they lead into the history of the labor movement both here and abroad, and of collective bargaining and some of the economic problems involved.

Three chapters on federal and state action on labor-management are included, and government laws and acts since the early 1800s are condensed and chronically listed. Labor-management terms are defined and examples cited. International labor-management relations and the implications for local communities climax the book of nearly 300 pages.

"Leaders in both fields," states the book, "think of their own group both as consumers and as producers. Each must mentally manage these role-interplays in terms of a long-range view of the total economy. Indeed, as social leaders, their vision ought to go beyond economic considerations and take into acccount sociological, political, and just plain human welfare concerns."

Morgan Says:

No Quick, Easy Solution Seen For Depressed Area Problem

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

ONE OF THE POINTS Mr. Kennedy hammered hardest in last fall's election campaign was the need to "get the country moving again." His reasoning was—and is—that unless we are a strong, healthy nation internally we can't summon the energy or command the respect that our role of international leadership calls for.

Morgan

One of the difficulties is that we are obliged to work on foreign and domestic problems at the same time. On the compelling theory that raising living standards raises the prospects for a stabler world, we must continue to help industrially retarded countries. But we cannot continue to neglect underdeveloped and underprivileged areas of our own.

By indicating that the Peace Corps should be a two-edged sword, aimed at cutting down the bushes of backwardness both at home and abroad, the President may be able to counter some of the short-sighted opposition in Congress to his programs. The House Appropriations Committee in effect killed an Administration request for $150 million for the Development Loan Fund, a key instrument of the foreign aid program. At the same time the preliminary Senate handling of legislation to aid domestic depressed areas seemed to reflect a lack of awareness of the huge scope of the problem and the need for flexibility in handling it.

This subject was a major topic which Kentucky's Gov. Bert Combs, a Democrat, and the state's senior senator, John Sherman Cooper, a Republican, are scheduled to discuss with the President at the White House.

There are some subtle political complications involved here. Cooper and the Chief Executive are old colleagues and good friends. But the senator, winning re-election by a large margin, carried Kentucky into the GOP column for Vice Pres. Nixon in November. And prominent in Cooper's platform was a pledge to try to secure a TVA steam power plant for eastern Kentucky which would burn from 4 million to 8 million tons of coal a year, giving that much of a shot in the arm to the languishing coal industry.

Both parties in Kentucky are naturally for the project. But each, just as naturally, would like to claim the credit if the state wins it and blame the opposition if it doesn't.

At last reports Tennessee seemed more likely than Kentucky to land the site, not merely because she has two Democratic senators versus two Republicans for the Bluegrass state but because eastern Kentucky presents a more serious problem of water supply for the plant.

THIS EXAMPLE SHOWS, perhaps, how both political and economic considerations inevitably influence the shape of a program for readjustment of a chronically depressed area. It does not clearly show, however, the enormous difficulties involved in getting any rehabilitation program effectively operating in a stricken region. It isn't just a question, for instance, of recruiting and retraining a labor supply.

In picking a location for a new factory, most companies want to know how good the sewer system is, what the housing prospects are, how ample and modern the school facilities and what can be offered in the way of recreation—such as golf clubs and the like—for the management personnel and their families who would be accompanying the new plant to town. It would be more natural for them in most instances to select a thriving community than a ghost town.

In eastern Kentucky last week, I saw a U.S. Post Office hardly bigger than a privy. I saw privies which were the most predominant features in the yards of one-room schools, in counties which could afford no better. And one reason they couldn't was the fact that in such areas the average per capita income is often less than a thousand dollars a year.

However precise and pretty the plans to develop these quite literally underdeveloped areas of our own country may look on paper, their application is going to take far closer coordination of business, labor, civic and governmental agencies and interests than now seems to be contemplated. Some may complain this gets us closer yet to a planned welfare state. One obvious answer is that the lack of planning and the callous disregard for human welfare have made the blight and suffering more acute than they otherwise might have been.

Washington Reports:

Minimum Wage Hike Seen Helping Business, Communities

THE PROPOSED INCREASE and extension of the minimum wage would aid, rather than hurt, business, according to Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), chairman of the special subcommittee on labor of the House Labor and Education Committee, and Rep. Thor C. Tollefson (R-Wash.).

The congressmen were heard in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program, carried by 450 radio stations.

"The impact on prices (as a result of each increase of the minimum wage in the past) has been less than one-half of 1 per cent," Roosevelt asserted. "It cannot be said, on the record, that the increase in the minimum wage has ever been inflationary."

Tollefson said he didn't take much stock in the inflation charge. "I am more interested in what the bill seeks to do and the benefits that will come from it," he said. "One of the first benefits that comes to mind is that the bill will raise the income of people in the very lowest brackets who have a hard time making both ends meet."

Roosevelt said that the House bill would raise the minimum first to $1.15 and in the second year to $1.25. He defended this provision as a compromise between the Administration request that the increase be made to $1.25 in three years and the AFL-CIO contention that $1.25 should be achieved in one year, as a means of adding needed immediate purchasing power to the economy.

He said that he would like to have more than 4.35 million additional wage earners covered by the new legislation, also as asked by the AFL-CIO, but felt that the more modest goal was wiser politically. Most of those that would get coverage are in the retail and service fields.

TOLLEFSON REPORTED that replies to a 65,000-person questionnaire he had sent out showed "an overwhelming number for approval of the Fair Labor Standards Act improvements."

On the charge that workers will lose their jobs if the wage is increased and extended, Roosevelt said "The record shows there will be a few adjustments, but those displaced quickly get new jobs because of the increased purchasing power created."

Also, he asserted, anyone trying to live on $1.25 an hour is making "about half what the Labor Dept. says should be the normal income of the head of a family. And many of those who do not earn enough are on relief, a cost to the taxpayer."

Tollefson noted that provisions have been made in the bill to take care of exceptional industries, such as the fish processors. Setting the cutoff for application of the law to $1-million-a-year businesses, he said, also exempts all small business. He noted that an increase in the wage to $1.25 would help protect some of the industries in his and other states from raids by low-wage states.

House action on the bill is expected promptly, Roosevelt said.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE PILOT FOOD-STAMP plan announced by Pres. Kennedy almost immediately after his inauguration is getting under way slowly, and Dept. of Agriculture spokesmen have warned that the original costs may be comparatively substantial.

What must not be forgotten is that a wartime food-stamp plan, under which supplemental foods went to low-income families, worked with a good deal of effectiveness. There is no observable reason that a comparable plan cannot be made effective.

What should also be remembered is that authority for the federal government to establish a $1 billion annual stamp plan has existed since September 1959, and the Eisenhower Administration chose not to implement it.

When the proposal was introduced in the House, indeed, it provided for a mandatory food-stamp plan, and the former Administration sent word that if such a program were included the bill would be vetoed. Its sponsors therefore did what they could—changed the bill to a permissive rather than mandatory measure—and then they had to hold this on a rollcall vote. It was approved with House Democrats voting heavily for it, 210 to 28, but with Republicans voting against it 99 to 22.

It was well understood in advance that the Administration would refuse to put the program into effect, but there was a value in getting the machinery authorized in case the situation changed.

The reason the program requires several months to implement now is that nothing was done before to prepare for its implementation. No test plan was set up, no machinery was placed on a stand-by basis. It was necessary for the new executives of the Dept. of Agriculture to start from scratch.

Sec. Orville Freeman has now announced that six areas have been selected for the pilot-plan project, that he hopes it will go into effect by June 1 but that the start may be delayed until June 15. The program may not be a total success, some amendments to the law may be found desirable, some modifications may seem required before the plan is expanded to different areas. But at least we will have an up-to-date test.

ANOTHER CHANGE has come from a Kennedy department—Sec. of the Interior Stewart Udall is showing signs of an evident intent to return to the principle of seeking suitable unified development of major river basins.

This approach disappeared early in the Eisenhower Administration when the former President's first Secretary of the Interior, the late Douglas McKay, held a heavily attended news conference to announce that he was dropping the department's long-held support of the proposed Hells Canyon high level federal dam.

It has always been difficult to understand the thought processes that allowed people to recognize the merits of the Tennessee Valley Authority, to acknowledge its success as a federal multipurpose project that has been invaluable in war and peace—but then to say that the government must never, never try to repeat the success in another river valley. Mr. Eisenhower himself was more understandable when he revealed frank hostility and labeled any expansion of TVA as his prime example of "creeping socalism."

CONTROL of the major executive departments of the government is gained quickly by a new Administration, since it appoints its own men to what are clearly policy-making posts. Control of the independent and quasi-judicial agencies, that have regulatory powers, is a longer-term process.

Frank W. McCulloch is the first Kennedy appointee to the National Labor Relation Board, has been designated as chairman, and the President will be able to fill another vacancy soon. But three Eisenhower appointees remain. In some of the agencies, it will be a matter of several years before they can be invigorated by the appointment of new majorities.

INCREASE AND EXTENSION OF THE MINIMUM WAGE is needed to help some of the most miserably-paid workers now unable to support their families, Rep. Thor C. Tollefson (R-Wash.), left, and Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), chairman of a House special labor subcommittee, asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.

How to Buy:

Rising Consumer Bankruptcies Cause for Concern to States

By Sidney Margolius

THE NUMBER of bankruptcy cases, especially those involving wage-earners, has risen to a new all-time high, reports Commerce Clearing House, national business-law authority. So sharp is the increase that the American Bar Association has set up a committee to find out the reasons. The committee reports that bankruptcies have increased 400 percent since 1950, and are expected to show an increase of 35 percent more in the first half of this year compared to 1960.

Linn K. Twinem, head of the committee, reports that the bar association, legal aid societies, labor unions and federal bankruptcy referees all are cooperating in this investigation of the reasons for increasing bankruptcies, and ways to solve the problem. Representing labor is Robert C. Mayer of the AFL-CIO general counsel's office.

What's particularly alarming is the extra-large increase in personal or "consumer" bankruptcies. Twinem reports that 75 percent of the bankruptcies in 1940 involved wage-earners, and 25 percent businesses. But in 1960, 90 percent of the larger total number of bankruptcies involved wage-earners, and only 10 percent businessmen.

Not only is the number of actual bankruptcies rising, but so is the number of cases involving debt-extension plans for wage-earners, says Commerce Clearing House. These cases are filed under special provisions of the Bankruptcy Act which permit wage-earners to postpone payments of their debts under court supervision.

THE REASONS BEHIND the growing number of bankruptcies are something you and your organization ought to know about, so you can know how to cope with such problems.

The most immediate reason is the recession and unemployment. Many working people have reached the point where they simply have no assets left. Twinem points out that it is noticeable that few of the recent bankrupts had any remaining assets left to pay creditors.

In California, for example, the plight of wage-earners has reached the point where Gov. Pat Brown has asked banks, utilities and landlords to use "restraint" in collecting bills. Business papers pointed out that this is the first time a California governor has found it necessary to make such an appeal since the big depression of the 1930's. Brown said "a great many people are being dispossessed" or are having electricity, gas and water cut off.

California, of course, is not the only state where working families are having this problem. Illinois and Oregon also are experiencing a particular problem with bankruptcies.

It's significant that these three states are so far out of line, with more bankruptcies even than heavily industrial states like Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York, Twinem says.

He believes that the large number of bankruptcies in some states occurs because the laws in those states permit harsh collection methods, such as severe garnishee procedures, and the requirement to pay a deficiency judgment even after the installment purchase has been repossessed.

"Wage-earners subject to being fired by their employers for garnishees tend to take the extreme action of going into bankruptcy," Twinem told this reporter. In New York State, he points out, a creditor can take only 10 percent of a man's wage, and no matter how many creditors there are, only 10 percent is paid out at a time. But in Illinois, creditors can tie up a large part of a man's wage, leaving him without sufficient income to support his family. In such states, even if a worker isn't in danger of being fired, he may be pressured into bankruptcy to protect his family.

YOU CAN'T CONTROL emergencies like unemployment. But heavy installment debts, which the experts say is a reason for the bankruptcy increase, are more controllable. The way to control debts is by working out a budget and saving ahead for the things you want, or at least for a substantial down payment so the remaining balance is not too large to handle.

Both the AFL-CIO and Credit Union National Association have started programs to counsel working families on money management and installment practices. Employers too are concerned. A survey in one Chicago factory showed that workers whose pay was garnisheed or attached caused 50 percent more accidents.

Orville Freeman Writes:

Farmers, Workers Have Common Goals

The following is excerpted from an article prepared for Press Associates Inc. by Sec. of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman on the relationship between farmers and workers.

THOSE IN LABOR who blame agriculture for the "high cost of food," or who say "farmers get rich at taxpayers' expense," or "farmers are subsidized to make up for their inefficiency," suffer from an understanding gap.

Similarly, those in the farm group who believe that "most labor leaders are dishonest," "most labor unions featherbed," "organized labor is responsible for the high cost of living," have an understanding gap of their own.

Why should this be? Historically, farmers and workers have had much in common. They are economic brothers in toil. They depend upon each other. They need each other. The farmer raises the beef which the worker processes into food. The worker helps make the equipment which the farmer uses to grow the food that keeps us all alive. Most of our clothing comes from cotton or wool or livestock produced on U.S. farms. Our homes are built out of lumber which grew not only in the nation's forests but on farm woodlots.

Surely, it should be easy for farmers and workers to understand their mutual interdependence. Surely, it is plain that the biggest factor in the prosperity of the farmer has always been plenty of food money in the purses of U.S. workers and their families. And surely, it is evident that agriculture as a $40 billion customer for the products and services of the U.S. economy, pays the salaries of millions of industrial workers.

WHY, THEN, do labor and agriculture stand apart? One reason is that labor and agriculture have neglected far too long to keep up their mutual lines of communication.

That is why such misunderstandings about the cost of food exist.

How much, do you think, the cost of your market basket of food increased between 1952 and 1960?

The answer will probably surprise you—less than 2 per cent. During this period other cost-of-living items rose about 15 percent. In fact, the marketing charges associated with this food basket rose 17 per cent.

What accounted for the difference? A decline of 15 per cent in the prices farmers received for the food products they produced. In a sense, therefore, it is the farmers who have been subsidizing the rest of the economy.

Another way to look at it is to see how much of the average dollar spent for food is returned to farmers. In 1946 the farmer received 52 cents out of the average food dollar, and in 1952, 47 cents. But in 1960 he got only 39 cents.

IN THIS COUNTRY agricultural production per man-hour of work has tripled since 1940, and almost doubled since 1950. Compared with 20 years ago, one-third fewer farmers are producing food and fiber for one-third more people and providing them with better diets.

Now I don't mean to say that all of this increased efficiency is attributable to what farmers have done by and for themselves. Machinery, fertilizers, chemicals, new plant varieties have all played major roles in this outstanding success story. Without these products and the improvements in these products made by industry, today's farm productivity would be impossible.

Moreover, the lower relative cost of food is due also to the increasing productivity of the U.S. laborer and the vigorous role his unions have played in winning better wages and working conditions. This is something more farm people need to understand. And this illustrates what I mean when I say farmers and laborers depend on one another—need one another.

Farmers and laborers have a common objective—a steadily rising standard of living for themselves and for all our people. Let them seek it together in mutual understanding, realizing that prosperity is like a boy and strawberry jam—he can't spread it without getting some on himself.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Leftover Prescriptions Make A Delightfully Neurotic Hobby

By Jane Goodsell

SOME PEOPLE sigh nostalgically over old wedding veils and faded love letters. I prefer to browse through my medicine cabinet and reminisce over the ailments of yesteryear.

Let others wax sentimental over antique milk glass and century-old rosewood. Give me, instead, a tube of dried-up sulfa ointment or a bottle of dehydrated cough syrup. My hobby is collecting leftover prescriptions.

What a thrill it is to open the door of my medicine cabinet and view my collection! I am justly proud of it because it is one of the largest collections in existence today. Prescription collecting is a popular hobby, but I believe there are few exhibits to compare with mine.

What a satisfaction it is to gaze upon all the little bottles, jars and boxes, piled six deep on top of one another. They bring it all back to me—memories of past cases of indigestion, insomnia and diaper rash.

Every time a bottle tumbles out of the medicine cabinet, I blink back a sentimental tear. Who knows? Perhaps this is the prescription that cured that stubborn case of pinkeye a couple of years ago. Or it could be those miraculous vitamin capsules for expectant mothers. Who knows?

THE PRINT on the prescription containers provides interesting clues to the nature of the remedy. But, like antique markings, they are merely clues and not pat answers. They never spoil the game by stating directly that the prescription is to be used for poison oak or night wakefulness.

Instead, they merely give the name of the doctor who prescribed them, the date and directions like: "Apply locally"; "One every four hours"; "Use as directed."

I have been asked whether I make any practical use of my collection. This seems to me a ridiculous question. People don't collect stamps in order to have a ready supply of postage, do they?

The person who keeps asking me this question is my husband, who has a very intolerant attitude toward my collection. He refers to it as "that claptrap in the medicine cabinet."

What's more, he has delivered an ultimatum that, if it isn't all cleared out by midnight tonight, he will personally serve my entire collection to me in a casserole dish, combined with cheese sauce and topped with buttered crumbs.

Poor Planning Seen In Air 'Traffic Jam'

Too little imaginative planning and too much stress on scientific rather than human factors are the chief underlying causes of commercial air disasters, according to two experts on air safety.

Clarence Sayen, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, and Francis McDermott, executive director of the Air Traffic Control Association, were sharply critical of existing facilities in discussing "Aerial Traffic Jam," the fourth topic in the "Briefing Session" public affairs television series presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Education Television & Radio Center.

As explained by John MacVane, permanent news analyst on "Briefing Session," air traffic control is based on wrapping each plane in a package of air, or "flight box," and keeping these boxes from overlapping.

With modern radar controls, these "boxes" are cylinders, three miles in radius and 1,000 feet deep. And they move at rates ranging from the DC-3's 180 miles an hour to a jet's 600.

"All the parts of the system can be measured, and we can anticipate their forward motion; therefore, it is the kind of a problem that the trained scientific mind can analyze, reduce to a computer and solve," McDermott said. "Every team that has been formed during the last 15 years to attack this problem has been dominated by engineers. The voice of the practical air traffic controller simply has not been heard."

One result has been a death toll of 364 in 1960, as against 226 in 1959 and 129 in 1958, MacVane's analysis noted earlier.

Sayen emphasized that adequate airports were also essential to safety.

Airport Bottlenecks Hit

"There's no use in building an efficient airway between two areas and leaving a bottleneck at both ends," he said.

Both men agreed that the establishment of the Federal Aviation Agency as an independent arm of government in 1958 was an important step forward, but both charged that the FAA had not exploited its potential for leadership.

The first requisite is a long-range, overall plan, Sayen asserted.

"The air traffic control is a patchwork," he said. "We have put one patch on top of another patch on top of another patch, without knowing exactly where we were going." This, he argued, accounted for the resistance in Congress and elsewhere to large appropriations for air facilities.

An important immediate defect, the experts pointed out, is that many aircraft—notably military—maintain clearance by visual means, and are not incorporated into the control system.

As the discussion neared its end, Edward P. Morgan, regular host of the program, showed signs of apprehension.

"I am getting a bit of gooseflesh here," he said, "and I perhaps need a little psychological helping hand. All of us are going out of the studio later and probably taking airplanes. Should we be scared to death?"

"Not at all," McDermott reassured him.

Health Care Next Topic for TV Panelists

Perhaps the most controversial item in the Kennedy Administration's legislative program—medical care for the aged—will be discussed on the fifth showing of "Briefing Session," the public affairs television series.

Dr. George A. Silver, chief of the division of social medicine, Montefiore Hospital, New York, and a proponent of the social security approach, will lock horns with Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.), a vigorous spokesman for the opposition.

Curtis, now in his sixth term, is ranking minority member of the Joint Congressional Economic Committee, a member of the Ways and Means Committee and senior Republican on the social security subcommittee. He is a tax expert and a leading spokesman for the conservative wing of Congress on economic affairs.

Dr. Silver's major interest for many years has been the problem of making medical care available to those who need it. He is director of the Montefiore group in the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, a pioneer prepaid group practice organization. His articles have appeared in many magazines, and he is the author of a forthcoming book, "The Family Health Team."

Nixon 'Joblessness' Laid to Ike's Policies

Prof. Paul A. Samuelson, head of Pres. Kennedy's pre-inauguration economic task force, thinks Republicans are missing the point when they minimize the recession.

"If Mr. Eisenhower—and I speak of his advisers generally—had been on the ball in this matter, I think the whole country would be grateful to him," Samuelson said on a "Briefing Session" program.

"I think one man who is out of a job might have been grateful to him too, and that is Mr. Nixon."

Union Membership Rises in California

San Francisco—California union membership passed the 1.75 million mark for the first time in 1960 despite declines in two areas—Los Angeles-Long Beach and San Francisco—the state Dept. of Industrial Relations has reported.

Based on questionnaires returned by nearly 3,400 local unions, unions had an estimated 1,756,000 members in this state last July, about 15,000 more than in the preceding July. Los Angeles area membership was an estimated 760,400, about 3,100 under the July 1957 peak. A drop of 5,300 members was reported in the six-county San Francisco area. The July 1960 total was 463,400, compared with a peak of 479,500 in July 1957.

Labor Asks Rights for Non-Profit Employes

Albany, N. Y.—An "Operation First Class Citizen" legislative conference here has called on the New York State Legislature to require non-profit organizations to bargain collectively and to make unemployment insurance benefits available to employes of voluntary hospitals and other non-profit groups.

Participating in the conference were delegations from local unions of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; the State, County & Municipal Employes; Building Service Employes; Transport Workers.

MORE COLLABORATORS than contestants were Francis McDermott, left, executive director of the Air Traffic Control Association, and Clarence Sayen, president of the Air Line Pilots Association, in their discussion of "Aerial Traffic Jam" on the fourth "Briefing Session" television program.

16 More TV Stations Show 'Briefing' Series

Sixteen additional TV stations will begin showing the AFL-CIO-sponsored "Briefing Session" series the week of March 19, bringing to 53 the total of stations that will currrently be carrying the program. Strikebreaker Bill Approved In Washington

Olympia, Wash.—Washington became the fourth state to restrict the importation of professional strikebreakers as a labor-backed anti-strikebreaking bill moved quickly through both houses of the legislature. Gov. Albert D. Rosellini (D) has indicated he will sign the bill when it reaches his desk.

The measure would make it unlawful for anyone not directly involved in a labor-management dispute to recruit workers from outside the state for employment in struck industries.

Sen. Bob Baily (D), a member of the Typographical Union and one of the sponsors of the measure, told the Senate that the proposed law would prevent situations from developing in the state similar to the Portland newspaper dispute when the publishers of two newspapers brought in professional strikebreakers, including men with criminal records.

The Senate gave 44-to-2 approval to the bill and the House acted soon thereafter. Minor differences in language were quickly reconciled and the bill moved through final passage.

A similar bill passed the West Virginia House by a 95-to-1 vote. It faces a "rocky road" in the Senate, however, the State AFL-CIO reported. Because of a "double reference," it must be cleared by the Judiciary Committee in addition to the Senate Labor Committee.

Both bills are modeled after a Pennsylvania law. New Jersey earlier this year enacted a considerably stronger measure and Massachusetts has a registration and disclosure bill aimed at discouraging, although not flatly preventing, the use of strikebreakers.

71 Texans Seek Johnson Senate Seat

Austin, Tex.—Seventy-one candidates—70 Democrats and a lone Republican—will be pitted against each other in a special election Apr. 4 to fill the Senate seat vacated by Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

Leading the field of 70 Democrats are former State Rep. Maury Maverick, Jr., who has endorsement of the Texas State Committee on Political Education; State Sen. Henry B. Gonzalez; and Sen. William A. Blakely (D-Tex.), now holding an interim appointment to Johnson's seat.

The lone Republican is John G. Tower, who polled an unusually heavy vote against Johnson last November.

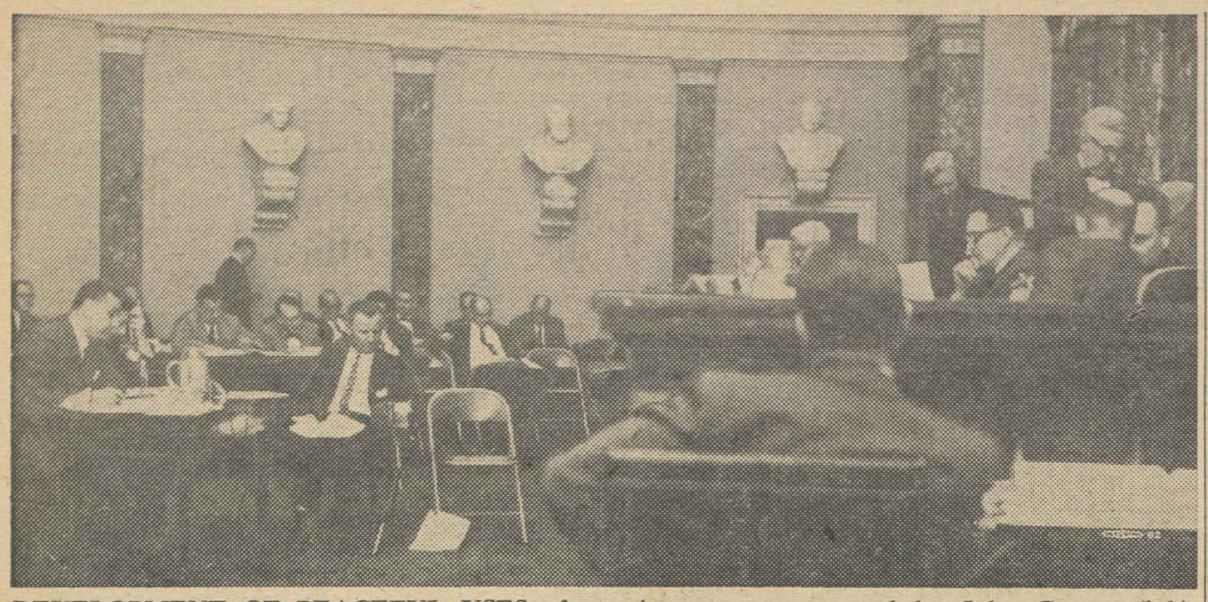
If no candidate wins a majority in the Apr. 4 election, Gov. Price Daniel (D) will be required to set a date for a runoff between the two leading candidates. The runoff will take place within 40 days of the Apr. 4 balloting.

M. K. Udall Wins Arizona Primary

Tucson, Ariz.—Morris K. Udall, 38-year-old lawyer and brother of Interior Sec. Stewart L. Udall, has scored an overwhelming victory in a six-man Democratic primary for the House seat left vacant when the elder Udall brother joined Pres. Kennedy's Cabinet.

In winning the primary, Udall piled up a margin of better than 6-1 over his nearest opponent, former Rep. Harold Patten.

Udall will face Republican Mac C. Matheson in a general election May 2. Matheson, unopposed in the GOP primary, was defeated by Stewart Udall last November by a vote of 95,512 to 75,811.



DEVELOPMENT OF PEACEFUL USES of atomic energy was urged by John Curran (left), AFL-CIO legislative representative who subbed for Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller in testimony before Joint Committee on Atomic Energy headed by Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.). Accompanying Curran was George Taylor, economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

AFL-CIO Urges U.S. Leadership In Peaceful Atomic Development

Creation of a "vigorous, progressive" national policy for peaceful development of nuclear energy, coupled with a sound program of safety standards to protect workers in this industry, has been called for by the AFL-CIO.

In testimony before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller was sharply critical of the policies of the Atomic Energy Commission under the Eisenhower Administration, declaring that the failure of private industry to move ahead in this field in the past six years "lays bare the bankruptcy" of the Eisenhower theory of government-industry "partnership."

Biemiller's testimony was presented to the committee by John Curran, AFL-CIO legislative representative. He was accompanied by George Taylor, an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The AFL-CIO testimony urged action at this session of Congress on a "pioneering" program of atomic energy development that would include:

● A full-scale nuclear power demonstration program designed to bring costs into competition with coal, oil and natural gas in high-cost fuel areas by 1970, and into competition in all other areas of the country by 1975.

● Appropriations for construction of an atomic power installation at the Hanford, Wash., reactor, with the power to be marketed through the Bonneville Power Administration.

"Three times since 1952," the AFL-CIO pointed out, "there have been power brownouts in the region" because of low water on the Columbia River, chief power source in the region. "This has resulted in large-scale shutdowns of aluminum plants with attendant loss of wages and production."

● Supplemental appropriations to accelerate work on a pilot project for developing low-cost power through fusion of the heavy hydrogen atom.

● Amendment of the Atomic Energy Act to permit all federal resource agencies to participate in atomic power development as a "logical extension of the yardstick policy of public competition" to stimulate reduction in costs of commercially produced nuclear power.

In the area of safety, Biemiller's testimony again registered labor's "strong opposition" to a 1959 law which ceded much of the responsibility for developing adequate safety programs to the states and urged either repeal of the law or "drastic amendment" to put the federal government in a position of central responsibility for radiation safety standards.

At the same time labor urged enactment of federal workmen's compensation legislation that would provide adequate care "for workers who may be injured, become ill or die from radiation exposure in spite of the best conceived standards and the most effective regulations."

In a supplementary statement filed with the joint committee the Fire Fighters asked that their union be represented on the Federal Radiation Council and urged that more stringent regulations be enacted regulating transportation of radioactive material.

To Meet April Deadline:

Labor Asks Senate To Speed TUC Bill

The AFL-CIO, warning that every day 7,000 workers exhaust state jobless pay without finding work, has urged the Senate to give swift approval to the House-passed Temporary Unemployment Compensation bill so that added benefits can begin Apr. 1.

In testimony prepared for delivery before the Senate Finance Committee, Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said the $1 billion measure was "deficient" in two respects but declared that efforts to improve the bill would mean "undue delay" in providing aid to the jobless.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg also urged the committee, headed by Sen. Harry Flood Byrd (D-Va.), to approve the measure promptly in order to meet the April deadline which Pres. John F. Kennedy set in sending the anti-recession measure to Capitol Hill.

Current figures showing 5.7 million unemployed, Goldberg said, fail to convey the "graphic story of human distress and suffering." There are presently 1.6 million persons who have been unemployed for more than three month, he said, and of this number over 50 percent have been jobless for more than half a year.

Bill 'Deficient'

Cruikshank said the TUC bill, passed by an overwhelming 392-30 vote in the House, was "deficient" both in its method of financing and in its failure to provide uniform temporary assistance to the long-term jobless. But to take time for correcting this situation, he said, would be to "delay help to the 720,000 who are now waiting" for aid.

The House measure would extend jobless benefits for a period half again as long as that currently provided by state programs, with a ceiling of 39 weeks of combined federal and state aid. It would be financed by raising the tax rate from 3.1 to 3.5 percent, instead of a permanent hike in the taxable wage base from $3,000 to $4,800, as originally urged both by Kennedy and the AFL-CIO.

While the Senate committee considered the TUC bill the House, by voice vote, passed a companion bill providing $24 million in extended jobless pay benefits for 60,000 unemployed railroad workers. The program would be financed by a one-fourth of 1 percent increase in the tax on carriers for a two-year period beginning Jan. 1, 1962.

In his testimony before the Byrd committee, Cruikshank repeated the AFL-CIO plea that action on the TUC measure be followed by permanent improvement in the program which would include federal standards, below which the states could not fall, governing the amount and duration of benefits.

He noted that the AFL-CIO Executive Council said earlier this month that if Congress had enacted such standards in 1958, as labor urged, when the first TUC bill was passed, "much of the sting would have been taken out of the present emergency" and that the downturn in the economy "would have been substantially slowed down."

AFGE Suit Hits Denial Of Right to Petition

The Government Employes have filed suit seeking reinstatement with back pay for a worker who was fired from his civil service job for petitioning Congress.

AFGE Pres. James A. Campbell said the union's court action is being financed by the AFGE Legal Rights Fund, which is used to bring test cases involving basic rights of government workers.

He charged that the dismissal of Richard J. Steck, a civilian employe at the Marine Corps Supply Center, Barstow, Calif., violated both the constitutional right of petition and a 1948 law specifically protecting the right of federal employes to furnish information to Congress.

Steck's alleged offense was that in August 1958 he petitioned his congressman, Rep. Harry R. Sheppard (D), for an "unbiased inquiry" into management's personnel practices at the base.

He said in his petition, which was addressed to the congressman's field secretary, that employes who had signed previous complaints had been "confronted by a grilling from higher authority . . . to recant" their statements.

Fired For Petition

Some two weeks later, after a hearing before a Marine Corps lieutenant colonel, Steck was fired on the grounds that he violated regulations by circulating a petition during working hours and that he violated a 1913 Anti-Lobbying Act by improperly trying to influence Congress.

His union appealed the dismissal to the Secretary of the Navy and won a reversal on the grounds that the dismissal procedure followed was improper.

The Navy restored Steck to duty but in the spring of 1959 filed amended charges against him, including the assertion that his actions had created "a morale problem" and "interfered with efficiency."

The dismissal this time was upheld by the Navy Dept. and the Civil Service Commission, although the commission ruled that there was no evidence that Steck's actions "adversely affected morale."

Suppression Charged

AFGE Attorney Edward L. Merrigan, in a suit for reinstatement filed in U.S. District Court and in a petition for back pay filed with the U.S. Court of Claims, charged that the dismissal was motivated by the desire of officials of the installation to suppress "lawful criticism . . . and any investigations" of their actions.

He charged that a Navy regulation requiring approval of the commanding officer before any petition can be circulated at Navy installations violates the First Amendment to the Constitution by denying the right "to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

Furthermore, the AFGE brief asserted, the dismissal action violates a 1948 law which declares: "The right of persons employed in the civil service of the United States, either individually or collectively to petition Congress, or any member thereof, or to furnish information . . . shall not be denied or interfered with."

Labor in Cleveland Studies Health Plan

Cleveland — A committee has been named by the Cleveland AFL-CIO to recommend a program for reducing the cost of health care for union members. Under study are two possibilities—a chain of cooperative drug stores and a diagnostic health center in cooperation with the Ladies' Garment Workers or the Clothing Workers.

The action was prompted by the success of the union eye-care center launched here in 1959. Committee members are Cecil B. Dunlap, Retail Store Employes; Ed Moss, Machinists; Max Amdur, Clothing Workers; and Joseph Murphy, Building Service Employes.

Inadequate Training Tied to Atomic Blast

The recent explosion of an atomic reactor at Arco, Ida., which claimed three lives, "might have been avoided" if proper training and safety programs had been in effect, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has declared.

Freeman, in a letter to Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.), chairman of the Joint Atomic Energy Commission of Congress, warned that "short cuts" must be avoided in the nuclear energy field since human lives are at stake.

Safety Rules Questioned

The IBEW president said the fatal blast on Jan. 3 might not have taken place "had the reactor been properly manned; had the three men been working under qualified supervision and with proper technical assistance; and if rules, regulations and carefully planned procedures had been in effect and strictly followed."

Freeman also expressed the union's dissatisfaction with the manner in which the emergency was handled following the explosion, declaring that "we cannot condone and shall not permit our members to be unnecessarily exposed to unmeasurable radiation . . . in 'emergencies' . . . (and) we are concerned lest the (Arco) accident indicates a trend toward these practices."

The IBEW, he said, concurs in the recent report made to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Fred MacGowan, a member of the federation's Atomic Energy Committee, which emphasized the acute need for re-examination of the safety provisions of the design, construction and location of certain types of reactors.

MacGowan's report on the Arco explosion, Meany declared, made it clear that in the future power reactors should be permitted close to centers of population only if there can be assurances of "absolute containment" of radioactive material in the case of an accident.

Freeman stated his belief that the nuclear industry can be operated "for the distinct benefit of all mankind" and pledged the IBEW's readiness "to help bring about advancement of the technological and industrial phases of the science." He added:

"However, we will oppose the introduction into reactor operations of . . . short cuts, abbreviated crews, short-time training programs, lack of supervision, lack of adequate technical assistance, and the philosophy that one man can accomplish two or more jobs at the same time."

He pointed out that the IBEW apprenticeship program requires four or five years of training before a member becomes a qualified journeyman. Referring to the training given the two soldiers and a sailor who were killed while manning the Arco reactor, Freeman said:

"We cannot conceive how a four-month training period in each of the reactor phases—namely nuclear and reactor theory, operation and maintenance—can produce an operator who is qualified to work on any reactor system or component."

'Long Overdue':

Schnitzler Urges Area Bill Passage

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler has called on Congress to improve and then pass Pres. Kennedy's area redevelopment legislation "to stop the spreading cancer of area blight."

Testifying before a House Banking & Currency subcommittee, Schnitzler said enactment of aid to chronically depressed areas is "already long overdue." Since 1956, he said, AFL-CIO spokesmen have testified seven times in favor of such legislation, and two area redevelopment bills passed by Congress were vetoed by former Pres. Eisenhower.

In calling for action on a "comprehensive approach" to the problem of stricken communities, the AFL-CIO official urged Congress to amend White House proposals to:

- Place administration of the program in the hands of an independent agency, as a "reasonable" compromise between the Administration's view that the program should be administered by the Commerce Dept., and labor's belief that it should be in the hands of the Labor Dept.
- Broaden criteria under which communities qualify for assistance to provide prompt aid for areas "suddenly and catastrophically" hit by the permanent shutdown of a plant on which most of the community depends for a living, and to permit "preventive" aid for communities "pressing close to the eligibility criteria."

The House hearings came as the Senate Banking Committee, by an 8-7 vote, reported out a $394 million area aid bill for early floor action. The Senate bill gave technical control of the program to the Commerce Dept., as Kennedy had requested, but established the post of an administrator appointed directly by the President. Policy decisions would be placed in the hands of a Cabinet committee headed by the Commerce Secretary.

Goldberg Emphasizes Need

Appearing before the House subcommittee, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg said the need of area redevelopment legislation is underscored by the fact that there now are 76 major labor market areas and 152 smaller ones with an unemployment rate above 6 percent.

Goldberg warned that development of automation could create new distressed areas "if nothing is done to anticipate the dislocation which may occur." Automation, he said, "need not be an evil," but its short-term effects "can be near catastrophic when entire communities are affected." The Administration's area bill would provide money to retrain workers for new and different jobs.

In opposing Commerce Dept. supervision of the area aid program, Schnitzler noted that the department is "highly influenced by its Business Advisory Council, a group dominated by spokesmen for the Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and other big business representatives who have been consistently unsympathetic towards a meaningful federal effort to aid the chronically depressed areas."

C of C Opposed

Testifying for the C of C, Robert P. Lee, assistant to the vice president of Connecticut Light and Power Co., opposed area aid legislation on the ground that the federal government would be using tax money to "help some communities attract industries and jobs at the expense of others."

The chamber spokesman said the bill would "pirate" jobs from some communities, adding: "You cannot effectively create jobs in this program, you can only move them from one area to another and even that device will not work in the areas of most serious long-term distress."

METHODIST YOUTH SEMINAR brought some 60 young men and women from all parts of the nation to AFL-CIO headquarters for briefing by Rev. Charles Webber, AFL-CIO Representative for Religious Relations. The group was winding up a weeklong study on problems of "Peace and World Order," including meetings with United Nations staff members in New York and with religious and political leaders.

Schoemann Gives Labor Support To Kennedy's School-Grant Plan

AFL-CIO vice president declared, the American trade union movement has actively supported public education and its backing of the Kennedy proposal is a continuation of that principle. The school bill, he said, would insure that the federal government plays "its fair part in support of education" while containing "proper safeguards against any possible attempt at federal control of education."

Under the Administration proposal, introduced by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), chairman of the subcommittee, each state would receive a federal grant of no less than $15 for every public school student each year during the three-year period. Distribution would be made under an "equalization formula" guaranteeing more funds for states with low per capita income.

The bill calls for federal outlays of $666 million in the first year of operation, $766 million the second, and $866 million the third, with 10 per cent of the funds allocated to each state annually to be earmarked for such special areas of educational need as depressed communities and slum neighborhoods.

Leadoff witness before the Morse subcommittee was Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff, who dismissed as "unfounded" the contention by critics of the bill that federal control of education would result from the use of federal funds.

Noting that the federal government has provided aid to schools, in varying forms, for more than 175 years, Ribicoff said that in his six years as governor of Connecticut "not once has the federal government exercised control, directly or indirectly, over education."

Sen. J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and former president of the University of Arkansas, said the status of public school teachers "is one of the most disgraceful aspects of our society."

Teachers, he said, "have the responsibility for shaping the minds and hearts of our children and yet they are regarded by many as little more than full-time baby sitters. They are woefully underpaid and overworked."

Church School Issue

As the hearings opened controversy swirled on Capitol Hill over Kennedy's express exemption of parochial schools from the bill's provisions for federal grants. The President said Supreme Court decisions had made it clear that such aid would be unconstitutional, and that there was "no room for debate" on the issue.

Rep. John W. McCormack (D-Mass.), House majority leader, said he would move to have low-cost loans to private schools included in the bill. At his Mar. 8 press conference, the President said he was "extremely sympathetic" to families paying taxes for public education and simultaneously financing non-public schools, but urged that the question of loans to private schools be weighed "as a separate matter."

In presenting the AFL-CIO position to the Senate subcommittee, Schoemann declared that the latest U.S. Office of Education figures show that as of last September 76,000 classrooms across the nation were unsatisfactory and an additional 66,100 classrooms were needed to house students now forced to attend school on a half-day basis.

Because of the low salaries being paid teachers, he said, there is a shortage of at least 250,000 public school teachers while another 91,500 teachers have "substandard" educational qualifications but are being used on an "emergency" basis because of the acute shortage.

The basic fault, he said, is that teachers "do not earn a full living wage." Schoemann pointed to the Labor Dept.'s City Workers' Family Budget which showed that a married worker with two children requires at least $6,130 per year for a "modest but adequate" standard of living. The teacher's annual salary of $4,730, he said, "leaves him with only a subsistence wage level."

Hails Labor Provision

The AFL-CIO official, president of the Plumbers and Pipe Fitters, hailed the bill's inclusion of the labor standards safeguards of the Davis-Bacon Act and overtime provisions. He urged that language be dropped which provides an exemption from these standards where a public school facility is constructed with volunteer labor.

He said labor also opposed Administration plans for cutting grants to so-called "federally impacted" areas as a step toward ending this program. These grants currently are paid in areas where a facility of the federal government imposes a heavy burden on local public schools. Kennedy had declared that the new grants under the school aid bill would help ease the situation, but Schoemann said they would not be sufficient to offset the strain on local schools.

Schoemann also declared that passage of the bill, in addition to strengthening the school system, would also "do much to overcome the recession which grips the nation," since it would provide hundreds of thousands of jobs both for jobless workers in the building trades and for factory workers producing building materials.

President Gives New Contracts Unit Broad Powers to Wipe Out Job Bias

study of current government employment practices—an examination of the status of members of minority groups in every department, agency and office" of the federal government. He called the survey "the most thorough ever undertaken," and said that it would give the Administration "an accurate assessment of our present position and a yardstick by which to measure future progress."

The President named Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson to head the new committee and designated Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg as vice chairman, charged with "the execution and implementation of the policies and purposes" of the executive order.

Vigorous Enforcement Pledged

"I have dedicated my Administration to the cause of equal opportunity in employment by the government or its contractors," Kennedy declared. "The Vice President, the Secretary of Labor and the other members of this committee share my dedication. I have no doubt that the vigorous enforcement of this order will mean the end of such discrimination."

The new committee combines the functions formerly assigned to the President's Committee on Government Contracts, headed during the Eisenhower Administration by former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon, and those handled by the President's Committee on Government Employment. In tone and scope, Kennedy's directive went beyond the approach of the Eisenhower Administration.

Walter P. Reuther, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., hailed the President's executive order and declared it "highlights the priority" the Administration has given to civil rights action.

Lacked 'Moral Courage'

Reuther, who served on the President's Committee on Government Contracts during the Eisenhower Administration, told delegates to the IUD's legislative conference that it "never did the job . . . because it never summoned the moral courage to cancel contracts."

Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee and long active in the anti-discrimination fight, told the IUD conference: "I applaud the issuance of Pres. Kennedy's executive order designed to wipe out discrimination."

In addition to listing specific sanctions which can be invoked for noncompliance, Kennedy's executive order toughened up requirements in agreements between the government and private contractors.

Companies will be required to file compliance reports that will include information on the membership policies of unions, and when bidding on a government job contractors will have to submit a statement by the officers of all unions involved that they do not discriminate on account of race.

'Affirmative Action' Required

In the future, contracts will not only contain the promise that the contractor will not discriminate, but will require the contractor to "take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed, and that employes are treated during employment, without discrimination."

The contractor must also promise to state in "all solicitations or advertisements for employes" that qualified applicants will be considered without regard to race.

Finally the contract will include a declaration that, in the event of noncompliance either with the contract clauses or with orders of the Johnson committee, the agreement may be cancelled and the contractor "declared ineligible for further government contracts."

Rep. Hansen Named To House Unit

Rep. Julia Butler Hansen (D-Wash.) has been elected to the House Education and Labor Committee to fill the last remaining vacancy in the Democratic majority.

The AFL-CIO News of Feb. 18, 1961 incorrectly listed Rep. Fernand J. St. Germain (D-R. I.) as a member of the committee.

House Unit Clears Minimum Wage Bill

4.3 Million Additional Workers Protected

The House Labor Committee, by a 19-12 vote, has approved a wage-hour bill extending coverage to 4.3 million additional workers and raising the minimum, in two steps for those already covered, to $1.25 an hour.

The coverage was virtually the same as that recommended by Pres. John F. Kennedy. The committee headed by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) earlier had given tentative approval to inclusion of 300,000 hotel, motel and restaurant workers but dropped this provision before final action.

The committee had first sought to speed up the White House timetable which called for $1.15 an hour four months after signing of the bill, $1.20 a year later, and $1.25 after an added 12 months. In the end, however, it acceded to an Administration request for a slowdown and approved a formula calling for the $1.15 floor remaining in effect for two years and then jumping to $1.25.

As the committee completed action on the minimum wage bill, a key measure in the President's legislative program, Kennedy sent additional messages to Capitol Hill in which he called for:

- An all-out fight against slums and substandard homes, urging Congress to redeem the pledge of the 1949 Housing Act to provide "a decent home and suitable living environment for every American family."
- "Timely completion" of the federal highway program by continuing the 4-cent-a-gallon federal gasoline tax, scheduled to be cut back to 3 cents on July 1, coupled with an increase in taxes on trucks and diesel fuel to retain the "pay-as-you-go" principle.

Broad Housing Action

In his housing message, the President asked for $2.5 billion in grants over four years for slum clearance and rebuilding; $50 million for additional public facilities loans; authority for Public Housing Administration grants to construct 100,000 low-rent housing units; low-interest loans for construction of rental and cooperative housing; $50 million for direct loans to construct housing for the elderly; and experimental use of no-down-payment, 40-year FHA-insured mortgages on homes under $13,500.

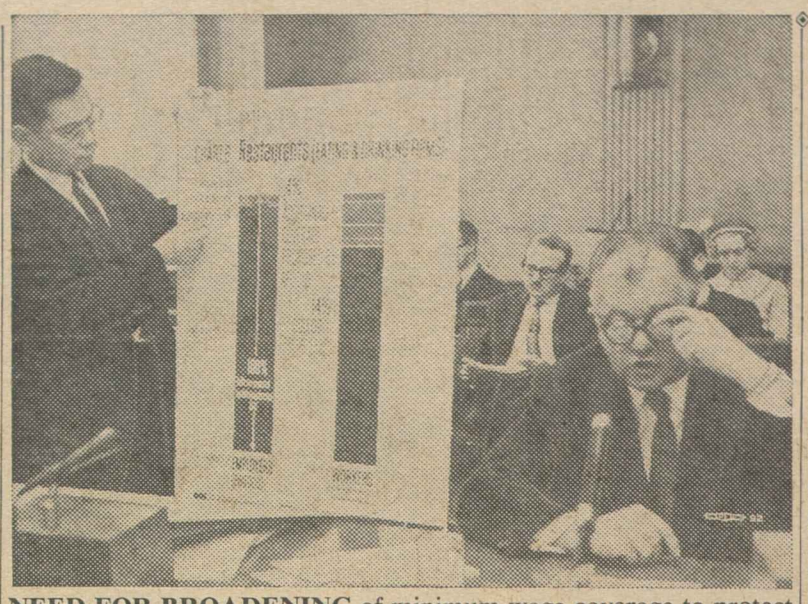
The House Labor Committee approved the minimum wage bill after beating down efforts by Republicans, led by Rep. William H. Ayres (R-O.) to greatly liberalize the bill in a maneuver that would make it easier to win House support later for a more modest substitute similar to one which Ayres and Rep. A. Paul Kitchen (D-N.C.) pushed through the House in the 87th Congress.

As approved by the committee, the bill would extend coverage to 2.8 million workers in large retail trade enterprises, 800,000 in contract construction, and some 700,000 in laundries, seafood processing plants, transit systems, small telephone exchanges, gasoline service stations and shipping.

A provision extending coverage to workers in retail chains having gross annual sales of over $1 million was amended so that in chains with 15 outlets or less, those outlets which gross under $250,000 annually would be exempted from the wage-hour law.

For newly covered workers, the minimum wage would be set at $1 on the effective date of the law. This would rise to $1.05 the second year, $1.15 the third year, and $1.25 the fourth.

No ceiling would be placed during the first year on hours for those newly covered. In the second year, overtime pay would be required after 44 hours, with the ceiling dropping to 42 hours the third year and to 40 hours at the start of the fourth year.



NEED FOR BROADENING of minimum wage coverage to protect at least some workers in restaurant field is emphasized by Andrew J. Biemiller (right), director of AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, in testimony before Senate Labor subcommittee. Emphasizing points on chart is Seymour Brandwein of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Slump Hits Workers as Profits Rise—McDonald

Charging that the burden of depression in the steel industry is being borne by the workers in the mills while profits rise and salaried jobs increase, Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers has called for a bold and imaginative approach, by private industry and the government, to the "twin problems of unemployment and automation."

In testimony before a House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), McDonald cited figures showing that, from 1937 through 1960, the steel industry produced 111 percent more steel with 51,000 fewer production and maintenance workers.

During the same period, he testified, the industry added 65,600 salaried jobs to its payrolls and had proved itself able to make a profit —fourth best in its history in 1960 —while operating at less than 50 percent of capacity.

"We cannot continue to muddle through," the union leader said, "lest we saddle ourselves with a permanent unemployment problem as critical as that of the 1930s."

A further reduction in the workweek represents the major surgery needed today, McDonald told the subcommittee.

The USWA president offered this program for halting the trend toward unemployment in the steel industry and the economy as a whole:

- A shorter workweek without a reduction in pay to bolster purchasing power and provide additional jobs.
- Establishment of a permanent national "Commission on Continuing Prosperity" to plan and recommend policies needed to insure a prosperous America.
- Immediate adoption by the Congress of an "Invest in America" program, long urged by the union head to meet needs for more adequate housing; more schools and more, better-paid and better-trained teachers; better hospital and vacation facilities; improved highways and airports; aid for depressed areas; more adequate unemployment insurance and social security programs.

McDonald emphasized the point that the job of recovery is not that of government alone.

"We also urge," he said, "that private industry get behind these governmental programs and that it develop private programs which will spur the expansion of jobs in private industry.

"Since most jobs in the United States are non-governmental, it is imperative that there be growth in jobs in the private sector of the economy."

Pres. John F. Kennedy and his Administration have, McDonald said, already moved to achieve some of the McDonald objectives.

Automation Action Asked

Warning that automation can become a "hideous Frankenstein" monster unless its human victims are provided for, he pointed out that the nation has emerged from each recent recession with a higher plateau of unemployment.

Citing American Iron & Steel Institute figures, McDonald said only 377,500 production workers were employed in basic steel last December, compared with an average of 532,000 in the first quarter of the year. That was a layoff rate of 29 percent as compared with a national rate, seasonally adjusted, of less than 7 percent, he said.

Joblessness Rises 320,000 To 5.7 Million

hausted their jobless pay benefits and will be eligible for help if Congress approves a temporary extension of jobless pay. The House has passed such a program; the Senate has begun committee hearings.

The Labor Dept. report showed a rise of 203,000 in employment to a total of 64.7 million, narrowly topping February a year ago as an all-time high for the month.

Some on Short-Time

"Among the employed," the report observed, "there were 1.75 million non-farm workers on short-time in February because of business conditions."

The 5.7 million jobless in February compare to 3.9 million a year ago. The previous February high since before World War II was 5.2 million in 1958; the February postwar low was 2 million in 1953.

The 6.8 percent seasonally-adjusted rate of unemployment compares to 4.8 percent a year ago. It tops the previous February recession highs of 6.4 percent both in 1958 and 1950. The February postwar low was 2.6 percent in 1953.

The 1.6 million long-term unemployed in February exceeded the year-earlier total by 660,000 and topped by 160,000 the previous postwar record high for the month in 1958. The February postwar low was 246,000 long-term jobless in 1953.

The report noted some 40 percent of the 1.6 million long-term jobless have been without work "for more than half a year." This figure was 674,000, up from January's 643,000.

Kennedy's Economic Aide Warns of 'Chronic Slack' in Jobs, Production

Dr. Walter W. Heller, chairman of Pres. Kennedy's Council of Economic Advisers, has told Congress an economic upturn "may come in the next few months."

"But I want to emphasize," Heller told the Joint Economic Committee, "that if it develops it will be just the beginning of the end of the recession."

Heller viewed the current recession as a symptom of basic trouble. More serious in the long run, he told the committee, is the "chronic slack" in jobs, production and the potential rate of growth—"the growing gap between what we can produce and what we do produce."

"Whenever it occurs," Heller said, "the reversal of the recession is only the beginning, not the end, of the task of restoring momentum to the American economy."

Heller, a former University of Minnesota economics professor, said that even if the gross national product in the last quarter of 1961 hit an all-time record of 3.5 percent above 1960's fourth quarter—an $18 billion gain—"the unemployment problem would still be of roughly the same magnitude as today."

If the ratio of unemployment to the labor force rose to 7 percent by the year's end, he added, government fiscal policies would have to be viewed "with great concern." The Labor Dept. subsequently announced the jobless rate had risen to 6.8 percent as of mid-February.

If unemployment worsens seriously, Heller continued, it would be in order to consider a speed-up in government construction, expanded federal housing and tax reductions.

"Temporary income-tax reduction offers one of the most important methods for further economic stimulus," he noted.

Heller cautioned that "the road to full recovery is a long one" and described full recovery as the nation's potential "to produce the goods and create the jobs the country needs."

Until recovery is achieved, Heller contended, "the success of fiscal and budget policies cannot be measured by whether the budget is in the black or in the red."

Discounts Risks

Heller argued that the government and Congress "should not shrink" from launching projects because of "misplaced fears of bad timing." This was a reference to the fear that anti-recession actions might have a delayed effect and aggravate an inflationary boom.

Such a risk is smaller in 1961 than in prior recessions, Heller went on, because of the Administration's higher goals. The need for higher goals is implicit in the current gap of $50 billion between what the economy is actually producing and what it can produce. He put the gap at about $30 to $35 billion for 1960 or 6 to 7 percent of the national output.

Heller was flanked by council members Kermit Gordon and James Tobin as he discussed his 56-page prepared statement.

January Stoppages Set Monthly Low

Work stoppages in January set a new low mark for any January since the end of World War II, according to a preliminary estimate by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The bureau said 170 strikes or stoppages began in January and idled about 80,000 workers. An additional 20,000 workers were involved in 130 stoppages continuing from December. Total strike idleness in January was 700,000 man-days, substantially less than in January 1960 and 1959.

4 Freedoms Hotel Opened in Florida

Miami Beach—Opening of the first resort hotel for retired union members—the President Madison, a 205-room hotel on Collins Avenue here—has been announced by Four Freedoms Hotels, Inc., headed by Pres. William R. Steinberg of the Radio Association as president of the board of directors and Pres. Joseph Curran of the Maritime Union as chairman.

Steinberg said the nine unions which formed Four Freedoms Hotels have been joined by two more, the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Office Employes. The ILGWU executive board, he said, has invested $200,000 to reserve 50 double rooms for members.

The nine sponsoring unions purchased the hotel for close to $1 million, and Steinberg said they plan to acquire four more resort hotels in New York, Chicago, Atlantic City and Los Angeles or San Francisco. Hotel facilities will be reserved for union members or retirees at $125 a month per person by arrangement with unions which have invested in the hotel program, he said.

Senate Approves Area Aid, Opens Jobless Pay Debate

Meany Calls Lag in Jobs No. 1 Issue

By Willard Shelton

Philadelphia — "The Number One problem" of the country "is our economic health as a nation —the question of jobs," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the Hotel & Restaurant Workers' convention here.

"How long can we afford 5 million people unemployed?" Meany asked, pointing to a government report that joblessness in mid-February had reached its highest point since the summer of 1941.

"Let some politicians or economic jitterbugs find a sign of an upturn" in the steel industry's operation at 50 percent of capacity for 10 months, he said, or in the Wall Street Journal report that 125,000 laid-off automobile workers "will never be called back to jobs" after the recession.

"Some of the people in the new Administration are talking as if they were part and parcel of the Eisenhower Administration," the federation president said. In a press conference later he said that he was "thinking particularly" of Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, who recently said he "felt" that the bottom of the recession was near.

The new 87th congress is "moving along" about as expected in view of the normal pace of Congress, Meany commented, but he would "like to see it deal with the basic problem." The bills Congress is presently considering—temporary unemployment compensation and depressed areas legislation—"deal with effects," he said.

Shorter Hours Urged

"I have about come to the conclusion that the real solution—the real way to make automation a blessing instead of a curse—is national legislation to shorten still further the workweek," he declared.

Citing the increased population and workforce in prospect for the decade ahead, Meany said:

"Our economy needs to move forward at a rate to find jobs for 1.35 million new workers every year." In the last decade, he observed, we needed 800,000 new jobs a year "and we failed to supply them. Our economy failed to move ahead fast enough."

The Hotel Workers brought together 800 delegates representing 440,000 workers in 569 locals in their convention—the 35th meeting in the union's 70-year history.

Economy at 'Point of Change'

Pres. Ed S. Miller set the keynote as the officers' report observed to the convention that the service trades represented by the union had arrived "at a profoundly meaningful point of change," the moment when relatively low-paid employes

Churches Back Aged Health Care

Syracuse, N. Y.—The National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A., the nation's largest church federation, has endorsed the principle of providing health care for the aged through the social security system.

The council's 250-member governing board, representing 34 Protestant orthodox denominations with 38 million adherents, gave unanimous approval to the social security approach at its recent meeting here.

The resolution, recommended by the group's Division of Christian Life and Work, "authorizes representatives of the national council to testify at public hearings" in support of the position taken by the organization. The general board refrained from singling out specific legislation for endorsement.

In other action, the church federation's general board:

- Called for "positive leadership and definite action by the federal government" to meet the problem of large-scale or long-continued unemployment.
- Urged member churches "to support persons in their efforts to register and vote in communities where the opportunities are denied because of race or color" and endorsed "additional federal and state legislation necessary to guarantee the franchise to all citizens."

Legislation Supported

The medical care resolution pointed out that most persons over 65 cannot afford the high cost of adequate private health insurance.

While it "is to be preferred" that health needs be met "without resort to governmental action," the general board declared, "where needs of people can be met only by united, socially planned action, the Christian will choose such action rather than the neglect of basic human need. . . . Therefore LABOR SEC. Arthur J. Goldberg, touring recession-ridden areas for first-hand view of problems of the unemployed, interrupts meeting with jobless iron ore miners in Duluth, Minn., to confer via telephone with Pres. John F. Kennedy on impact of economic decline.

On Second Goldberg Tour:

'We Want Work,' Jobless Declare

"We want work!"

This was the message presented time after time by jobless workers to Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg as the Cabinet officer made a two-day tour of recession-ridden areas of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

In his whirlwind tour—second by the Secretary since the Kennedy Administration took office—Goldberg talked to hundreds of jobless workers lined up at unemployment offices, and to state and city officials and labor leaders.

Here are the reports of correspondents for the AFL-CIO News on the scene:

Wisconsin

The deepening recession has meant more than a staggering loss of jobs in industrial plants in Wisconsin, Goldberg was told on his visit to Milwaukee.

Four painters, members of Local 781, told the Secretary of long-term layoffs—the first since the big depression of the '30s. "Times are tougher than we can remember," said a spokesman for the group of Alvin Huep, John Wheatley, John Flesch and George Fritschler, all veterans at their craft.

Phyllys Frazier, member of Pulp Workers Local 200, told of futile efforts to find substitute work while she was laid off her regular job.

'Substantial' Unemployment

Steel, automotive and other industrial operations are hard hit here, and Milwaukee has just moved into the category of an area of "substantial" labor surplus, meaning more than 6 percent joblessness and meaning also that local firms have a priority in bidding on government contracts.

In the meantime, layoffs among Steelworkers have hit 18 percent for the year, according to District Dir. Walter Burker. John Turner, a press operator at the big A. O. Smith pipe plant, and Herman Comfort, formerly working at the Harnischfeger plant, were among these telling Goldberg of

Battle Set On TUC Financing

By Gene Zack

The Senate has approved Pres. John F. Kennedy's $394 million depressed areas bill, first Administration priority measure to clear the Senate, and plunged at once into heated debate on temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits.

Passage of the area redevelopment measure came after the Senate, by a 49-45 vote, staved off conservative efforts to gut the four-year assistance program by subjecting its loans and grants to annual congressional review.

The TUC measure, passage of which Kennedy has called "essential" to his anti-recesion program, faced an early test of strength over the method of financing added jobless benefits for those who have used up regular state aid without finding work. The vote—on whether all employers, or merely those in the hardest-hit states, would ultimately bear the brunt of the extended benefits—was expected to be exceedingly close.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in telegrams to the 100 senators, urged defeat of the financing proposals contained in the Senate Finance Committee version of TUC. Meany said the committee's approach was "far inferior" to the across-the-board financing called for in the measure passed by the House by a vote of 392-30.

Meany said the Senate committee plan would "aggravate the already unevenly distributed burden of unemployment" and would delay aid to the jobless since it would require enabling action by many states before extended benefits could be paid.

Meanwhile there were these other developments on Capitol Hill:

- The House was expected to open floor debate the week of Mar. 20 on the Administration's mini-

Survey Reveals Gain in Retail Jobs After States Hiked Minimum Wage

The AFL-CIO, assailing business lobby claims that large-scale layoffs would accompany a minimum wage in retail trade, has made public a survey showing that an increase in employment usually has resulted from passage of state legislation, setting a $1-an-hour minimum for retail stores.

The survey, made by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research on the basis of data from the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, was prepared for a Senate Labor subcommittee headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.).

The analysis covers employment in retail trade in 13 of the 15 states requiring a $1 minimum. No employment data was available on either Alaska, with a $1.50 minimum, or Hawaii, with a $1 minimum.

In a covering letter to McNamara, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said the study backed up labor's contention during testimony before the subcommittee that "retail employment had not suffered, and indeed often had increased, as a result of minimum wage requirements."

The 30-page document, prepared by Economist Seymour Brandwein of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, said that the BLS figures showed "categorically that the retail industry has adjusted to statutory minimum wage requirements without unfavorable employment effects and indeed usually with an increase in employment."

Although available data vary and the date the $1 minimum was adopted differs from state to state, the AFL-CIO said, the overall picture showed that:

- The minimum wage for retail

NLRB Region Head Appointed to Board

Pres. John F. Kennedy has named Gerald A. Brown, a veteran career employe of the National Labor Relations Board, to fill the unexpired term of NLRB Member Joseph A. Jenkins.

Brown, who joined the labor board staff as a field examiner in 1942, has been NLRB regional director in San Francisco since 1947.

Kennedy picked Brown to fill the post which Jenkins will vacate Mar. 28 to become NLRB regional director in Albuquerque, N. M. The term runs until Aug. 27.

STANDING OVATION was given former Pres. Harry S. Truman by the 1,000 delegates to the second annual legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. at Washington's Mayflower Hotel. With the former Democratic President are IUD Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey (left) and Steelworkers' Sec.-Treas. I. W. Abel (right).

A $1 Million Victory:

Tax Refunds Won By 2,000 at Kohler

Sheboygan, Wis.—Two thousand workers who walked the picket line at the Kohler Co. here and received strike benefits from the Auto Workers will share more than $1 million in federal income tax refunds.

The Internal Revenue Service's district office in Milwaukee said the decision to refund taxes paid on strike assistance given by the union was based on a test case the UAW won in the Supreme Court last year.

Refunds Up to $2,000

The refund checks, ranging as high as $2,000 in some cases, will be mailed to claimants within the next two months, the IRS said. With the help of their union, the Kohler strikers had submitted refund claims which were held in abeyance while the test case was moving through the courts.

Last month, in another ruling based on the Supreme Court decision in the Kohler case, the government said it would not contest a test suit brought by the Communications Workers which is expected to pave the way for refunds to nearly 1,500 CWA members who received strike benefits during 1956.

In both the UAW and the CWA cases, benefits were paid to strikers on the basis of individual need—one of the criteria used by the Internal Revenue Service in deciding whether benefits are essentially a "gift" and not taxable or whether payments are to be considered taxable income.

Earlier this year, the IRS announced a modification of its policy on taxation of strike benefits, declaring it would exempt assistance given to strikers in cases presenting facts "substantially like" those in the Kohler test case.

6-3 Decision

The Supreme Court, in a 6-3 decision last June, ruled that benefits paid to Allen Kaiser, a non-union member who joined the strike called by the UAW in 1954, could be considered as "generosity" related to need and "not as a recompense for striking."

The case reached the Supreme Court after a trial court judge had overruled a federal jury which had agreed with the UAW's claim that the benefits paid to Kaiser were not taxable. An appellate court also reversed the judge and upheld the jury's verdict.

IRS, in adopting the broad criteria of the court decision, also stated that tax exemption could still be granted if benefits were restricted to union members. It said each case would have to be considered separately in relation to the form and amount of benefits, other income of the individual, conditions of payment and availability of public assistance.

An attorney for UAW Local 833 at Kohler, Max Raskin, said the union hoped that Congress will specifically exempt all strike benefits from taxation so that other workers would not have to fight in the courts to get their refund claims upheld.

Anti-Recession Steps Inadequate, Keyserling Tells Glass Union

Los Angeles—Leon Keyserling, chairman of former Pres. Truman's Council of Economic Advisors, told the 62nd convention of the Glass Bottle Blowers here that Pres. Kennedy is not doing enough to end the curent recession.

Keyserling told some 700 delegates than Kennedy is doing more than former Pres. Eisenhower with programs that "should be strengthened by public support since they are good as far as they go."

Since the end of the Korean War, he said, the nation's economy has been a series of booms, stagnations and recession. "We are now in the third recession since 1953," he said.

Predicting a slight economic upturn about the middle of the year, Keyserling said that the Administration programs now befor Congress are not enough to close the "massive gap between what we can produce and what we are consuming."

He called for less taxes on low income groups, greater urban redevelopment, and more extensive abandonment of tight-money policies warning that if "we continue our ups and down, the true level of unemployment (including parttime work) will reach 11 million by 1965."

Nelson Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, said medical aid to the aged through social security is one of the top priority issues for the labor movement.

Cruikshank read the delegates a message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany who called medical aid to the aged "a pivotal issue" which "sums up the differences between two broad, conflicting views of our society and government's role in it."

One group, Meany said, would "prefer to see the problem continue rather than to involve the federal government in a solution. On the other hand there are those, including the labor movement, who believe it is a responsibility of government to promote the people's welfare, even if that entails an extension of the government's functions."

Reiser Sees Need for Unity

Ralph Reiser, president of the Glass and Ceramic Workers, said if there are mergers of unions in the glass field, one most important merger would be between GBBA and his own union.

GBBA Pres. Lee Minton earlier had called for a merger of all unions representing glass workers, and Reiser said there is great need for unity.

Richard W. Reuter, executive director of CARE, noted the role organized labor played in the founding of that organization and declared that there can never be true peace as long as "poverty, illiteracy, ill-health and oppression stalk the world."

Food is the most effective weapon in the fight for peace, he said.

Minton, who has been president of GBBA since 1946, was reelected for another four-year term. He defeated two other candidates, polling 554 votes to 66 for George White and 59 for Harold Glenn.

Unopposed for re-election were Vice Pres. Raymond Dalton, Sec. Newton Black and Treas. Dale Clutter.

Minton rejected a proposal to raise his $30,000 annual salary by $2,500, but said the hike was appropriate for the other officers. Dalton and Black had been receiving $17,500 each, while Clutter formerly got $10,000.

Delegates voted to increase dues by 25 cents a month, rejecting a resolution which would have upped dues by 50 cents. At the same time, they voted to discontinue the previous method of financing conventions by an assessment of two-months' extra dues between conventions.

A proposal to elect international representatives and representatives to wage policy committees was rejected, along with a resolution which would have required approval by 75 per cent of the members before a strike could be called.

GI Education Plan Backed By AFL-CIO

Support for a bill to extend the benefits of GI education programs to post-Korean War veterans has been urged on Congress by the AFL-CIO.

In testimony before a Senate subcommittee on veterans' affairs, Legislative Rep. George Riley urged that federal funds be used to provide the same kind of educational and trade training for "peacetime" soldiers as was legislated for World War II and Korean War veterans.

The AFL-CIO spokesman told the subcommittee that since "recent threats to the peace of the free world" require this nation to maintain a military force prepared to resist aggression, Congress should pass the bill introduced by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) to provide readjustment assistance to "peacetime" veterans.

Riley urged that legislation in this field provide training for those who want to become craftsmen, in addition to prospective teachers, scientists and doctors. It should not be limited, he said, to veterans who rank in the upper half of their class, and it should not be given in the form of a loan but as a grant.

Reports Due From 75,000 Welfare Plans

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has reminded administrators of welfare and pension plans that annual financial reports are required by law to be filed with the Dept. of Labor no later than Apr. 30.

About 75,000 plans, more than half the total on file, have fiscal years ending Dec. 31. Annual reports of their financial operations are required under the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act to be filed within 120 days of the end of their fiscal year, or by Apr. 1. The act contains no provision for granting extensions of time for filing or for excusing late filing.

Financial reporting forms (D-2) for these plans were sent to administrators last November. Requests for additional forms, or for information on the Act, should be addressed to: Division of Welfare and Pension Reports, Bureau of Labor Standards, U. S. Dept. of Labor, 916 G Street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

CWA's National Bargaining Parley Asks Wage Hike, Job Upgradings

New York—Despite the recession plaguing the American economy, telephone workers see good prospects of winning an "equitable wage increase" in coming negotiations.

The mandate for pay boosts was given to leaders of the Communications Workers at a three-day collective bargaining policy committee here. Some 70 local leaders of the union from every part of the nation attended.

In addition to seeking pay boosts, the conference called for changes in job classifications and differentials to correspond with "demonstrated changes" in work assignments resulting from automation.

The union conference heard a report on the nation's economic difficulties from Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, and AFL-CIO Research Dir. Stanley Ruttenberg.

Beirne said the union could expect "serious problems in bargaining" if an upturn does not occur in the spring. CWA starts its 1961 negotiations with units of the Bell Telephone System during the next two months.

On the other hand, he pointed out, profits of the companies in the communications industry have been high. American Telephone & Telegraph plans to raise its dividend rate in July, and both the Bell independent phone companies have announced big programs of capital investment, he said.

Beirne told the CWA delegates that negotiations resulted in wage boosts in the Bell System during 1960 amounting to about $130 million. Of 13 first-time contracts negotiated, the CWA president reported, ten contained some form of union security.

Goldberg addressed the bargaining group behind closed doors. He told a press conference, however, that the recession is a "fact of life" about which the Kennedy Administration intends to act. For that reason, he said, it is urgently necessary that the Congress quickly adopt the economic legislative program advanced by the President.

Goldberg told reporters it is "not appropriate" for him to discuss the CWA's collective bargaining plans, but he added the U.S. policy of free and responsible collective bargaining has the full support of Pres. Kennedy.

Noting changes in the work force caused by automation, the Secretary added:

"In a real sense, this industry and this union can provide a pilot study of the benefits and problems of automation in a modern society."

Ruttenberg suggested that the Administration's recovery programs, good so far as they go, are apt to leave the country with a 7 percent unemployment rate at the end of the year even if there is a sizable business turnup.

America must find 80,000 new jobs a week, the AFL-CIO economist told the CWA delegates. Some 26,000 jobs must be created for new workers joining the labor force for the first time. The rest represent workers displaced by automation and other causes.

Even as the CWA mapped plans for its 1961 bargaining, its officials were preparing to wrap up 1960 negotiations in talks with the New York Telephone Co. CWA defeated an unaffiliated union and won representation rights earlier this month for some 18,000 plant employes of the Bell subsidiary working in the New York City and suburban area.

Bonus for Brass, Zero for Workers:

UAW Raps Ford's 'Double Standard'

Detroit—Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther has denounced as "sheer hypocrisy" the action of Ford Motor Co. directors in voting a $33.6 million bonus for company executives out of profits while company Pres. Henry Ford II was exhorting Ford workers to "hold the line" on wages.

The eall on workers to "hold the line" was issued, Reuther said, "at the very time when the nation is deep in recession" with 5.7 million workers unemployed, and when additional thousands of Ford workers are being laid off while others work short weeks.

At a time when the nation needs expanded purchasing power, he said, Ford is following the practice of "giving more to its few executives who already have more than they need" while denying equity to Ford workers and consumers who have too little.

Assailing management's "typical double economic and moral standard," the UAW head said the squeeze on workers was made even more flagrant by the action of Ford directors in giving seven officers and 147 other executives the right to purchase Ford stock at cut-rate prices almost certain to guarantee them an additional bonus of $5 million.

'Hold the Line'

Ford's 1960 report to stockholders included a statement that "management believes it is essential to hold the line on all costs, avoiding particularly any labor cost increases that could force us to raise prices."

The report listed payment of $33.6 million in bonuses to 4,373 management people out of 1960 earnings of $428.8 million.

The bonuses, Reuther pointed out, are the equivalent of almost 13 cents an hour for the company's hourly rated workers. He put the figure in buyer's cost at $17.78 on every passenger car Ford made last year plus taxes and dealer markup, or a total of about $25.

"Once again," said Reuther, "Ford is trying to blame his company's workers for the excessive rigged prices charged consumers for Ford products.

On Par with Electrical Firms

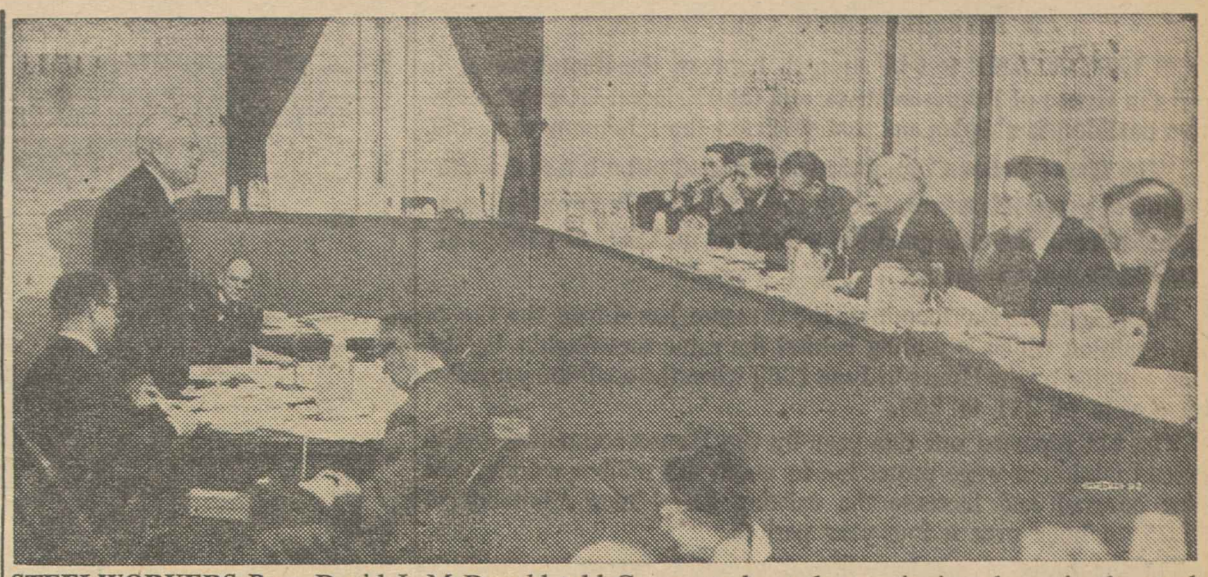
"This is on a par with the actions of electrical manufacturing companies, which carried out a similar campaign to blame their workers for high prices, at the very time their top executives were earning jail sentences by conspiring to rig the prices charged" for heavy equipment.

Using company figures, Reuther charged that:

- Bonuses paid to company executives were $2 million larger than the $31 million which Ford said it added to income of 120,000 hourly workers in the United States in 1960.
- Last year's stated increase in hourly wage rates and fringe benefits for workers was 4.4 percent but dividends per share increased from $2.80 to $3, or 7 percent.
- The 20-cent increase in dividends meant a gain of over $172,000 for Henry Ford II alone and more than $600,000 for all company directors.

"In these circumstances," Reuther said, "it is sheer hypocrisy for Ford to issue calls to hold the wage line—especially when he follows it with an exhortation to 'more carefully discipline ourselves in all cost areas.' In view of his own large share of the bonus, I should like to suggest that Ford should begin with self-discipline."

The UAW expects to start negotiations in July on contracts to replace those expiring Aug. 31. It has asked all locals to send delegates to a special collective bargaining convention in Detroit Apr. 27 through 29.



STEELWORKERS Pres. David J. McDonald told Congress about the continuing slump in the steel industry. Testifying before a House Labor subcommittee on unemployment and automation, McDonald called for a shorter workweek without a reduction in pay, and increased expenditures for housing, schools, highways, and other features of his proposed "Invest in America" program.

Ford Urged to Relieve Plant Closing Hardships

The Auto Workers have urged Henry Ford II, president of the Ford Motor Co., to help relieve hardships caused by the closing of the company's Chester, Pa., assembly plant.

Ken Bannon, director of the UAW's national Ford department, said the plant closed Mar. 10 despite pleas for reconsideration by members of UAW Local 918, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, and Gov. David L. Lawrence (D) of Pennsylvania.

"Public statements indicate," Bannon wrote Ford, "that you made the final decision" to close the Chester plant and also "expressed your great concern" for the welfare of the 1,500 laid-off Chester workers.

"In view of your expressed concern," Bannon wrote, "I am requesting that you review the proposals we have advanced."

Asserting that meetings with Ford representatives have produced no more than an offer of work at other company locations, Bannon asked Ford to act on these union suggestions:

- An "adequate moving allowance" for employes who transfer to another location.
- Special early retirement at 55 and upward for Chester employes who cannot accept a transfer.
- Changes in the vacation pay arrangements to assist workers who do not transfer to another Ford plant.

A reply from Vice Pres. Malcolm N. Denise said company policy has been to give workers "every reasonable consideration." Denise said the company is prepared to discuss with UAW the proposal for giving vacation pay to those who would have been eligible for it next June 1. He denied the firm has shown a "marked lack of concern" to the problems of laid-off workers, as Bannon had charged.

Rifkind to Chair Rail Study Group

Simon Rifkind, a prominent liberal lawyer and a former federal judge, has been appointed by Pres. Kennedy to chair the presidential study commission on labor-management problems in the railroad industry.

Rifkind succeeds former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell as chairman of the tripartite commission, made up equally of public, labor and management members. Mitchell resigned after steering the commission through its first month of activities, to run for the Republican nomination for governor of New Jersey.

Rifkind, an early law partner of the late Sen. Robert F. Wagner (D-N. Y.), has served as a counsel to the Ladies' Garment Workers, and has been a law associate of Adlai Stevenson.

Metal Unions Defer Strike At Hanford

Richland, Wash.—A strike deadline set by unions representing 3,200 workers at the Hanford Atomic Products plant here after General Electric Co. rejected a federal panel's contract recommendations has been extended to Mar. 31 at the request of Pres. John F. Kennedy.

The unions and GE, manager of the big Hanford plutonium plant, agreed to resume negotiations with the assistance of federal mediators. The walkout originally had been scheduled for Mar. 13.

Kennedy told Pres. James A. Brownlow of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. that he had asked Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg to help bring about an early settlement and declared that the "public interest requires a speedy end" to the dispute.

Brownlow told the President that the Hanford Atomic Metal Trades Council and the international unions involved would continue negotiations and said that, if an agreement is to be reached before the new deadline, "every effort of government, labor and management must be exercised."

The dispute came to the President's notice early this month when the Metal Trades Council asked the White House to persuade GE to accept a presidential panel's recommendation for a new contract covering production and maintenance workers.

The four-man panel, named last fall by Chairman Cyrus S. Ching of the Atomic Energy labor-management disputes board, recommended a settlement that would include a 3 percent wage increase effective Oct. 3, 1960; a wage reopener or a 4 percent increase in 1962; an increase in shift differentials; and one more paid holiday.

The unions agreed to accept all of the panel's recommendations, including those adverse to union members, but GE refused to go along with the proposed settlement, Brownlow said.

NMU Asks Labor Aid In Tracking Struck Ship

AFL-CIO central bodies in all sea and river ports have been asked by the Maritime Union to join the fight to get a contract for the fired crew of the "runaway scab ship" Martha Mac.

Central bodies in New Orleans, Tampa and Mobile have voted support of the fight for the discharged crew of the modern self-loading ship, which hauls coal, sulphur and phosphates between Tampa and New Orleans.

NMU organized the Martha Mac after a tough organization battle against a company union. The crew chose NMU as its bargaining representative by a 2-1 margin in a National Labor Relations Board election.

Then followed several months of trying to negotiate a contract, and finally a strike, in May 1960.

"This was the start," NMU reported in a letter to AFL-CIO central bodies from Pres. Joseph Curran, "of open warfare in which the company has had help from local, state and some federal agencies. Crewmen were fired and a scab crew was rounded up. Our pickets have ducked pistol shots."

The Maritime Union said company lawyers have stymied action in court with red tape and endless delays, but the union will continue to fight against a substandard contract.

Lookouts Asked

The problem is, said Curran, that the ship loads and unloads in midstream or at inaccessible piers behind miles of winding rivers and barbed wire fences. That's where central bodies can help, by warning union members to be on the lookout for the elusive freighter.

Curran said the ship's operator is the Gulf Coast Transit Co. of Tampa, headed by Noble Gordon. Owners, he said, are the Tampa Electric Co., Carolina Chemical Co., and Peabody Co. —heavy industries that are "big, profitable and powerful."

A "union busting" operation of this nature threatens the gains of organized labor everywhere and, said Curran, "for this reason we ask all unions and union men to stand with us in this fight. We will be coming with more details to unions which can give us direct support."

The Martha Mac is one of the first ships in what the union calls a promising new type of American flag operation. One other such ship is under NMU contract, and several more are being readied.

7 Graphic Art Unions Draft Plan for Unity

An inter-union committee began drafting a plan for labor unity in the printing, paper and related industries at its first meeting and has scheduled another two-day session, Apr. 11-12, also in Washington.

The 14-man group representing seven unions chose Ellis T. Baker, director of research and information for the Newspaper Guild, as chairman.

The committee is an arm of the Presidents' Committee of the Allied Printing & Related Trades, formed a year ago by leaders of international unions in the graphic arts industry to coordinate their activities and to explore plans for eventual unity. The presidents also have a legislative subcommittee which is campaigning in the states and Canadian provinces for laws to ban the recruiting and employment of professional strikebreakers.

Baker said the working committee named to prepare a specific blueprint for unity will submit its report directly to the Presidents' Committee and will issue no interim statements.

J. William Blatz, ANG director of organization, was chosen as secretary of the working committee. Others representing their unions at the meeting were:

John Connolly, vice president, and Wesley A. Taylor, secretary-treasurer, Bookbinders; Leon M. Wickersham, assistant to the president of the unaffiliated Lithographers, and Edward V. Donahue, president of the union's Twin Cities, Minn., local; Walter F. Risdon, fifth vice president, and Edward A. Nyegaard, international representative, Photo Engravers; Walter J. Turner and Alexander J. Rohan, vice presidents, Printing Pressmen; James H. Sampson, president, and John McDermott, third vice president, Stereotypers, and Francis E. McGlothlin, assistant to the president, and John J. Landey, director of the bureau of statistics, Typographical Union.

Unions Urged to Join In Armed Forces Day

Maintenance of a "strong, vigorous" military establishment is "essential in this time of continuing world crisis," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has declared in urging federation affiliates to participate in local Armed Forces Day observances during the week of May 13-21.

In a letter addressed to the officers of national and international unions, state and local central bodies and directly affiliated local unions, Meany called for trade union cooperation in "open house" programs at military installations as part of the program of promoting public interest in and understanding of the nation's defense effort.

"We, as civilians, can do much to maintain and enhance the morale of the armed forces," the AFL-CIO president said, "by participating in these local observances to the fullest possible extent."

A Handful of Votes

AN IMPORTANT test of strength between the liberal forces in the House of Representatives and the Dixiecrat-GOP conservative coalition is shaping up next week on the minimum wage bill.

The House Labor Committee has reported out a bill that while short of proposals advocated by the AFL-CIO is nevertheless a good bill and the only good bill which has a chance of passage at this session of Congress.

But despite its shortcomings, the measure has drawn the fire of the coalition which is uniting behind the same meaningless legislation adopted by the House in June 1960 when the coalition prevailed by a vote of 211 to 203.

The bill reported out this year by the House committee would extend minimum wage protection to about 4.3 million workers not now covered and increase the existing $1-an-hour minimum to $1.25 an hour over a four-year period.

On the basis of previous liberal versus conservative coalition tests in the 87th Congress—the Rules Committee battle and feed grains bill—the balloting on minimum wage will be close, with a handful of votes affecting the outcome.

A letter, a telegram, a phone call to individual congressmen asking them to vote for the minimum wage bill as reported by the House committee, without amendment, may make the difference.

The House is sharply and closely divided on this issue. That letter, wire or call may determine the outcome. Do it now!

New Dimension

THE PRESIDENT'S ORDER creating a Peace Corps on a temporary pilot basis and his request for legislation to place the corps on a permanent footing holds out the promise of adding a new dimension in the struggle to expand the horizons of democracy and freedom.

The objective of a peace corps was perhaps best stated by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) in a bill he introduced last year to create a corps that would "enable the government of the United States to develop a genuine people-to-people program in which talented and dedicated young Americans will teach basic skills to the peoples of the underdeveloped areas with a view to assisting them in their struggle against poverty, disease, illiteracy and hunger, and with a view to promoting understanding of the United States."

Much of the discussion of the President's proposal has centered on the mechanics of setting up and operating the Peace Corps. But apart from the actual mechanism, it is vital that such a corps recruit carefully selected, skilled American youth, without discrimination because of formal academic background, sex or race, and provide them with rigorous training in the languages, culture and problems of the area to which they will be assigned.

To achieve success, the corps should work on projects and programs that do not duplicate existing U.S. efforts and be part of an expanded program to assist the underdeveloped countries.

Young American men and women from the factories, the farms, the offices and the colleges can make an important contribution through a properly directed and utilized Peace Corps program to help other nations wipe out the ancient scourges and aid them in creating modern societies based on freedom and democracy.

A New Look:

Union-Won Gains Bring About Change in Status of Members

(The following is excerpted from an article in the February issue of The AFL-CIO American Federationist entitled "A New Look at the Status of Today's Union Member.")

By Peter Henle

THE CHANGES that unions have helped to bring about in American life in recent years have inevitably produced major changes in the status of the union member and his family.

There has been widespread discussion about some of these changes—the rising standard of living, the change from blue-collar to white-collar jobs and the trend to suburbia; now there is some evidence to indicate the impact of these changes on union members and their families.

The Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan, which conducts an annual survey of American families, in 1960 included a question concerning union membership for the first time. The answers to this question, when combined with replies to the survey's regular data on incomes and characteristics of American families, provide basic data on union families.

The survey shows that the lot of the union member and his family has changed: incomes have been rising; families have acquired some savings and at the same time some debt; home ownership is rising, many union families have moved to the suburbs. Many union families have moved out of the ranks of the "lower-income" groups into what could broadly be called "moderate" or "middle income." The figures show that the average union family is generally in a better financial position than its non-union counterpart.

THE COMPOSITE PICTURE of the average union family that emerges from the data turns out to be very close to the general image of the typical American family; the breadwinner is between 35 and 44 years of age, has been married more than 10 years, and has completed at least two or three years of high school.

In another respect the union families conform to the image of a "typical" household; a majority of these families have become homeowners and have joined the trend to the suburbs.

Almost three-quarters of the union families reside in cities or their adjacent suburbs, a substantially higher proportion than non-union families; nearly as many now live in the suburban areas as in the central cities.

To check the level of income, information was obtained on three measures of income: wage and salary paid to the head of the family, total wages and salaries paid to all members of the family, including payments earned by the wife and children, and total family income, including, in addition to wages and salaries, rental income, dividends, interest payments and the like.

No matter which measure is used, union families generally show a higher level of income than non-union families. This holds true even though there are relatively more non-union families in the highest income group.

Almost one-half of union families have incomes over $6,000 per year, making them part of America's "middle-income" families. At the upper end of the income scale, about 7 percent of both union and non-union families have incomes above $10,000; above $15,000 there are relatively more non-union families.

Another way to look at the financial status of union families is to examine their total financial resources rather than their current income. On this point the survey collected information on the families' bank accounts, both checking and savings, their holdings of savings bonds, life insurance, stocks and real estate.

Over three-quarters of union families have some type of liquid assets, with the average holding between $500 and $1,000. The most popular form is a savings account which makes up about half the total liquid assets of union families.

Nearly 90 percent reported that they hold life insurance policies, but the proportion of union families reporting that they own stock in publicly held corporations was only 8 percent compared to 13 percent for non-union families and 24 percent for the third group that includes professional persons, retired couples and college-trained executives.

THE SURVEY RESULTS point up the cumulative effect of the changes in American life over the past 25 years. The status of the average union member and his family has improved to the point where they stand generally above their non-union counterpart. More and more union families are part of America's "middle-income" group.

The figures are a useful reminder that with changes in union membership, union policies must be constantly re-examined to keep pace with these developments.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A SURVEY by the American Heritage Foundation reveals that only 64.3 percent of Americans of voting age participated last November in the close election involving Pres. Kennedy and then Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon. But this picture is a national one; the average is sharply reduced by the non-voting tradition of the South.

North Carolina was the southern state with the highest proportion of participation—54.3 percent. That was lower than proportionate participation in every other state of the union outside of the South. Mississippi had the worst record—only 298,000 voted out of 1.16 million persons of voting age, for a 25.6 percentage.

In the state of Idaho, with the highest percentage, more citizens actually voted than in Mississippi, although the southern state has four times as many people of voting age.

In many southern rural areas, literacy and other eligibility tests are applied so that the practical effect is to disfranchise a heavy proportion of voting-age citizens, the Negro citizens. In a few states, a poll-tax requirement has the practical effect of discouraging participation by low-income white citizens.

THE FIRST Senate rollcall test on a Kennedy Administration measure came when the Republican-conservative Democratic coalition attempted to amend the depressed areas bill to require annual appropriations to finance the program. The Kennedy forces won by a razor-thin margin of four votes, 49 to 45.

Congress many times authorizes continuing programs through Treasury borrowing, and for long-term operations such as urban redevelopment and sewage-disposal systems a requirement for annual formal appropriations would cripple the programs. This is precisely what the coalition sought to do to the depressed areas program.

On the rollcall, only two Republicans broke with their party to support the Administration—Senators Jacob K. Javits (N. Y.) and John Sherman Cooper (Ky.). Sixteen Democrats, including 13 from southern states, voted with 29 Republicans in favor of the amendment.

The Administration obtained its margin of victory by winning support from the Tennessee and Texas liberals—Senators Estes Kefauver, Albert Gore and Ralph Yarborough—and from five other southern Democrats. These were Senators Lister Hill and John Sparkman (Ala.), J. William Fulbright (Ark.), Russell Long (La.) and Olin Johnston (S. C.).

THIRTY-TWO STATE LEGISLATURES, as of this writing, had approved a proposed constitutional amendment to allow residents of the District of Columbia to cast ballots in national elections by choosing three members of the electoral college. Only seven more state ratifications were needed for the 38 required to end the long disfranchisement of District citizens, who are taxed as others but have no voice in Congress or in the choice of President.

Curious patterns of opposition have arisen since the proposed amendment went through Congress with bipartisan support. Despite Republican national policy in favor of the amendment, Republicans in state legislatures in midwestern and Rocky Mountain areas have begun to turn against it. Their reason: they think Negro residents of the District, who make up slightly more than half the population, would tend to support Democratic presidential candidates.

On the other hand, not a single Democratic-controlled deep South state has ratified, and only Tennessee among the states that made up the confederacy 100 years ago. In Arkansas the amendment was turned down. The reason: it is apparently considered politically dangerous for a southern official to vote to enfranchise Negroes as well as other District of Columbia residents.

LABOR SUPPORT for drive to raise $142 million for development of Lincoln Center, New York, to encourage advancement of arts and culture, was urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at luncheon for 60 labor leaders sponsored by New York City Central Labor Council. With Meany, left to right, are Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the central labor body; John D. Rockefeller, III, chairman of the development drive; and Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Clothing Workers.

At Governing Body Meeting:

ILO Worker Delegates Block Soviet Bid For High Staff Job

Geneva, Switzerland—Worker delegates have helped to block the appointment of a Soviet representative to a high level staff job in the Intl. Labor Organization.

The majority of governments on the ILO's Governing Body, meeting here, were prepared to bow to the appointment on political grounds, but a solid workers' vote swung the battle.

The tally at the session of the 40-member ILO executive board was 21 to 16, with three abstentions.

Only the government delegate of Nationalist China joined the 10 worker and 10 employer representatives in refusing to create another post of ILO assistant director general designated for a Russian.

U.S. Abstains

The U.S., Japanese and West German governments abstained to cut the government majority in favor of the move to sixteen.

David A. Morse, the 97-nation ILO's American director general, admitted that he had been under Soviet pressure since 1956 to make room for a Russian on his top staff.

He had always refused because he had seen no need for a Russian assistant, he told the Governing Body's budget committee. But he added that he thought the time had come to enlist the help of someone "from that part of the world."

Morse defended his proposal to include the additional job in the 1962 budget on the ground that all the other United Nations specialized agencies had Russians in top staff assignments.

Leading the fight within the workers' group against creation of the political post was Rudy Faupl, U.S. worker delegate, joined by Kalman Kaplansky of the Canadian Labor Congress; Willie Richter, president of the West German trade union federation; Sanchez Madariaga of Mexico, and G. Ambekar of India.

The ILO includes the representatives of workers and employers as well as of governments and does not have to follow the example of other international organizations linking governments only, they pointed out.

They also helped to line up a solid labor vote against the proposal by emphasizing that the $15,000 a year that would go with the job could be better spent on operational activities in the field.

"There is too much talk of saving money by cutting down on really useful technical meetings to accept the claim that another assistant director general is really needed," Faupl commented after the vote.

The 1962 budget of $11,003,419 approved by the Governing Body represents an increase of $1,146,039 over the figure for the current year.

The increasing attention being given Africa was shown by the inclusion in the budget of a provision for a second ILO Regional Office on that continent.

A highlight of the four-day session was a debate on the action to be taken by the ILO to assure that its convention for abolishing all forms of discrimination in employment is given effect in member states.

"My government is moving ahead vigorously and, I think, effectively in this area," George L-P Weaver, special assistant to U.S. Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg, said.

The progress achieved in the U.S. and Canada under fair employment practice principles is an example of what can be done by legal means to "strengthen the whole concept of democracy," Weaver assured the group.

While discrimination is "one of the gravest problems that is crying out for a solution today," it must be kept out of the "political currents that have too often seized it," he said.

New proposals on ILO machinery to deal with discrimination are to be put before the Governing Body in November.

The executive unit also slated for November a discussion on the ILO's hotly criticized survey of the so-called trade unions in the Soviet Union. Many delegates felt that the ILO mission that went to Russia did a whitewash job under the pretext of "impartiality."

The plan is to take up the Russian survey at the same time as surveys by an ILO committee in the U.S. and other countries.

Survey Reveals Gain in Retail Jobs After State Minimum Wage Hikes

trade was accompanied by employment that was often better than in other industries in the same period.

● Employment in retailing has generally risen "quite sharply" after an increase in the minimum, except during the 1958 recession, "and even then the recession-caused declines in retailing were less than in other industry."

● Employment data for the month following application of new retail minimums "nowhere indicates any precipitous decline," as retail spokesmen have indicated would result from including employes under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Here is the AFL-CIO's state-by-state analysis of the BLS employment figures:

CALIFORNIA—The $1 minimum was made effective in November 1957, as the 1957-58 recession was under way. The previous retail minimum had been 75 cents. Although total non-agricultural employment in the state declined 7.5 percent as a result of the recession during 1958, retail employment fell less than 1 percent.

CONNECTICUT—The minimum was raised from 75 cents to $1 in July 1957. Employment data showed that the number of jobs in retailing rose 1.5 percent in the following year, although non-farm employment dropped by 4.3 percent.

MAINE—A $1 minimum was made effective Sept. 12, 1959. There was no previous minimum wage in effect. Employment data for retail trade alone was not available, figures being compiled on the basis of total trade, of which retailing accounts for 70 to 80 percent. Total trade employment in 1960 rose .9 percent, while non-farm employment rose by 1.4 percent. In the first month trade employment declined only 1.6 percent as compared with the seasonal drop of 2.8 percent in 1958 and 2.2 percent in 1960.

MASSACHUSETTS—The minimum was raised from 90 cents to $1 in December 1959. Figures for total trade showed that in the following year employment rose 2.1 percent, a larger increase than the overall 1.3 percent rise in employment.

NEVADA—The $1 minimum was established in July 1957, to replace the former 87.5-cent level. Employment in the following year remained level while nonagricultural employment dipped seven-tenths of 1 percent. Immediately after the increase, employment rose 7.5 percent.

NEW HAMPSHIRE—The minimum went up from 85 cents to $1 in November 1959. For total trade, employment the following year rose 4.9 percent, a larger increase than the 2.3 percent rise in non-farm jobs. The immediate impact found a 3 percent rise—greater than 1958's 2.8 percent and 1960's 2.3 percent.

NEW JERSEY—A $1 minimum went into effect in October 1956. Previously the minimum, varying by zones, ranged from 55 to 60 cents. In the first year, employment increased 3.4 percent while over-all employment was advancing only 1.5 percent. For the first month, retail employment advanced 8 percent, as against 2.3 percent in 1955 and 1.5 percent in 1957.

NEW YORK—A $1 minimum went into effect in February 1957 in all cities over 10,000 population, with a 90-cent minimum in cities of less than 10,000; previously the minimums had been 70 and 65 cents, respectively.

Annual employment in retail trade the following year advanced 2.1 percent while non-farm employment was declining 1.7 percent.

PENNSYLVANIA—A $1 minimum went into effect in January 1959 for cities over 500,000 (Philadelphia and Pittsburgh), while an 85-cent floor was set in cities over 10,000 and 75 cents in cities under 10,000. For the state as a whole, the following year saw retail employment increase eight-tenths of 1 percent as compared to an advance of six-tenths of 1 percent for all employment. In Philadelphia employment rose 2.2 percent as compared with 1.5 percent in all industries; in Pittsburgh it edged down nine-tenths of 1 percent, compared with a decline of 2.4 percent in total employment.

RHODE ISLAND—The minimum went up from 90 cents to $1 in October 1957. For total trade, employment dropped the following year by 2.8 percent while plunging 4.2 percent in all industry. In the first month retail jobs advanced 1.3 percent, compared with 1.8 percent in 1956 and 2.9 percent in 1958.

UTAH—Minimums ranging from 85 cents to $1, varying by zones, went into effect Sept. 1, 1960. The former range was 75 to 90 cents. No annual comparisons are yet available, but in the first month employment was 4.1 percent higher than for the same period the preceding year.

VERMONT—The minimum went up from 75 cents to $1 in October 1959. In the following year retail jobs increased 4.2 percent while total employment in the state dropped by 3.7 percent.

WASHINGTON—The $1 minimum, replacing the previous 65-cent floor, went into effect in June 1959. In the first year of operation retail employment went up 7.6 percent while all industries showed a 4.3 percent rise.

Conference Hails Labor's Support:

Change in Administration Seen As Spur to Housing Legislation

The change of Administrations in Washington may make it possible for Congress to enact a "truly comprehensive, long-range housing program, adequately financed" in 1960, C. J. (Neil) Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., told the 30th annual meeting of the National Housing Conference.

Haggerty told the NHC's closing dinner session that "it is safe to say that this year only a majority in Congress will be enough, rather than two-thirds," referring to the fact that in the Eisenhower Administration a two-thirds vote was needed to override the GOP President's vetoes of liberal legislation.

Highlighting the dinner meeting at Washington's Statler-Hilton Hotel, the NHC presented a citation to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, saluting organized labor's "effective and vigorous support" of the cause of good housing for all of the people of the U. S.

The citation, which Haggerty accepted in Meany's behalf, saluted the AFL-CIO president "for his own untiring efforts and the pioneering contribution of the trade union movement he leads to make America a better place to live for all its citizens."

The NHC said Meany "has demonstrated by his dynamic leadership and humanitarian concern his personal dedication to the goal of a nation in which the blight of slums has been removed from the face of the land and every family and individual has the opportunity for a decent home."

Honor for Labor Movement

In accepting the award, Haggerty said Meany looked upon the award "not as a personal honor, but as one bestowed upon the labor movement as a whole."

Urging the conference to look forward to new challenges rather than looking back at past accomplishments, the BCTD president declared that supporters of decent housing must tackle the problems of "the slums that have not been cleared, the urban centers that have not been restored, the middle-income housing that has not been built."

The achievement of the goal of decent homes, Haggerty said, "demands the full and unimpeded efforts of government and private enterprise alike. These are not rival forces, but complementary ones. Only if both are doing a job can the whole job be done."

Delegates to the two-day conference received a message from Pres. John F. Kennedy saluting the NHC's 30 years of service and praising its "constructive leadership." The President declared:

"Together we share the desire for vigorous action in meeting the housing and urban renewal needs of our country."

The conference adopted a resolution commending the President for his "frank appraisal" of the nation's "present difficulties and failures" in the housing field and declared that the "vigorous measures" Kennedy called for in his housing message to Congress indicate that "once again we can count on the White House for courageous and intelligent leadership in the battle for a better America."

U. S. Asks $12 Million In Anti-Trust Damages

Philadelphia—The federal government has filed its first civil damage suit here against electrical equipment manufacturers involved in the criminal conspiracy to rig bids and fix prices.

In a joint action, the Justice Dept. and the Tennessee Valley Authority claimed $12 million in damages from five manufacturers of circuit breakers—General Electric Co., Westinghouse Electric Corp., Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., I-T-E Circuit Breaker Co., and Federal Pacific Electric Co.

The government claimed it was overcharged more than $4.7 million on purchases of circuit breakers totaling $25 million between 1951 and 1960.

While anti-trust laws limit the federal government to single damages, treble damages totaling $7.48 million are being sought by TVA on the grounds that it is a separate corporation. The Justice Dept. is asking double damages for direct government agencies, which is the penalty provided under a different law for false claims presented to the government.

Other civil suits by the government and by other large purchasers of electrical equipment are expected to follow. The circuit breaker conspiracy was one of 20 criminal charges to which 29 manufacturers pleaded either guilty or no contest.

Attorney Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said the government based its claims for overcharges on the difference in price during a three and one-half month period in 1958 when the price conspiracy temporarily broke down.

Conspiracy Charged

In its complaint, filed in U.S. District Court, the government contended that all of the companies except I-T-E had conspired since 1951 "for the purpose of allocating sales in response to invitations to submit sealed bids to the TVA and the federal agencies."

After I-T-E joined the conspiracy in 1958, a meeting held in November of that year at Atlantic City, N. J., resulted in an agreement that General Electric would get 40.3 percent of the business, Westinghouse, 31.3 percent; Federal Pacific, 15.6; Allis-Chalmers, 8.8, and I-T-E, 4 percent, it was alleged.

The Justice Dept. declared: "The usual practice was for the designated manufacturer to bid the 'list' or 'book' price for the circuit breaker unit involved while the others submitted higher bids. On relatively small cost sales, however, the firms agreed to submit identical bids. . . . Representatives of the firms, to avoid detection, used code numbers in telephone calls and correspondence."

Earlier this year, the five companies were fined a total of $115,000 on the circuit breaker indictment—part of nearly $2 million in fines levied on the 29 companies on the 20 separate charges.

ICFTU Reorganization Gets Board Approval

Brussels—The Executive Board of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has voted at a special session to reorganize the ICFTU structure to permit affiliates to "carry out in their own name and with their own resources" aid and training programs in areas outside their own countries so long as there is consultation with ICFTU.

The decision is expected to resolve the discussions about "independent activities" by ICFTU member organizations in Africa.

ICFTU Pres. Arne Geijer told the board that the plan to raise $10 million over the next three years for the Intl. Solidarity Fund to support trade union organizations in underdeveloped countries has brought $7.5 million in pledges to date.

The British Trades Union Congress informed the Executive Board that it would not contribute to the Solidarity Fund but preferred increasing ICFTU income through raising affiliation fees of member organizations. Such a per capita increase can only be established by the ICFTU World Congress which will meet next in Berlin in July 1962.

The ICFTU is undertaking also a recruiting campaign for qualified trade unionists in nations newly liberated from colonialism. Gen. Sec. Omer Becu said leading member organizations would be asked to name ranking labor officials to an ICFTU service roster from which specialists—economists, organizers, teachers and other technicians—would be drawn for service overseas.

To find qualified men and women ready and available for ICFTU assignments, said Becu, is even more difficult than collecting money.

Two new assistant general secretaries were approved by the Executive Board on Becu's recommendation. They are Herbert Tulatz of the German Federation of Labor, who will be in charge of educational activities, and Stefan Nedzynski to direct ICFTU organizational activities.

The post of director of organization will be allowed to lapse.

Tulatz was formerly head of the DGB training school in Obersurseland and most recently was assigned to aid the TUC of Nigeria with a trade union training program.

Nedzynski was most recently assistant general secretary of the Postal Telegraph and Telephone Intl. Secretariat.

The AFL-CIO was represented at the board meeting by federation Vice Pres. James B. Carey, and Irving Brown, AFL-CIO international representative.

Labor Support Urged For Health Careers

Greater efforts must be undertaken by the trade union movement to encourage young men and women to undertake careers in the field of health, Howard Coughlin, president of the Office Employes and a member of the board of the Commission on Health Careers, has declared.

Unless greater recruitment efforts are made, Coughlin warned, the nation will face "ever-increasing shortages" in the fields of medicine, dentistry and public health.

Lag in Jobs Nation's No. 1 Problem, Meany Tells Hotel Union Delegates

in the services outnumbered production workers.

"This shift in the labor force is cause for serious alarm," Miller's report said. "What it means is that the number of those earning more than $2 an hour is steadily declining and those earning less is steadily rising."

The pending minimum wage bill in Congress was a major issue in the convention. The hotel workers are fighting to obtain coverage. A tentatively-adopted section protecting "untipped workers was stricken before the House Labor Committee prepared the bill for the House fioor.

Ahead of the delegates, in later sessions, were major proposals to grapple with political and legislative problems by providing for annual legislative conferences in Washington with delegates representing the rank and file.

Also scheduled was election of officers. Miller, Sec.-Treas. Jack Weinberger and other officers were unopposed. The convention approved technical changes to conform to the Landrum-Griffin Act.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, in his first speech as a Kennedy Cabinet member before an international union convention, told the delegates that the service trades they represented "have to be upgraded."

"They have to be upgraded in their labor standards and in their labor conditions. The industry is no longer a second-class industry. The people are entitled to be considered as first-class citizens in a first-class society," Goldberg declared.

The Kennedy Administration bill to expand minimum wage coverage, Goldberg acknowledged does not include hotel and restaurant workers.

"There are many millions . . . legitimately entitled to the protection, but it is the obligation of an Administration to deal realistically with a legislative situation" and "command a consensus of support" in Congress, the Secretary said.

Meany in his speech pointed out that the AFL-CIO asked the two major political parties last year at their conventions for "thousands" of new schools, for housing, hospital and highways and urban redevelopment.

"We may be the richest country in the world, but we haven't abolished poverty," he said.

The country's economy should have provided 5.4 million new jobs in the Eisenhower years, he said, to care for the expanded work force. It provided only 3.4 million, adding that "many of these jobs were not full-time."

The 2.5 per cent growth rate of the economy during the Eisenhower years represented an actual 2.5 per cent "falling back," he declared, because "we need a 5 per cent rate" to employ our people.

Failure or refusal of industry to meet automation problems at the bargaining table, Meany said, would increase the pressure for a shorter workweek through national legislation.

In his press conference, the federation president said he wished Congress "would move a little faster to get into the long-range economic problems of the country."

$29 Million Paid Chrysler Retirees

Detroit—The UAW-Chrysler pension trust fund has paid out more than $29 million in benefits to retired workers since 1950 and still has more than $140 million in assets, Vice Pres. Norman Matthews of the Auto Workers has reported.

Reviewing the history of the fund since Chrysler Corp. workers staged a long strike in 1950 to get pensions, Matthews said that 10,041 of the 12,618 Chrysler workers who have retired since 1950 are living and receiving pension payments. Last year almost $5.8 million was paid to retirees, and 1,093 workers were added to the pension rolls.

In AFL-CIO Testimony:

Scholarship Program Hailed As 'Historic' Step Forward

The AFL-CIO has hailed as "well-conceived, imaginative and far-reaching" Pres. John F. Kennedy's program to provide 50,000 college scholarships annually and to provide $300 million a year in loans for the construction of college facilities.

Testifying before a House Education subcommittee, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller hailed the program for higher education as a "historic step." He added:

"This bill would assert, as a matter of national policy, that there should be no ceiling on the educational opportunities of Americans except their individual abilities; and it would provide the means to bring that policy closer to reality."

The Kennedy proposals call for:

- A five-year program of federally financed, state-administered college scholarships, with a first-year authorization of $26.25 million, to "supplement but not supplant" existing programs of financial aid to students.
- A long-term, low-interest program for college classrooms, laboratories, libraries and related structures, that would cost $1.5 billion over a five-year period.

Biemiller said the scholarship program would be a broadening of federal activity in underwriting college education, which began in the New Deal days with parttime, on-campus employment of students through the National Youth Administration, and which included the GI-bill education of some 3 million World War II and Korean veterans.

The AFL-CIO spokesman said labor was "delighted" that the bill offers scholarships up to $1,000 on a general basis to qualified students, without restrictions on the branch of education being pursued, as opposed to legislation enacted during the Eisenhower Administration limiting student aid to science and medical students.

Needs All Talents

"In our view," Biemiller said, "this country needs to develop its best talents in music as well as medicine, in sociology as well as science, in literature as well as logistics."

Biemiller said labor had "misgivings" about whether the goal of scholarships for 50,000 students a year was adequate, and whether the Administration plan of awarding scholarships on the basis of need, as opposed to giving them as a matter of right, was "appropriate."

Endorsing the federal loans for college buildings, the federation spokesman said that "scholarship aid is of no meaning if classroom space is not available," and said the construction program was a "vital corollary of the scholarship program."

He also hailed the extension of Davis-Bacon Act standards and overtime requirements to projects financed by the bill.

4 Union Aides Named To Administration Posts

Pres. John F. Kennedy has announced the selection of Jack T. Conway, for the past 15 years administrative assistant to Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, for the post of deputy administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Conway was one of four trade union staff members appointed recently to sub-Cabinet posts in the Kennedy Administration. The others include:

- Hyman H. Bookbinder, for the past five years a member of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, who was named a special assistant to Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges.
- Charles F. MacGowan, an international representative of the Boiler Makers, who was selected to head the Office of Saline Water in the Interior Department.
- Mrs. Dollie Lowther Robinson, a staff member of the State, County & Municipal Employes' New York City District Council 37, who was named to the post of special assistant to the director of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau.

Director of Housing Conference

Conway, a member of the UAW since 1942, has served as Reuther's assistant since May 1946 and in recent years has been one of the Auto Workers' top authorities on automation and technological change. He is director of the National Housing Conference and has been active in the Citizens' Redevelopment Corp. in Detroit, a privately financed group which works with the city government to promote urban renewal.

Bookbinder, who served as chief of congressional research for the former CIO prior to the AFL-CIO merger, will take over his Commerce Dept. assignment Apr. 1. In announcing the appointment Hodges said Bookbinder would work on implementation of Administration anti-bias programs, and would be active in area redevelopment and the labor-management field. During the Korean War, Bookbinder served in the Commerce Dept. as deputy assistant administrator of the National Production Authority.

MacGowan, chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on Radiation and an atomic energy expert in the Boiler Makers, has also served as labor representative on the nuclear standards board of the American Standards Association. In his new post he will direct the government's efforts to develop practical and economical ways for converting sea water for use in irrigation.

Mrs. Robinson, who directed the organizing of workers in New York municipal hospitals for the AFSCME, is a former national representative of the Clothing Workers and was one-time secretary of the New York State Dept. of Labor. She holds a law degree from New York Law School and has been the recipient of labor scholarships to the Wellesley Institute for Social Progress and the Hudson Shore Labor School.

B. W. Ohler Dies, On USWA Staff

Cleveland—B. W. (Bert) Ohler, member of the Washington staff of the Steelworkers and former district director here, died after a short illness and was buried in Waynesfield, O., his birthplace.

Ohler came to Cleveland in 1922 to take a job in the old Otis mills. In 1936 he helped organize the mills for the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee and was elected a local union officer. Later he was named to the District 28 staff by Dir. William F. Donovan, and succeeded Donovan at the latter's death in 1955. He served until 1957, when Paul A. Schremp was elected director.

Ohler played an active role in a long fight to break the hold of left wing and Communist leadership on the Cleveland Industrial Union Council. He served as vice president and political education director for the district, which covers Lorain, Akron, Canton, Youngstown and other steel centers.

Ohler is survived by three sisters and a brother.

SHARP DEBATE featured the meeting on "Briefing Session" of Dr. George A. Silver, left, chief of the division of social medicine, Montefiore Hospital, New York, and Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.). The issue was medical care for the aged.

Briefing Session Panel Splits on Health Care

A preview of the coming congressional debate on old-age medical care is offered in the latest edition of "Briefing Session," the televised public affairs program produced jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Dr. George A. Silver vigorously urged the establishment of a federal plan through the social security system, as proposed by the Kennedy Administration. Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R., Mo.) just as vigorously denounced the idea. They agreed only on the proposition that society should do more for the aged.

"Voluntary insurance cannot possibly meet the need," Dr. Silver argued. "Not only that, but our Blue Cross system, the only really community insurance scheme providing for payment of the costs of hospital care, is staggering under the load of both inflation and demand—and the greatest part of the demand comes from the needs of the older people."

Curtis said the Administration plan would be "a step backward" because it offers benefits instead of money.

'Give Them Cash'

"If they (older people) need cash—and maybe they do—let us give them the cash," he said. He also suggested raising the $1,200 a year limit on earnings by social security pensioners.

However, the Missouri legislator made it clear he was not really advocating an expansion of the social security system.

"I think that social security is advantageous, and a better system than old-age assistance for those who want it," he said. "I want it on an optional basis . . . that those who want it can have it, but those that do not, do not have to."

Dr. Silver suggested that among workers covered by social security, "the fact that it is compulsory does not bother them as much as it bothers you."

'Not the Same'

"Why should it concern any of us, then, that their medical costs should be met through the same scheme?" he asked.

Moreover, he added, "giving them money and giving them a benefit is not quite the same thing. That is why Blue Cross is a more successful method of meeting hospital costs than indemnity insurance."

Curtis, taking issue with data presented at the start of the program by "Briefing Session" news analyst John MacVane, claimed 60 percent of the aged have health insurance, 70 percent own their own homes (with an average equity of $8,500) and their costs are generally lower because they've paid for their possessions.

Dr. Silver denied the claims and said that in any case, home ownership didn't pay hospital bills.

Education Aid Topic of Next TV Program

The hottest political issue of the moment, federal aid to education, will be the subject of the sixth program in the "Briefing Session" television series.

Rep. John Brademas (D-Ind.), will back the plan, and John R. Miles, education director of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, will oppose it.

Brademas, 34-year-old Harvard graduate and Rhodes scholar, is in his second term in Congress. Previously he served as legislative assistant to Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) and in 1955-56 as executive assistant to Adlai E. Stevenson.

Miles, a former mathematics and science teacher, holds a Ph. D. from Ohio State University. During World War II he worked on the development of aviation radar for the Navy and taught its use to flyers, attaining the rank of lieutenant commander. In 1945 he was assigned by the American Council on Education to study teaching methods in the armed forces. He assumed the chamber post the next year.

Edward P. Morgan is host and moderator of "Briefing Session," and John MacVane is briefing officer.

New Jersey IUC Plans Job Referral Centers

Newark—Unions affiliated with the New Jersey Industrial Union Council will set up referral centers for all unemployed union members in nine centrally located cities as a result of a program recommended here by 350 shop stewards.

Stewards from IUC locals advised council officers to establish centers through which all information on possible jobs should be channeled. They recommended also that the state legislature be urged to pass enabling legislation to help the unemployed.

The Guy on the Line:

Jobless Rate Highest In Blue-Collar Field

By Robert B. Cooney

"The guy who works on the line"—the blue-collar, high-wage, family breadwinner—has been taking the brunt of the recession, a government spokesman said in reporting a worsened job situation in February.

A week earlier, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg released summary figures which showed unemployment rose by 320,000 from January to a 20-year high of 5.7 million in February even as employment rested at 64.7 million.

"The basic employment situation worsened in February," especially when one considers the key wage and salaried workers, said Labor Dept. manpower expert Seymour Wolfbein in releasing a detailed report.

The report showed a continuing job decline in the manufacturing sector, though there were other signs of a "leveling out" in the general job picture.

A total of 1.1 million factory production jobs has been wiped out since February a year ago, cutting this basic workforce to 11.4 million, the report showed.

"There is where we have been socked in terms of the downturn," Wolfbein declared. "The guy who works on the line—he is the one who took the 1 million cut."

The report stated flatly that "one of every 10 factory workers was unemployed in February."

Wolfbein said the jobless rate was 10 percent for skilled workers; 13 percent for semi-skilled and "out of this world"—19 percent—for unskilled workers.

Auto, Steel Hard-Hit

The hardest-hit sectors are auto, steel and machinery. Wolfbein said one of every four auto workers is now jobless; one of every six steel workers and one of every 12 machinery workers.

"Altogether, the unemployment rate in the volatile durable goods manufacturing sector was 12 percent (in February) as compared with 5 percent a year ago," the report noted.

In construction, the report went on, the jobless rate was "especially high in February"—24 percent—partly because this is a seasonal low-point but also because of the year-long decline in building. The rate a year ago was 18 percent.

Wolfbein observed there are 1 million more married men jobless than there were a year ago—a 60 per cent rise. Breadwinners, he added, account for 40 per cent of the unemployed—2.4 million of the 5.7 million total.

The report indicated women were trying to fill the gap in family income. A much greater than usual rise of 500,000 in the workforce over the month was made up almost entirely of women, the report said, attributing this possibly in part to the unemployment or partial employment of the family breadwinner.

Decline Continues

While the non-production or white-collar group in manufacturing has remained fairly level over the year, the declines continued among the blue-collar group. Between January and February, steel was down 4,100; fabricated metal by 20,000; auto was down 72,000, and machinery tapered off by 3,600.

This key metal-working area of the economy showed these declines in the year since February 1960: steel, down by 217,000 to a total of 835,000; fabricated metal, down 113,000 to a total of 751,000; machinery, down 120,000 to a total of 1.1 million and auto, down 236,000 to a total of 1 million.

Wolfbein was asked whether the Labor Dept. had any idea of the extent to which factors in addition to the recession—such as greater mechanization—displaced these workers and perhaps would leave them permanently displaced.

"I don't think there is any question that it is a combination of the two"—technology and the recession, he replied.

While stressing it was "unequivocally clear" that "the employment situation did not improve in February," Wolfbein said there were signs "we may be leveling out."

The factory workweek, the most important of these indicators, remained unchanged at 38.8 hours between January and February, Wolfbein noted.

"COMPREHENSIVE APPROACH" to the problems of chronically depressed areas through passage of area redevelopment legislation was urged by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in testimony before House Banking & Currency subcommittee. Schnitzler, left, and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller are shown discussing testimony with Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), subcommittee chairman.

Unemployed Tell Goldberg Of Job Needs

futile efforts to find temporary jobs.

Goldberg in conferences with Gov. Gaylord Nelson (D), Milwaukee Mayor Henry W. Maier and industry and labor groups warned bluntly that in manufacturing many jobs have "simply vanished" and workers laid off may never be recalled.

Minnesota

A sharp political clash marked Goldberg's visits to Duluth and the Iron Range as the Secretary publicly rejected charges by Minnesota's Republican Gov. Elmer Andersen that his trips to areas of joblessness were an effort to capitalize on misfortune.

The Kennedy program on unemployment compensation and social security improvements, he said in Andersen's presence at Hibbing, are fiscally sound because they are fully self-financed.

The signs carried by jobless workers who met the Goldberg-Andersen tour, he pointed out, bore the words, "We want work" and "We want jobs."

The Secretary heard reports that Minnesota's unemployment had passed the 10 percent figure, that in Duluth it is now 12.3 percent and that in the Iron Range it is 35 percent.

From workers and union officials, Goldberg heard protests of duty-free foreign ore, of automation and proposed railroad mergers that leave workers stranded. He heard pleas for greater diversification of industry in the area and exploitation of the state's timber resources.

Said Roy Peterson, a chemist at a shut-down pig iron plant as he displayed his last unemployment compensation check, "What have I got to look forward to?" Said Steelworker Francis Nash, father of 11, laid off from his Hibbing, Minn., job last Jan. 14, "I haven't been able to find any substitute work."

The temporary extension of jobless benefits Kennedy is now seeking will be followed by a program to improve the unemployment compensation system permanently, Goldberg told Minnesota AFL-CIO Executive Vice Pres. Robert Hess of St. Paul.

Senate Battle Looms On Jobless Pay Bill

mum wage bill which would raise the pay floor, in steps, to $1.25 and broaden coverage to include 4.3 million additional workers, most of them in retail trade.

A sharp floor fight is in prospect, with the Republican-conservative Democratic coalition rallying behind a substitute cosponsored by Representatives William H. Ayres (R-O.) and A. Paul Kitchin (D-N. C.). Similar to the bill which the House substituted for more liberal legislation in 1960, it would raise the minimum to $1.15 and cover only 1.5 million more workers.

● A Senate Labor subcommittee voted quick approval to Kennedy's minimum wage measure, but Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) and Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) threatened a major battle in the full committee as soon as the House acts on the bill.

● The House Ways & Means Committee opened hearings on Kennedy's proposals to keep the $40 billion federal highway program on a "pay-as-you-go" basis by retaining the four-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax, scheduled to be cut back to three cents July 1. The AFL-CIO, in a letter to Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), pledged labor's "complete support" of the highway plan, which also calls for raising taxes on diesel fuel, tires and inner tubes, and hiking heavy truck license fees.

● Controversy still swirled around the Administration's $2.3 billion aid-to-education bill, as Catholic church officials urged inclusion of low-cost loans for private schools and the President called for passage of his plan for federal grants to public schools and separate consideration of the controversial private school question.

Senate passage of the area redevelopment bill, to help regions of chronic unemployment build plants and public facilities to attract new industry, came by a vote of 63 to 27 after two days of debate. Although liberals had urged creation of a separate agency to handle administration, the measure, as passed, gives responsibility for the program to the Commerce Dept.

The bill provides $200 million in long-term, low-interest-bearing loans to industrial communities qualifying under a formula based on unemployment averages; $100 million to rural depressed areas; and $94 million for retraining of workers in new skills.

House Unit Approval

A House Banking subcommittee has approved an area bill, providing the same funds as contained in the Senate bill and Commerce Dept. administration. The bill, expected to be cleared by the full committee the week of Mar. 20, calls, however, for channeling funds through congressional appropriations committees instead of through direct Treasury financing, as provided by the Senate.

The Senate debate on TUC centered on the measure reported out by the Finance Committee, headed by Sen. Harry Flood Byrd (D-Va.), which would require each state to repay, starting in 1964, all federal benefits received in excess of the funds that state paid through a temporary four-tenths of 1 percent increase in payroll taxes. The effect of this move would be to transform TUC into a deferred-loan operation similar to that contained in the measure adopted during the Eisenhower Administration.

Efforts were expected to be made by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) to substitute the approach contained in the House-passed measure which calls for all employers across the country, rather than those in states hardest hit by unemployment, paying for the cost of benefits.

This would retain the Administration principle of equalizing the cost on the basis that the recession is national, rather than local, in origin. The Administration, however, had urged paying for the program through a permanent increase, from $3,000 to $4,800, in the base wages on which payroll taxes are levied instead of raising the tax rate temporarily.

Church Council Backs Health Care for Aged

the National Council of Churches supports in principle legislation which will extend the benefits of Old Age, Survivors' and Disability Insurance to include health care for retired aged persons."

Rejecting the "means tests" qualifications for health benefits under a government program, the general board declared:

"In planning and developing any government insurance program to help older people meet the cost of their medical care, there is a Christian obligation to include provisions for its administration that will adequately safeguard freedom, dignity and self-respect."

The general board also urged the nation's doctors to support such a program, declaring:

"The values to be realized from an improved level of health for America's older citizens are so great that we are confident that cooperation will be forthcoming from all who in our day are custodians of the almost miraculous capacity to maintain the health and cure the diseases of their fellow human beings."

The resolution on aid to depressed areas called for federal leadership "with state and local government and private business and labor participation . . . in a broad, coordinated program for improving the economic base of these areas, and raising the living standards of these disadvantaged Americans."

The "right-to-vote" resolution called on church groups "to discover the facts about registration and voting in their communities" and "to develop programs to encourage all citizens to register and vote."

Discriminatory denial of voting rights, the council statement declared, should be countered by moral suasion and education, by supporting enforcement of existing laws and by supporting additional legislation needed.

Rev. Charles Webber, AFL-CIO representative for religious relations and a representative of the Division of Christian Life and Work on the general board, was among the participants.

Retarded Youngsters Given Free Haircuts

Yakima, Wash.—Monday is the usual day off for members of Barbers Local 619, but every sixth Monday you'll find all 81 members at the School for Retarded Children in nearby Selah, trimming 200 young heads.

Union member Everett Schell started it all by reporting that, for two cents, he'd start cutting hair at the school on his day off. Someone gave him the two cents, and after that, everyone went to Selah.

Safety Award Goes To Rail Fireman

Richmond, Va.—Kenneth G. Stewart, 53, a fireman for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, has been named winner of the February safety award of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen for preventing the wreck of the C & O passenger train "The George Washington."

The union chose Stewart for a $250 cash award and a plaque for his "alertness and quick action in time of danger." When his 200-car freight train was derailed last October near Williamsburg, Va., Stewart ran to flag the passenger train, which stopped short of a derailed freight car blocking the track.

Building Trades Push Drive For Broad Legislative Goals

Temporary Jobless Aid Is Passed

The 87th Congress gave final approval to a temporary unemployment compensation measure, keystone of Pres. John F. Kennedy's anti-recession program, and the House turned at once to a crucial fight over minimum wage improvements.

The TUC program, first major piece of legislation to clear Congress this session, was sped to the White House after final passage by a voice vote in the Senate and a 361-31 rollcall in the House. Kennedy was expected to sign it quickly to make the program operative by Apr. 1.

Benefits Extended

The measure extends jobless pay for a period half again as long as present state maximums, with a ceiling of 39 weeks of combined federal-state aid. It will be financed by a temporary four-tenths of 1 percent increase in employer payroll taxes.

The House battle over minimum wage legislation provided an imposing test of strength for the new President. Kennedy's forces narrowly topped House conservatives in previous trials but the Republican-southern Democratic coalition mounted its hardest attack on the wage bill.

At stake is the Administration-backed bill to raise the minimum wage, in steps, to $1.25 an hour, and to bring 4.3 million additional workers—most of them in retail trade—under the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Conservatives are seeking to substitute a weak measure that would boost the minimum to only $1.15 and would cover only an additional 1.5 million workers. If they fail, efforts are expected to pare down

TOP LABOR, MANAGEMENT and government officials and public representatives are shown meeting with Pres. John F. Kennedy at White House for opening session of President's Labor-Management Advisory Committee. Kennedy created the tripartite committee by executive order to explore the area of free and responsible collective bargaining to insure industrial peace.

Kennedy Tells Advisers:

'Recovery' May See 7% Jobless Rate

Pres. John F. Kennedy has expressed the belief that the nation could go through a form of "recovery" this summer "and still have 6 or 7 percent of our people unemployed in the fall."

The President voiced his warning at the first meeting of his Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy as the tripartite group of labor, management and public representatives met with Administration leaders at the White House.

Kennedy told the group gathered in the Cabinet Room for more than six hours that the problems of long-range unemployment is "a matter of utmost concern."

Kennedy said the purpose of the advisory committee was to give "direction to the general movement of wages and prices so that the general welfare of this country can be served."

In the past, he said, other Presidents have attempted to "intervene in the wage-price matter with general exhortations," but that such pleas "have not had a very great effect." Kennedy said one of the purposes of having the advisory committee was to consider the wage-price situation "before there is a crisis" so that the White House will not "have to come in at the last minute."

The President appointed the 21-member advisory group in February to explore the broad area of

'GE Pattern' Broken by Atomic Labor

Richland, Wash.—The Hanford Atomic Metal Trades Council has broken the national "General Electric pattern" with a wage agreement increased by management in the wake of a telegram from Pres. John F. Kennedy requesting postponement of a scheduled strike and continued contract bargaining.

Kennedy's request was received a few minutes before a midnight strike deadline, set by 19 unions representing 3,200 workers at the $1 billion Hanford Atomic Products plant here, operated by GE for the Atomic Energy Commission.

Aim for April Okay

Five days later, the President announced an agreement had been reached. The negotiators have 45 days to work out exact language of the new three-year pact, but council officers expect to be ready for union ratification meetings about Apr. 17.

Union spokesmen said they were gratified by a wage agreement better than the 3 percent "pattern" forced by GE in other contract settlements, but were concerned about GE's refusal to accept a package recommended by an Atomic Energy Commission panel.

Major features of the agreement are these:

- Complete retroactivity of contract terms to Oct. 3, 1960.
- Wage increases of 3 percent on that date and again on Apr. 2, 1962, plus 1.5 cents an hour across the board on the latter date.
- A boost in shift differentials to 22 cents from 20 cents as of

Race Bias Fight Urged By Meany

By Gene Zack

The need for both emergency federal action to lift the economy out of the recession and long-range measures to insure adequate growth and full employment was spotlighted at the seventh national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The 3,200 delegates met against a background of joblessness in their industry which BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty called "far more extensive" than the seasonal average. In February, he said, unemployment in construction stood at 23.9 percent—up sharply from 17.9 percent in February 1960.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned that "vigorous action" would be necessary to secure enactment of labor's legislative program. He cautioned that while temporary measures are "necessary" to halt the economic decline, their enactment "should not blind us to the overall problem of keeping America working and economically healthy."

In fighting for passage of needed legislation, Meany bluntly told the conference at Washington's Sheraton-Park Hotel, building tradesmen will be faced with the charge that some of their unions are guilty of "discrimination" in their ranks.

"Keep in mind," he said, "that we need friends . . . and the position of some of our locals and national unions is not helpful. Even if we didn't need friends, we should be against discrimination because it is morally wrong. Anyway, it is a straight fact that it is not good business for trade unions to discriminate against anyone."

Unions Warn of Jobless Crisis As Growth Trails Productivity

Automation, in an economy which has not expanded to provide jobs for its growing work force, has created problems which can be met only by government action, spokesmen for four unions have told a House Labor subcommittee.

Testifying on the link between automation and joblessness were Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Solomon Barkin, research director of the Textile Workers Union of America. The House subcommittee is headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.).

In a graphic illustration of the impact of automation, Beirne told the subcommittee that since 1955 the use of telephone service has increased 29.6 percent and the number of telephones in use has gone up 31.4 percent, but that during the same period, employment has decreased 6.2 percent.

Sullivan cautioned the subcommittee that the so-called "service industries" can't be counted on to absorb workers displaced in other industries because service workers have a serious displacement problem of their own.

This problem, he added, is compounded by the fact that the average age of workers in the services fields is higher than in other industries and the service worker left jobless over the age of 50 has a special problem in terms of finding substitute employment or retraining.

In the basic textile industry, Barkin declared, productivity has risen

Jobless Rate Unaffected:

Industrial Production Drop Halted After 6-Month Plunge

A six-month decline in industrial production came to a halt in February well below the level from which it started to plummet in July 1960 but with no noticeable impact on the 20-year high of 5.7 million unemployed in the month.

The Federal Reserve Board reported that industrial output for the month was 102 percent of the 1957 average, the same as in January. In July 1960, when the index began to tumble, the figure was 110.

The production report came as other indicators showed a slight rise in retail sales and an upturn in new housing starts. In contrast, the rate of personal income has been off for four months.

The FRB reported that the February halt in the decline of industrial production resulted partly from greater output by utilities and an assortment of manufacturing industries. These gains offset new declines in production of auto, furniture and some building materials.

The board's index of auto production dropped to 73 percent of the 1957 average in February, down from 78 percent in January and the lowest since November 1959.

The indications that general business activity would show some improvement in the spring were being cautiously accepted by most economists who pointed to the continuing crisis in unemployment.

The February job figures showed an increase of 320,000 over January and an increase in the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment from 6.6 percent of the labor force to 6.8 percent.

Labor Dept. figures reveal also that one out of every 10 factory workers was unemployed in February, with the jobless rate estimated at 10 percent for skilled workers, 13 percent for semi-skilled and 19 percent for unskilled.

The figures showed that one out of every four auto workers was jobless during the month, one out of every six steel workers and one of every 12 machinery workers.

Leading economists, taking due note of the jobless picture, are more concerned with the long-range rate of growth of the economy than with signs of a short-term pickup. The rate of unemployment is the key to the recession's end, they maintain.

ICFTU Approves Aid Projects by Affiliates

Brussels, Belgium—A decade of debate in the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions on the question of "independent" or "unilateral" activities by affiliated national centers has been resolved by the ICFTU executive board.

In a report presented by ICFTU General Sec. Omer Becu and adopted without dissent at the board's special meeting here, it was decided:

- ICFTU affiliates cannot embark on programs of aid, training, exchange of visits, organization and other activities outside their own countries without regard to existing ICFTU programs. This is intended to avoid duplication of effort.
- However, "there is no automatic and rigid rule on certain activities which affiliated organizations carry out in their own name and with their own resources." Individual organizations wishing to undertake special or additional activities should inform and consult with the ICFTU secretariat or the executive board.

"The ICFTU is the sum of all its parts," said the ICFTU document. "In certain specific instances, in certain areas, in certain types of activities, the free labor movement of the world, that is to say, the ICFTU 'whole,' may best express itself through the special and particularly suitable nature of one or more of its 'parts.'

"The fact that in such cases the operating element would be an affiliate of the ICFTU should not be hidden. On the contrary, it should be made known that the activities are carried out in full agreement and cooperation with the ICFTU.

"The ICFTU will be strengthened by this kind of approach. Its capacity for service will be increased. Its appeal to potential members will be greater. A diversified, yet fully coordinated approach is perhaps the best way to realize the ideals of the free trade union movement."

ICFTU Raps Portugal on Forced Labor

Brussels—A large-scale system of forced labor exists in Angola and Mozambique, Portuguese colonies in Africa, it has been charged by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Assailing the Portuguese government for imposing totalitarian rule at home and its colonies, the ICFTU executive board said that the fascist Salazar dictatorship "unfortunately continues to be supported by a number of democratic governments in the free world."

"We deplore the fact," the board said, "that Portugal has been allowed to join NATO as well as intergovernmental organizations which have been established in free Europe. We appeal to all these organizations to make it clear to the Portuguese government that continued membership requires the granting of genuine democratic rights to the people."

A special ICFTU study on conditions in Portuguese colonies disclosed that natives can be forced to work in order to pay off debts. The common practice is for an employer who wants additional workers to apply to the local district officer who in turn supplies "tax defaulters" or else submits to a local native chief a quota to be filled. The most recent estimates, according to the ICFTU, are that there are 379,000 "contradados" or forced laborers.

The ICFTU reported that there is a resistance movement in the two Portuguese colonies which has led to bloody clashes between police and Africans. In February 1961, said the ICFTU, at least 31 Africans were killed during demonstrations near Luanda, Angola.

2 GE Officials Quit as Result Of Jail Terms

Two high-ranking General Electric Co. officials have resigned from jobs paying them more than $100,000 a year after serving jail sentences for their roles in fixing prices and rigging bids on sales of heavy electrical equipment.

William S. Ginn, GE vice president and general manager of the company's turbine division, and George E. Burens, a former GE vice president who had been demoted a step, said the publicity resulting from the anti-trust law violations had limited their effectiveness with the company. Each had served 25 days of a 30-day jail sentence.

Earlier GE's president, Robert Paxton, had announced his retirement because of ill health and Board Chairman Ralph J. Cordiner resigned as head of the Commerce Dept.'s Business Advisory Council.

Neither had been indicted in the anti-trust cases, but both had been under heavy fire because of the company's deep involvement in the conspiracy.

last Oct. 3 and to 24 cents from 22 cents Apr. 2, 1962.

- An eighth paid holiday, plus another half-holiday on the last shift worked before Christmas in each year.
- Four weeks' vacation after 25 years of service, three weeks after 13 years for those who accept a company plan for "saving" days.

Wage Breakthrough

The breakthrough came in the company's offer on wages and other economic benefits. The unions said that, all together, they came close to equaling the 4 percent increase recommended for 1962 by the AEC labor-management relations panel.

General Electric Co. operates the plutonium plant for AEC. Its bargaining policies, as developed by former Vice Pres. Lemuel Boulware, have been strongly objected to by unions as "Boulwareism."

Union objections were summed up in a charge that the company refused to bargain in good faith last fall with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint against the company and a trial examiner has begun hearings.

Reviewing the GE bargaining method, IUE Pres. James B. Carey said that GE bragged, in advance of negotiations, that its technique was to formulate a "single, fixed package proposal which it would force the union to accept."

The IUE president charged that management refused to make a single significant change when a strike threatened.

Rubber Workers Adopt Bargaining Program

Akron, O.—Goals of the Rubber Workers in 1961 contract negotiations will include a general wage increase and a program aimed at combating loss of jobs due to automation, the 160-member URW Intl. Policy Committee has decided.

Meeting shortly before the opening of negotiations with three major companies employing 41,000 workers, the committee set these guideposts for 450 local union negotiating committees:

- A wage increase based on "near-record" company earnings.
- Correction of wage inequities through negotiations on a company basis.
- Improvements in the supplemental unemployment benefits program.
- A jointly-administered automation fund to protect workers laid off because of technological changes.
- Protection of skilled workers against the contracting-out of work normally performed by them.

Contract talks have begun with the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. for 20,000 workers, and with the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. for 17,500 employes. The two "master agreements" on working conditions and SUB expire Apr. 15. Negotiations on wages will take place later in the year, URW Pres. George Burdon said.

The union and the General Tire Co. will meet Apr. 5 to discuss a new contract for 3,500 workers. Mar. 29 has been set for contract talks with the Seiberling Rubber Co. to replace an agreement expiring May 1.

The URW Policy Committee recommended 11 steps to provide "economic security in an age of automation." They include cooperating with government and industry to achieve a full employment economy; a shorter workweek with no loss in weekly pay, improved early retirement benefits, vested pension rights, and first hiring rights for laid-off workers at any new plant of a company.

by 70 percent from 1947 to 1960 while employment has dropped 40 percent.

The industry, he declared, has concentrated its energies on more productivity and fewer workers instead of seeking to devise "new products which would create new markets and broaden the demand sufficiently to offset the rising productivity."

Carey said the solution to the unemployment problem must come about through the efforts of "the federal government and the American labor movement." Big business and industry, he charged, "have fought tooth-and-nail against measures designed to put the country back to work and to end vast human suffering."

Measures urged by the four union spokesmen to meet the long-range unemployment problem included legislation to stimulate the economy and increase purchasing power, continuing study of the impact of automation by the federal government, joint labor-management action to plan and prepare for technological changes, a shorter workweek and federal aid and leadership in retraining programs.

AFSCME Gets 5% Raise for 70,000

Harrisburg, Pa.—The State, County & Municipal Employes have announced acceptance of a 5 percent across-the-board increase for 70,000 state employes, the result of union negotiations with Gov. David L. Lawrence (D) and his aides.

Pres. Reuben H. Miller of the Pennsylvania State Employes Council said discussions are continuing with state officials on details of the increase and on the union's proposal for improved fringe benefits.

Braniff Attendants Pick ALPA Unit

Chicago—Flight attendants on Braniff Airways voted 214 to 8 in a National Mediation Board election to be represented by the Stewards and Stewardess Division of the Air Line Pilots Association.

The 8 votes were cast for a former ALPA affiliate, the Air Line Stewards and Stewardesses Association, which was replaced by the new ALPA division.

The officers of ALSSA, who opposed the division set up in the ALPA, last month requested a charter from the AFL-CIO Executive Council as a separate federation affiliate. The council rejected the application on the grounds that it could not be considered under the federation's constitution.

ALSSA officers announced shortly afterwards that they had been granted a charter by the Transport Workers Union.

Press Release Does It:

Darlington Mill Case Reopened by NLRB

A management press release may pave the way for long-overdue compensation for 540 textile workers who were thrown out of their jobs more than four years ago when the Darlington Mfg. Co. of Darlington, S. C., closed its doors rather than bargain with a union.

The Textile Workers Union of America, which has refused to give up in its battle to win back pay and jobs for Darlington workers, has won a rehearing before a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner on the basis of a press release issued by Deering, Milliken & Co., the far-flung textile empire headed by Roger Milliken.

It was Milliken, in his "other hat" role as president of the Darlington Mfg. Co., who closed the 80-year-old mill after his workers had voted for union representation.

The NLRB long ago found the Darlington mill guilty of unfair labor practices—a hollow verdict since the company had gone out of business. The big battle, which has filled hundreds of pages of testimony, has been over the union's contention that Deering, Milliken & Co., was the parent corporation and should be made to provide jobs for Darlington workers at other mills it controlled and to compensate them for loss of wages.

An NLRB trial examiner on Dec. 31, 1959, rejected the union's contention and held that Deering, Milliken & Co. did not directly control the operations or labor relations of the Darlington mill. The company's claim that it merely provided certain financial and marketing services for its affiliated mills was in effect upheld.

While the union's "exceptions" to this finding were awaiting review by the NLRB, an apparently routine story in several textile industry trade publications caught the eye of TWUA officials.

Deering, Milliken & Co. announced the appointment of three manufacturing division presidents. Furthermore, each division president would have under him a group of mills.

This, the TWUA told the labor board in asking that the case be remanded to the trial examiner on the basis of new evidence, "proves that Deering, Milliken exercises real and substantial control over the operation of all Deering, Milliken mills . . . and that Darlington could not have been liquidated without Deering, Milliken's instigation and approval."

The union's attorneys added that the establishment of the three manufacturing divisions "is clear proof that Deering, Milliken treats its 'independent' mills like yo-yos, and shifts their ownership and status whenever it suits its convenience."

The NLRB general counsel joined the union in the successful plea to the board to send the case back for further consideration.

Factory Layoffs Outpace Hirings

Recalls in a number of hard-hit industries caused the rate of factory hirings to rise more than seasonally in January, but total separations continued "appreciably" to outpace hirings, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Separations exceeded hirings by 11 per 1,000 workers, less than in the two previous months but more than in nearly all other months in 1960, the report said.

The separation rate for all manufacturing—quits plus layoffs—remained unchanged in January at 41 per 1,000 workers. The hiring rate—recalls plus new hires—rose from 19 per 1,000 workers in December to 30 per 1,000 workers.

The report said the better-than-seasonal advance in hirings came in some durable goods industries which had experienced unusually high layoff and low hiring rates in previous months.

First National Contract Negotiated by ILGWU

opened. The union's other contracts still are limited to regions or metropolitan areas or to individual plants.

The new two-year national pact has a retroactive date of Jan. 1, 1961, for wages and working conditions. Wage increases range from 7 to 14 percent.

Under the agreement, Bobbie Brooks agrees to produce all its varied products in ILGWU shops. The firm makes dresses, blouses, separates, sportswear coordinates and knitwear in 12 company-owned plants and 25 plants operated under contract by others.

The contract also provides for a 35-hour week, use of the ILGWU union label, and the registration and designation of contractors. Management also has agreed, Dubinsky said, to make contributions into health, welfare, supplemental unemployment, severance and retirement funds to cover all workers in company-owned or contractor-owned shops.

Dubinsky said he believes the new pact will contribute to the "stability and constructiveness of this growing firm." The company does $43 million in business annually, and plans further expansion.

Said company Pres. Maurice Saltzman:

"It was not easy to achieve the innovations embodied in this contract. There is no precedent for them in the women's garment industry."

Saltzman said, however, that it "seemed only common sense" to eliminate the duplicate and triplicate efforts required by an "outmoded procedure." He said he joins Dubinsky in giving credit to employes for contributing much to the growth of the company.

Runaway Employer Told To Bargain on Layoffs

The owners of a Philadelphia blouse factory were guilty of unfair labor practices in concealing from the union their plans to close the plant and move to South Carolina, a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has ruled.

Trial Examiner Ramey Donovan ordered Sidele Fashions, Inc., now doing business as Personality Sportswear, Inc., of Ware Shoals, S. C., to bargain upon request with the Ladies' Garment Workers on possible layoff pay and rehiring rights for 215 former Philadelphia employes.

The examiner held that owners Mac J. Cahn and Sidney L. Schiro moved their operations for economic reasons—an allegedly unsatisfactory profit picture—and dismissed other unfair labor practice charges.

The employer and union had lived "peaceably" for 20 years, and in 1952, after a plant closing of a few weeks on grounds of financial hardship, the union agreed to a 10 percent cut in wages, the NLRB report said.

In mid-1959, however, the employer secretly arranged for the construction of a plant in South Carolina in a "distress area" where 600 workers had been laid off earlier.

$30 Million In SUB Paid Auto Workers

Detroit—More than $30 million in supplemental unemployment benefits was paid to laid-off members of the Auto Workers in 1960 as a result of union-negotiated SUB agreements, the union's Social Security Dept. has reported.

UAW members in the plants of the industry's "Big Three" collected more than $19.5 million in supplemental benefits—$8.8 million from General Motors, $5.5 million from Ford, $5.2 million from Chrysler.

The Studebaker SUB fund paid out $1.7 million and the American Motors fund $168,000 to workers hit by plant layoffs.

In the farm equipment and road-building equipment industries, employes of the five largest firms divided $6.7 million in SUB benefits because of the union-won program.

UAW union members in supplier plants of auto, farm equipment and road-building machinery producers received an estimated $5 million in payments to cushion the shock of unemployment.

For the "Big Three" alone, the UAW-GM fund issued 531,668 checks in 1960; the UAW-Ford fund distributed 284,377 checks, and the UAW-Chrysler fund 287,700.

The workers have been hit by heavy production cuts resulting in the layoff of thousands. The union has called a special convention in Detroit Apr. 27-29 at which delegates from 1,275 local unions will draft contract proposals to meet current industry problems.

Maryland Legislature Passes 'Anti-Scab' Bill

Annapolis, Md.—A labor-backed bill barring the employment of professional strikebreakers during labor disputes has been passed by the Maryland legislature and is awaiting the signature of Gov. J. Millard Tawes (D).

The bill, one of the shortest and strongest measures enacted in the current drive to restrict the use of strikebreakers, makes it unlawful "for any person who customarily and repeatedly offers himself for employment in place of employes involved in a strike" to take the place of a striking worker or to offer himself for employment in a struck establishment.

Fines, Jail Provided

Penalties of up to a $1,000 fine and three years in prison are provided both for the professional strikebreaker and for any third party who furnishes strikebreakers.

Despite employer opposition, the bill won overwhelming approval in the Maryland lower house and was quickly passed by the Senate.

Newspaper and printing trades unions, which have led the fight for anti-strikebreaking bills with active assists from state labor federations, said the legislative outlook is bright in several other states, including Rhode Island, Delaware and Alaska. Hearings have been held or scheduled in a half dozen other states.

In Washington state, Gov. Albert D. Rosellini (D) has signed an "anti-scab" bill passed by the legislature. A New Jersey bill also became law this year. Massachusetts and Pennsylvania already have laws on the books regulating the importation of strikebreakers.

A strikebreaker bill, which passed the Delaware House 21 to 6, was awaiting action by the Senate as the AFL-CIO News went to press. In Alaska, the Senate Labor Committee has reported favorably a similar bill. The Rhode Island legislature, which twice passed anti-strikebreaking bills at its last session only to have them vetoed by a Republican governor, is expected to act on new legislation this year. The present governor, John A. Notte, Jr., is a Democrat.

Killed in 2 States

Adjournment of the West Virginia and New Mexico legislatures killed anti-strikebreaker legislation which had passed one house in each state.

An early vote was expected in the Michigan Senate and committee hearings have been held in California, Connecticut, Colorado, Illinois, Kansas and Minnesota.

Sayen Again Named Head of Pilots' Unit

Mexico City—Pres. C. N. Sayen of the Air Line Pilots has been elected president of the Intl. Federation of Air Line Pilots Associations for the ninth consecutive time.

Representatives of 44 pilot organizations from many parts of the world attended the 16th annual conference here and also elected these other officers:

Capt. Eric Jackson of Ireland, deputy president; Capt. A. J. Spooner of Great Britain, secretary; Capt. N. P. Barron of the Netherlands, treasurer.

Three other pilots from the United States were named to regional vice presidencies—Capt. W. A. Masland, North Atlantic region; Capt. F. T. Sterling, Jr., Caribbean; and Capt. D. L. Leonard, Pacific.

Sayen said the delegates, representing "virtually all the professional air line pilots in the world," reviewed 218 papers covering technical aviation problems as well as sociological and industrial relations problems.

Ontario Labor Asks Strikebreaker Ban

Toronto, Ont. — Canadian labor doesn't intend to be left out when it comes to legislation to curb the use of strikebreakers in labor disputes.

The 120,000-member Toronto & District Labor Council has called on the Ontario government to enact a citizens' job protection bill based on the model legislation which has been introduced in 26 state legislatures in the United States.

The council acted on a resolution submitted by Typographical Local 91.

Building Trades Push Legislative Aims

MEASURES TO HALT the recession and long-range actions to meet unfilled social needs topped agenda for 3,200 delegates to seventh national legislative conference of AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. Delegates, shown here at opening session at Washington's Sheraton-Park Hotel, spent two days on Capitol Hill urging senators and representatives to support labor's legislative goals. Particular stress was laid on "situs-picketing" measure.

Kennedy Pledges Action To Improve Economy

Pres. John F. Kennedy, contrasting the nation's record-breaking 64.7 million employed men and women with the 5.7 million unemployed, has declared that he will "never be satisfied to have the highest employment in the history of our country, when we also have a 20-year high in unemployment."

In a letter to C. J. Haggerty, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. on the occasion of the department's seventh national legislative conference, the President pointed out that in addition to the 5.7 million unemployed hundreds of thousands more are working short hours with reduced incomes.

"I will never be satisfied to have most of our people prosperous while millions of our citizens are in want," Kennedy declared in the letter read to the conference's 3,200 delegates by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg.

The President declared that his Administration "fully intends to meet its obligations . . . for contributing to a healthier economic life, with broader job opportunity, for more Americans" in order to prove that the American people "are masters of our own economic destiny."

Kennedy said a major part of his program to move the economy forward calls for "needed stimulation" of the construction industry. He listed such short-range programs as reduction of FHA mortgage rates and acceleration of urban renewal and such long-term goals as the federal highway program and housing as key components of this program.

"As a nation," the President wrote the BCTD delegates, "we are just beginning to build toward greater strength and capability. The goals before us are clear. In devising the means to achieve them, our wisdom, energy and conviction are tested.

"We look to you in the construction trades for efficiency, quality of performance and dependability. I am confident that you will discharge that responsibility well."

CofC Anti-Union Phony Snaps Back

At the initiative of the National Labor Relations Board the U.S. Chamber of Commerce withdrew and corrected a press release aimed at AFL-CIO building trades unions.

The chamber's original release, timed to coincide with the Building & Construction Trades Dept. legislative conference in Washington, said "the government" had filed secondary boycott charges against the unions "an average of once a day" in 1960.

In fact, "the government" did no such thing. The chamber's corrected release acknowledged that boycott charges were filed by "employers and employes." The chamber said nothing about how many of the charges were withdrawn or settled.

Senate Whips Seek Better Davis-Bacon

The Senate's majority and minority whips—Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (R.-Calif.)—have joined forces in sponsoring a proposed amendment to the Davis-Bacon Act.

The bipartisan bill would require the Secretary of Labor to consider fringe benefits, as well as hourly rates of pay, in determining the prevailing wage to be paid on federal construction work.

When the original law was passed in 1935, Humphrey said on the Senate floor, fringe benefits were largely unheard of. Today, he added, building craftsmen negotiate agreements covering health, welfare and pension funds, supplementary unemployment benefits and contributions to apprentice training programs.

These payments, he said, "now are a very large part of the hourly wage costs in the construction industry," but are not taken into account in making prevailing wage determinations for government construction purposes.

Labor Day Film In Award Contest

The AFL-CIO's 1960 Labor Day film, "Land of Promise," has been selected by the pre-screening committee of the Education Film Library Association as a contestant for one of the blue ribbon awards in its annual American Film Festival.

Meany Cites Need of Fight For Key Bills

called on building tradesmen to use their influence to halt racial discrimination in the construction field, declaring such policies are "wrong and harmful, whether practiced by a union or by an employer."

"The Administration," Goldberg declared, "is determined that discrimination will not continue either in the government itself, or within those companies doing business with the government. I call upon you to join wholeheartedly with us in stamping out discriminatory practices on the job, in hiring and in training."

In a speech prepared for delivery at the conference, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N. Y.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, registered "vigorous protest" against what he termed the "denial of free access to the Negro to engage in crafts and trades."

Likened To Trade Restraint

The New York Democrat said such discrimination "represents a combination in restraint of employment" which he called "no different, no less ominous than a combination in restraint of trade."

Referring to the BCTD's fight for passage of "situs picketing" legislation to permit picketing of multi-employer job sites, Powell declared:

"Let every man have not only the right to picket on the site but to work on the site.

"It is labor's position that the right to picket on the site is basic and fundamental to its existence—there are many who agree. The Negro claims that the right to work on the site is basic to his existence—there are more to agree."

Meany said the "situs picketing" amendments sought by the BCTD were designed to give building tradesmen the "same equity" enjoyed by other trade unionists, and declared that the campaign to amend Taft-Hartley "has the complete support and cooperation of the AFL-CIO."

Goldberg read the conference a letter from Pres. John F. Kennedy pledging that the Administration would "make every effort" to amend the law and correct "the inequity stemming from the Denver Building Trades Rule" of the National Labor Relations Board. That decision held that picketing of multi-employer building sites constituted a secondary boycott.

Kennedy, recalling his fight last year to change the law, declared: "It is still my opinion that secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act regarding picketing activity at sites where several employers pursue a mutual enterprise has unrealistically curtailed the right to strike."

Goldberg told delegates he was "in perfect accord with Pres. Kennedy when I say that this is certainly an abridgement of your right to strike."

In addition to the situs-picketing bill, the conference was called to rally support for modernization of the Davis-Bacon Act; broadening of the Fair Labor Standards Act to cover 4.3 million more workers and raising the minimum wage to $1.25; passage of legislation providing medical care for the aged under social security; enactment of the Administration's program of federal grants for both school construction and teachers' salaries; and passage of Kennedy's depressed areas legislation.

Haggerty said the legislative program "is not one designed with only the building tradesmen in mind, but rather one designed to benefit every segment of our society." He added: "We are determined to press for consideration and enactment of our program."

He reminded delegates that they represented 3.5 million workers in 18 unions with more than 8,000 locals in 600 cities across the nation, and that they are employed in "the largest single industry in our country." In addition to the workers in the building industry, he said, another 9.5 million workers are employed in related industries.

The BCTD president described the industry as the "balance wheel of our entire economy," which has felt "the effects of eight years of . . . inaction." As a result, he said, unemployment is at a record high in the face of a backlog of unmet construction needs.

Jobs Called No. 1 Problem

Meany said the entire legislative program advocated by labor "is directed to America's No. 1 domestic problem—unemployment," and warned that this nation can exercise leadership in the world struggle against Communist tyranny "only if we have a healthy economy."

America, he said, cannot meet the problems arising from a constantly increasing labor force "at our present rate of economic growth." To bring about full use of the nation's potential, he said, "there must be greater stimulation of the economy by the federal government and greater consideration of the problem of unemployment from management and finance."

The AFL-CIO president reminded delegates—who spent two days on Capitol Hill talking over labor's legislative program with senators and representatives from their home states—that "every piece of progressive social legislation in the past 25 years has had the union label on it."

In pushing for its program this year, Meany said, labor must face the fact that despite the election of a liberal President, the Congress has "less of a liberal look than it did two years ago."

The close votes in the House on modernizing the Rules Committee and on passage of Pres. Kennedy's feed grain bill, and the narrow Senate victories on key amendments to depressed areas and temporary unemployment compensation bills, he said, point up the "very close division between conservatives and liberals."

Other speakers at the conference included Senators Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), Thomas H. Kuchel (R-Calif.), Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) and Joseph Clark (D-Pa.); Representatives John E. Fogarty (D-R. I.), Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.); and AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Goldberg Passes On Some Good Advice

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg came up with a slogan for the seventh national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The Cabinet officer said the idea was contained in a post card he had received at the Labor Dept. just before leaving to address the BCTD delegates. The card contained this terse message:

"Do something!"

Kennedy Names Holleman To Push Equal Employment Opportunities

Assistant Sec. of Labor Jerry R. Holleman has been appointed by Pres. Kennedy as executive vice chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. His job will be to carry out policies aimed at eliminating discriminatory practices in federal employment and on work performed by private contractors for the government.

The White House statement announcing Holleman's appointment said he was recommended for the post by both Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, chairman of the committee and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg who, as vice chairman, has been assigned responsibility for directing the program.

Two Groups Combined

Holleman is former president of the Texas State AFL-CIO and earlier had served as business manager of a Lubbock, Tex., local of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and president of the Lubbock Building & Construction Trades Council.

The equal opportunity committee was set up by Kennedy earlier this month as a strengthened combination of the former President's Committee on Government Contracts and a separate Committee on Government Employment.

In establishing the committee, Kennedy said the anti-discrimination directives will be vigorously enforced.

The White House announcement declared:

"Holleman will perform his new duties in addition to his present assignment as Assistant Sec. of Labor . . . Holleman's appointment gives the Secretary the assistance of a ranking official of the Labor Dept. in carrying out these duties."

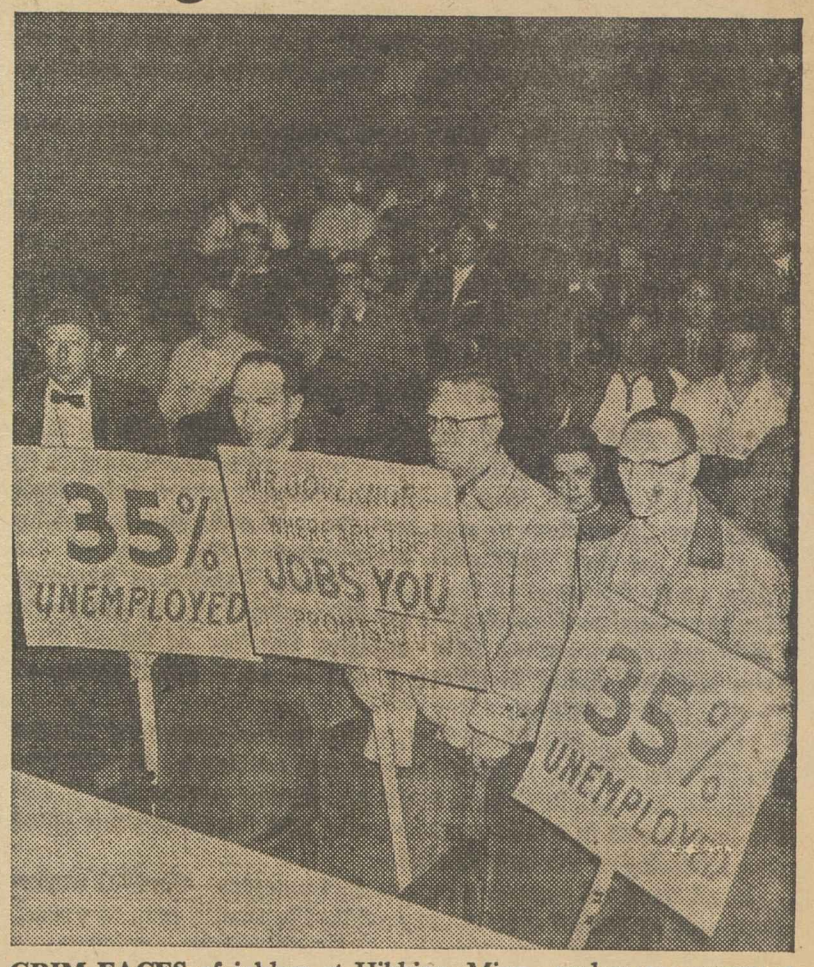
'Give Us Work,' Nation's Jobless Ask

TRAGEDY OF UNEMPLOYMENT shows in the tense faces of Mr. and Mrs. James LaFreniere, Hibbing, Minn., as they talk to Rep. John Blatnik (D-Minn.), Goldberg and Minnesota Gov. Elmer Andersen (R). LaFreniere, father of six children, hasn't worked since October, is ineligible for jobless aid.



GRIM FACES of jobless at Hibbing, Minn., underscore messages on signs which 1,700 unemployed Iron Range workers and their families brought to meeting with Labor Secretary at Hibbing High School Auditorium.

PLEA for federal aid to diversify Minnesota's Iron Range to prevent jobless impact resulting from one-industry economy is voiced by John Bradovich, young president of Steelworkers local at public meeting with Goldberg.

SOME OF CROWD which filled Duluth, Minn., Labor Temple is shown here. Scenes like this were common on Goldberg's second tour of hard-hit states since Kennedy Administration took office. Purpose of trip was to give Goldberg first-hand picture of problems which nation's 5.7 million unemployed are facing to help Administration devise necessary aid.

The Omen Mongers

THE CALENDAR ARRIVAL of spring has touched off an eager search for economic omens to shore up the proposition that the current recession is the shortest-lived of the postwar slumps and recovery is as far away as the nearest robin.

Given the various indicators available and the political outlook of the indicator readers, it is possible to come up with almost any sort of forecast. But there is one hard, stubborn fact that cannot be avoided.

In February there were 5,700,000 persons looking for jobs they couldn't find. The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment was at a near-crisis stage of 6.8 percent.

There will be fluctuations in the actual number of unemployed in the coming months and perhaps a slight decline in the rate of unemployment.

But unless a wide-ranging anti-recession program is put into effect by the White House and Congress, the strong probability exists that the rate of unemployment at the end of 1961 will be at the same critical level as at the beginning of the year.

The acute problem facing the nation is not short-term improvements in the economy, welcome as they are, but long-term growth.

A few trendlines on a chart have about the same relationship to a fully productive economy as the first few blades of crabgrass have to a green lawn come next winter.

12-Year-Old Pledge

TWELVE YEARS AGO Congress adopted housing legislation including a pledge of a "decent home and suitable living environment for every American family." This pledge is a long way from redemption judging from the latest Census Bureau figures on housing.

The inventory of the nation's housing conducted last year reveals that one out of every six housing units is dilapidated or lacks some or all plumbing facilities.

The Census reports lends a new urgency to the need for congressional action on Pres. Kennedy's housing program designed to eradicate slums and substandard housing as well as to provide loans for low-rent housing units, cooperative housing and units designed especially for elderly.

540 Victims

MORE THAN FOUR YEARS AGO a textile mill in South Carolina provided the classic example of union-busting in the South when it closed down rather than bargain with a union freely chosen by its workers to represent them in collective bargaining.

Since the day Darlington Manufacturing Co. slammed the door on its workers and the Textile Workers Union of America, its operators have exercised every known legal device and tactic to avoid compensating 540 employes for loss of wages after the National Labor Relations Board found the mill guilty of unfair labor practices.

Now Deering, Millikin & Co., which in fact controlled Darlington Manufacturing Co. but claimed it had nothing to do with labor relations, has admitted in a trade publication release that it does too have a role in textile manufacturing and the NLRB has agreed to a rehearing of the union's claim.

In all the legal maneuvering one fact emerges—the 540 workers have still to collect their money while the textile empire goes its union-busting way.

In Statement to Senate Committee:

Murrow Sees USIA Reflecting Policy and Ideals of the People

The following is the text of Edward R. Murrow's opening statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee regarding his nomination as director of the U.S. Information Agency. The committee and the Senate have approved his nomination.

MY NAME IS Edward R. Murrow. I was christened Egbert but abandoned that name at the age of 16 while working in logging camps in western Washington.

Most of my adult life has been spent in the periphery of the academic world and in the field of radio and television. These activities have involved considerable travel, at home and abroad, and some acquaintance with statesmen, educators and newsmen in many countries.

As a foreign correspondent, I am more familiar with the work of the U.S. Information Agency abroad than here in Washington.

At the conclusion of a trip around the world several months ago, I gave it as my opinion that the work of USIA abroad had improved very considerably under the direction of Ambassador George Allen and am pleased to have the opportunity to repeat that opinion here.

If I am confirmed in the office to which the President has nominated me, I shall attempt to discharge the duties and responsibilities of that office to the best of my ability.

The agency will attempt to make United States policy, as designed by the President, everywhere intelligible and wherever possible, palatable. We shall endeavor to reflect with fidelity to our allies, to the uncommitted nations, and to those who are hostile to us, not only our policy but our ideals.

We shall operate on the basis of truth. Being convinced that we are engaged in hot and implacable competition with Communist forces around the world, we will not be content to counter their lies and distortions. We shall constantly reiterate our faith in freedom.

To the emerging nations we shall say, "We share your dreams." There is a dynamism in freedom which permits and encourages progress without binding the individual to the wheel of the state. We shall try to make it clear that we as a nation are not allergic to change and have no desire to sanctify the status quo. This nation not only has a birth certificate, it holds the patent rights on change and revolution by consent.

THE AGENCY WILL TRY to speak on behalf of all the American people with restraint and reason. All of us in the agency recognize that in spite of electronic developments, the best form of communications is still face-to-face. To that end, any men and women we recruit and train must be able and eager to serve the cause of freedom which we regard as being indivisible.

The voice of this country should at all times be steady—firm but not bellicose—carrying the conviction that we will not flinch or falter in the face of threats or provocations.

In the end of the day it may well be that the example of this nation will be more important than its dollars or its words. If we, in this generous and capacious land, can demonstrate increasing equality of opportunity, social justice, a reasoned concern for the education, health and the equality under law of all our citizens, we will powerfully affect, and probably determine, the destiny of the free world and that freedom may be contagious, may incite those who have lost that most precious of all possessions to strive to do likewise.

No man can set either a time or dollar limit upon this contest between the forces of freedom and those who would demean and brutalize mankind. The contest will be prolonged and it will cost much treasure. There is no guarantee that we will win it. If we should lose, it will be by default, and history will take its revenge. We cannot imitate the tactics or the techniques of the dictatorships that now ride the backs of most of this planet's people. We cannot threaten, we must persuade. Freedom cannot be imposed, it must be sought for, and frequently fought for.

We live in a world we didn't make. We are honored by an awesome responsibility of leadership we did not seek. We must defend and expand that leadership in company with our allies and other like-minded peoples because that is what our history and our heritage demand of us. We are the pivot upon which the history of our time will turn. Our task is formidable and difficult but difficulty is one excuse history has never accepted.

We must, I think, approach the task with patience and fortitude and with an abiding belief that not only our own ancestors who bought our freedom for us but all those who have suffered and struggled and died in the pursuit of freedom throughout all time are watching to see whether we be worthy of our heritage.

If I am confirmed in the office to which the President has appointed me, I will, together with my colleagues in the agency, attempt to be worthy of the trust.

Morgan Says:

For Kennedy, After 2 Months The Honeymoon Isn't Over Yet

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

AS SPRING ARRIVED with a warm sunny smile in Washington, the Kennedy Administration began its third month in office, its hopes bursting like the magnolia buds but its roots not down very far and its accomplishments still pretty much unleafed on the naked branch.

Morgan

To change to a more sporting simile making the rounds, credited to a veteran of several previous Democratic frontiers, the regime resembles the Harlem Globetrotters warming up before a game — plenty of fancy footwork and flashy passing but nobody has scored a basket.

Solid accomplishment or not, there has been a sharp change of atmosphere in the nation's capital and it is more than can be credited to the spring equinox. To that British master of journalistic prose, the Manchester Guardian's James Morris, "today's Washington is like a woman who has switched from horn-rims to contact lenses: there is a new gleam in her eye, but whether it is gaiety or glass, only the optician can say."

The cause of all this stems directly from one quite remarkable young man, the President of the United States. If it is still too early, as many contend it is, to choose a proper permanent memorial to Franklin D. Roosevelt, it would be the brash height of prematurity to even guess at the size or success of John F. Kennedy's rendezvous with history. But it would be only a slight exaggeration to report that he has set this town and a number of other capitals on their collective ear. According to the Gallup Poll, the President is more popular with the American people than Gen. Eisenhower was after a similar interval in office. The press he is getting abroad is probably more favorable than that tendered any chief executive since FDR. And even the hostile chorus of the Communists is not screaming at him too stridently.

Why? The Communists obviously are biding their time. They don't know their man and they are still taking soundings. The rest of the world, at home and abroad, doesn't really know him either but his almost physical infusion of energy into the mental processes of government seems to have infected almost everybody. By comparison the gently somnolent Eisenhower Administration appears to have had all the vigor of rigor mortis. "Young Mr. Kennedy," observed a cautious conservative older citizen in Milwaukee the other day, "has got us all hopping."

THE INFERENCE is that expectations are up. It is the rising enthusiasm of a public sensing the emergence of a new star player and wanting to identify with him. Even Republicans are getting into the act. One of the most progressive of them, Sen. Javits of New York, reminded the White House that it would need the support of GOP liberals to pass such items as a higher minimum wage, medical aid for the aged, school and housing legislation. This is true but it also was another way of saying that the current Republican leadership in Congress had nothing to offer its liberal wing.

What the President has brought to Washington besides a lot of purposeful energy and a number of people with ideas is style. The White House echoes not only to the patter of little feet but to lively talk over zestful dinners under candlelight. Presidential boxes at the symphony and the theater, we are told, may be more often filled than not. Culture is no longer just an idiot's delight. There is hardly a reporter in town the President doesn't know personally and as for the exceptions he probably knows their publishers. At the annual round of journalistic banquets, from the Gridiron dinner to the Radio-TV correspondents spread, he has beguiled the whole boodle of newsmen and their bosses, with wit, humor and timely serious remarks. If he has alienated anybody at these not unimportant affairs it must have been the comedians whose jokes he topped.

But energy and style must produce substance or they don't count. The Administration has been able to patch together uneasy combinations to win narrow victories in the House and Senate on the feed-grain bill, enlargement of the Rules Committee and unemployment compensation but not without vigorous White House intervention, and the big tests are still to come.

The President cannot possibly tend to all these matters himself though his range of knowledge on them is slightly staggering. And it seems he may have complicated his political life by promising more jobs to supporters than there are vacancies. Some participants feel there is less trim organization and clear liaison within the White House staff yet than may be necessary to bring the Administration's full and most effective weight to bear on foreign policy problems. Difficulties undoubtedly lie ahead. But in these first two months, Pres. Kennedy has developed a rooting section far greater than the one which nudged him to victory in November.

Washington Reports:

Training in New Skills Urged To Help Victims of Automation

TRAINING IN NEW SKILLS and education for engineering, the sciences and the professions is an essential means of helping reduce unemployment, according to Sen. Clifford Case (R-N. J.), a member of the Senate Labor Committee, and Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.), chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Unemployment of the 86th Congress.

Interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public services educational program heard on 460 radio stations, Case said that community junior colleges could help retrain workers whose jobs were "done away with by automation or migration of industry."

"Again and again," he said, "testimony [in subcommittee hearings] shows the importance of being able to get retraining for people who have a long working life left, but whose jobs—the ones for which they were originally trained—just aren't there any more."

McCarthy said on the same program that those who lost their jobs were previously able to get others, "perhaps farther down the ladder, but a job anyway."

"The difficulty today," he added, "is that automation is taking away the jobs at the bottom of the ladder, and if a man is to be re-employed, he has to be retrained. He has to develop a greater skill in the hope that he can take over a higher technical job."

McCARTHY SAID THAT until this adjustment is made, "sound, national standards for unemployment compensation are necessary to relieve the suffering of individuals who are displaced and their families and also restore lost purchasing power."

Both McCarthy and Case spoke of the necessity also of stimulating the economy through increasing and extending the minimum wage. McCarthy added the need of housing, depressed areas aid, school building and other projects.

He said the education bill can also help in meeting "the need at the top," a need that is growing just as "it is decreasing at the bottom." Federal aid to education, he asserted, can "give opportunities to highly intelligent young people whose parents cannot send them to college, or who themselves cannot finance it. They need loans or grants" to become engineers, doctors, and men of letters who are needed.

Educational aid on the secondary level as well as the college is needed, McCarthy declared.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ON THE EVE OF the House showdown votes on the minimum wage bill, Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N. J.) made the cogent observation that "our southern friends must sometimes be amazed" at the support they get from northern Republican conservatives.

In his weekly news letter to constituents, Thompson pointed out that the southern states are seeking to industrialize themselves partly by luring "runaway" plants from northern areas. They do it "with all sorts of tax breaks" and "no organized labor" and with "low wage rates."

"We can't blame other areas for seeking our industry but we can look with wonder upon our own representatives who do everything but provide the moving vans to help the migration," he noted.

In Thompson's viewpoint, Republicans who work against minimum wage improvements "are being hoodwinked by conservative business interests." He charges that in the famed coalition of conservative northern Republicans and conservative southern Democrats, the "hoodwinked" members include both northern GOP members "who oppose minimum wage legislation and increase the temptation to industry to move away from their districts" and southerners who "fancy they are somehow casting a vote against civil rights" bills.

The civil rights bills tend to go through the House, and the Senate is the battleground where passage or defeat is finally determined.

CHIEF JUSTICE EARL WARREN was 70 years old on Mar. 19 and for more than seven years he has presided over the Supreme Court with dignity, distinction and demonstrated devotion to the freedoms of speech and belief that are guaranteed to us all under the Constitution.

When former Pres. Eisenhower's then Attorney General, Herbert Brownell, made a dramatic overnight trip to California in September 1953 to proffer the Chief Justiceship to Gov. Warren, a notably liberal Republican, it may be that the Administration did not realize what it was getting. Three of Mr. Eisenhower's four other appointees to the Supreme Court fell in a very different mold.

The then-expressed hope that Warren would "unify" the court because of his political experience was somewhat naive and it has not come to pass. On such civil liberties issues as pre-censorship of movies and the power of congressional committees to interrogate witnesses on beliefs and associations, the court is divided five to four, and Warren is in the minority.

On one major issue, however, the Chief Justice spoke twice for a unanimous court—the decisions ruling that segregated public schools could no longer be justified under the "separate but equal" doctrine, and laying down the rules under which federal district judges would determine the good faith shown by local officials in moving into conformity.

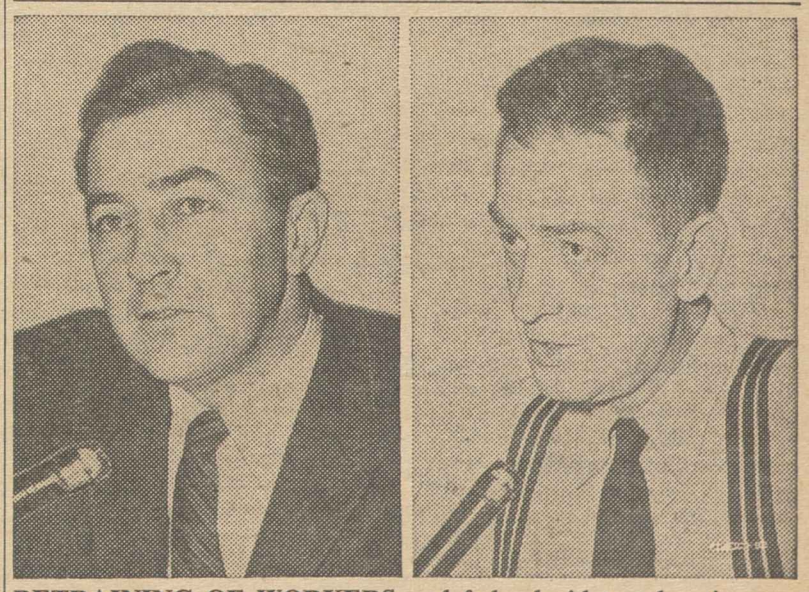
IN A SENATE TEST of the relative strength of the Administration and the coalition conservatives, Chairman Harry F. Byrd (D-Va.) of the powerful Finance Committee lost by a two-vote margin on a rollcall despite the fact that in the committee, which is usually highly influential, the vote on Byrd's side was an overwhelming 9 to 2.

Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) briefly observed: "There is no greater force than reason, logic and truth, backed up by the President of the United States."

The Virginia senator, who is not accustomed to losing battles, promptly canceled scheduled Finance Committee hearings on some Kennedy nominations to policy-making posts in the Treasury and Health, Education & Welfare Depts.

When the canceled hearings were put on the schedule again, Byrd and fellow conservatives on the committee began a hard cross-examination of Sidney S. Surrey, chosen by the President to be assistant secretary of the Treasury for tax policy. One reason, of course, is that Surrey's published ideas on tax policy are poles apart from those of Byrd and the conservatives with which the committee has been carefully loaded across the years.



RETRAINING OF WORKERS and federal aid to education are major means for reducing unemployment, Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.), left, asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Clifford Case (R-N. J.) said community junior colleges can help retrain workers displaced by automation and factory migration.

How to Buy:

Manufacturers, Dealers Shade Prices on 1 Million New Cars

By Sidney Margolius

THE SEVERE WINTER discouraged car buying. Result: 1 million 1961 models are looking for buyers. That's the present inventory. In general, prices have been shaded as the result of manufacturer cuts and slightly larger dealer discounts. The Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Labor Dept. says 1961 new car prices are running about 3 percent below last year's. Most notably, list prices of several compact models were reduced.

This is not a bad year to buy a car. The compacts introduced last year proved popular and some of the early bugs have been eliminated.

Their popularity has cut into the used-car market. Prices of used cars are about 13 percent below a year ago, even though they edged up a little recently.

Actually, the auto factories could charge much less for new cars. Experts say that the factories price cars so that they will make a profit even if they operate at just a little over half capacity. Then if they do sell a larger volume, their profits spiral at an accelerated rate.

This formula results in high prices, and ultimately is self-defeating and damaging to the national economy. If the manufacturers set their prices lower on a higher-capacity formula, they would get their higher volume, more people could go back to work and some of the risky old cars would be scrapped.

Certainly there is a big market for cars if prices were lower. Last year's scrappage rate was the lowest in seven years. Average car on the road now is seven years old. Runzheimer & Co., automotive accountants, suggests that heavily-used cars might well be traded in after three years. At that point, Runzheimer estimates, the cost of repairs begins to catch up with the depreciation (annual loss in market value).

Of course, a thrifty family that takes care of its car can get much more than three years out of it; in fact, generally has to. But there's no doubt a lot of cars on the road today would be junked if their drivers could afford newer ones.

THE PUBLIC DEMAND for economy has caused a notable shift in cars, especially a return to six cylinder engines. For the first time in years, fewer than half the new cars sold recently have been eight-cylinder models. In comparison, in 1957 four out of five cars were bought with eight-cylinder engines. Similarly, compact-car buyers are sticking to standard instead of automatic transmissions.

The compacts also have cut into sales of small foreign cars. These now are more subject to price-cutting, and also are not bringing as much in the resale market as formerly. In connection with foreign cars, an increasing number of complaints is being made about parts and service. The Federal Trade Commission has just issued an order prohibiting one distributor from claiming that parts and services are immediately available in any area when they are not so available. FTC alleged that sometimes parts could not be obtained "for substantial periods of time."

In shopping for a new car, you have to be careful about the prices quoted you. Some dealers may offer a low price or a high trade-in allowance, but charge an exaggerated amount for finance fees or insurance. In California, as in other states, an Assembly investigating committee found excessive insurance charges one of the major abuses in car selling. Others included signing blank contracts, failure to deliver a copy of the contract at time of sale, and balloon payments (a final payment so large the buyer sometimes can't meet it).

Only way to combat finance and insurance overcharges is to get an itemized written list of these charges as well as of the car itself, and compare these charges with those of other dealers and independent insurance companies. There is no legal requirement that you buy your insurance through the car dealer.

Dealers nowadays universally give discounts off these list prices. In shopping, note that wholesale prices of compacts are generally about 18-21 percent below list, while for the standard-size cars they are 24-26 percent.

From Soup to Nonsense:

A Guide for Parents Who Fear Their Children May Be Normal

By Jane Goodsell

PARENTS OF A NEW BABY almost always buttonhole the doctor to ask the same anxious question: "Does it have all its fingers and toes?"

As the child grows older, its parents are assailed by new worries. One of these is the growing conviction that the child is hard of hearing. This alarm is brought on by incidents such as this:

Mother (speaking in a normal, conversational tone and standing about two feet away) tells the child to get washed for dinner. When the child appears at the table, obviously unwashed, mother asks why he didn't do as he was told. Child, with genuine sincerity, replies that he didn't hear her.

Therefore the child must be hard of hearing, isn't he? The answer is no.

To save parents the expense of consulting an ear specialist, a simple experiment may be conducted in one's own home:

Parents, sitting side by side on the davenport and speaking in sneaky whispers, discuss the possibility of taking the children to a ball game that evening.

Normal children, whether they are in the next room having a fight or three houses down the street, will appear promptly to announce that they're all ready to go and it's going to be a double-header.

This same ball game may be utilized to calm parents' fears that their child is the victim of a dread disease because he refuses to eat.

Let us assume that the child has been presented by his mother with three wholesome, attractive meals a day; and that he has pushed all of them aside with the plaintive announcement that he isn't hungry. Is the child sick?

The answer is yes if he can sit through the first inning without demanding at least one each of the following: Ice cream stick, peanuts, candy bars, popcorn and hot dogs with lots of mustard.

The average child is also apt to provide his parents with plenty of cause for worry about his vision. For instance, the child is sent upstairs to pick up the clothes lying on the floor of his room.

When his mother goes to check on his accomplishments, she finds a sock, two handkerchiefs, a pajama top and a banana peel still on the floor.

The child, presented with the evidence, replies that he didn't see it. Is the child's vision faulty?

THE FOLLOWING TEST may prove helpful in determining the answer: A child of two should spot a half-eaten candy bar lying in the gutter at 20 paces. A child of six should not pass within 20 blocks of a merry-go-round without seeing it.

No child of any age should be expected to see the dirt under his fingernails.

50th Anniversary Noted:

Safety Laws Legacy Of Triangle Co. Fire

The following article on the 50th anniversary of the Triangle fire was written for Press Associates Inc. by Esther Peterson, assistant to Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg and director of the department's Women's Bureau.

By Esther Peterson

ON MAR. 25 WE OBSERVE the 50th anniversary of an event still remembered by survivors with horror and dread—the Triangle Shirtwaist Co. fire in New York's garment center which caused the deaths of 146 young women, boys and men.

It was Mar. 25, 1911, a Saturday afternoon, when fire erupted on the eighth floor of the Asch building at Washington Place and Greene Street in New York City.

The shops on the seven other floors were all unionized and had closed at noon that Saturday, but Triangle was non-union and had previously had considerable labor trouble as its owners fought to prevent unionization.

There were 1,000 workers on the eighth, ninth and 10th floors of the building—all occupied by Triangle. The fire began under the cutting tables among the hundreds of pounds of sheer cotton fabric used in manufacturing the waists.

As men ran for water pails, the fire quickly outstripped them, running the length of the undertables, looping over the tables, jumping the aisles. Pieces of burning fabric floated about the room igniting everything they touched.

In the quickly spreading hysteria on the three floors, masses of humanity struggled out blocked and narrow openings, down insufficient fire wells and into the overcrowded elevators.

THE FIRE ESCAPE soon collapsed and the elevators shortly stopped running because of burning cables and jammed bodies of fear-crazed employes that had hurtled down the shaft.

The Greene Street exit was soon cut off by the flames. The company had locked the other exit on the Washington Place side and screaming girls clawed and hammered on the door but it remained locked.

Many of the girls chose to leap from the top floors of the burning building rather than be roasted alive. Horrified spectators below watched as dozens of bodies came hurtling from above, many of them aflame.

Firemen attempted to catch some in their safety nets but the great height of the fall caused the bodies to tear right through the nets. The dead and dying lay strewn all about.

The fire equipment could only reach the seventh floor. The ladders were at least two stories short.

It was one of the worst disasters in the history of New York, claiming the lives of 146 who perished either by being roasted alive or by dashing themselves to death on the pavement below.

Yet out of this terrible tragedy of half a century ago have come safety regulations and benefits now enjoyed by workers all over America. Within three months after the Triangle fire the New York Factory Investigating Commission was established and the beginnings of our modern safety regulations were put into force.

The commission later broadened its scope and began investigating all phases of labor in New York State, resulting in tremendous improvements in all manner of working conditions.

So on Mar. 25 we commemorate not only a terrible tragedy, but also the beginning of social and safety legislation which eventually found its way into every state in the union.

This is the heritage we have received from the martyrdom of the 146 persons who lost their lives in the Triangle fire of 1911.

IUD Study Shows:

Europe Leads U.S. In Area Aid Plans

Comprehensive assaults on depressed areas have been carried out by both liberal and conservative governments of seven highly industrialized European nations, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has reported.

The IUD study was based on programs—some of which date back to the '30s—currently in effect in the United Kingdom, Sweden, Italy, Belgium, France, The Netherlands and Denmark.

"Programs have been adopted as readily by governments of the right as of the left," the report declared.

"Countries dedicated to planning, such as Sweden, could be expected to adopt such programs and many have. Americans are less likely to know that the United Kingdom has had official programs since 1934, and their scope has been extended since 1945 by both Labor and Conservative governments . . . Italy and Belgium are other cases where a commitment to private enterprise has not inhibited the development of distressed area programs."

The IUD emphasized that no nation has abandoned its area redevelopment programs but instead all have strengthened them during the postwar area.

Depressed areas programs, the report declared, are not considered alternatives to vigorous national programs designed to secure high levels of employment but are an "integral part" of such national policy.

In addition, the study found, aid programs in the European nations are designed to go into effect when joblessness is less critical than the unemployment which currently prevails in depressed areas of the U.S. "They do not wait until unemployment in these areas reaches distress proportions," it declared.

The programs in Europe "seek primarily to stimulate new investment and a broader economic base" in the areas of long-term economic decline, the IUD said. Measures most frequently found include:

- Loans and grants to new industry or for plant expansion.
- Loans and grants to local governments to provide factory space and needed social improvements.
- Financing of worker retraining programs.
- Technical aid programs.
- Tax concessions to stimulate new investment in depressed areas.
- Direct government action to provide land, factory space and community facilities.

Many nations also include programs to cover moving expenses for workers taking employment elsewhere; the use of "license, persuasion or other means" to influence plant location; and the providing of employment through government initiative.

Salt Water Conversion Research Plan Backed

Warning that the United States has less than 20 years to go before its water supply will be inadequate to meet demand, the AFL-CIO has asked Congress to expand the government's salt water conversion program.

The AFL-CIO, in testimony before the House Interior Committee, called for doubling the present $2.5 million a year spent by the Interior Dept. to provide economically-feasible methods of converting saline and brackish water for industrial and houshold use.

Legislative Rep. John T. Curran said new sources of water are "indispensable to the nation's continued growth." Unless conversion of ocean water and water from salt-infiltrated streams can be accomplished at a reasonable cost, "local and regional water shortages which already spot various sections of the nation will seriously affect the national welfare," he added.

A salt water conversion program was first proposed by former Pres. Truman in 1949. A limited research program was launched in 1952, dropped for lack of funds, and revived in 1956. The Kennedy Administration turned to the trade union movement to pick Charles F. MacGowan, atomic energy expert from the Boiler Makers, as head of the Office of Saline Water.

In urging speedy approval of an expanded research and development program, Curran said the legislation should include a provision "protecting public access to patents" developed under the stimulus of government research on the program. He also strongly supported authorization for the federal government to build full-scale demonstration plants utilizing new techniques of salt-water conversion.

"Action taken now will bring great dividends to every American in the years ahead," the AFL-CIO spokesman emphasized.

Drive by Union Members Buys Ambulance for City

Huron, S. D.—This city of 14,000 now has ambulance service because "despite the cold of winter, union members knocked on every door in Huron, and approached every businessman and organized group in the city" to collect nearly $6,500—"enough to buy the ambulance, all the equipment needed, and have a little left to put away for future needs."

The description is from an editorial in The Daily Plainsman, the city's newspaper, praising the AFL-CIO Central Labor Union and declaring:

"Every citizen of Huron owes a vote of thanks to organized labor for its thousands of hours of work on this invaluable public service. It stepped into the breach and, with the effectiveness only available in dedicated people working in organized effort, did the job."

2 'Briefing' Panelists Tangle on School Aid

In its attitude toward federal aid to education, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce reflects the position of Pres. James Buchanan when he vetoed the land-grant college act in 1859; and although Abraham Lincoln later signed the same bill, the chamber "has simply not moved ahead during these 100 years."

That's how Rep. John Brademas (D-Ind.) put it in the latest edition of "Briefing Session," public affairs television series offered jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

On the other hand, the basic position of John R. Miles, the U.S. Chamber's education director and co-panelist with Brademas, was that federal agencies are playing a "numbers game" that exaggerates the school need; state and local governments have tripled their educational outlays in the Fifties, can easily double them in the Sixties to meet the increase in population.

The Brademas-Miles clash produced the freest-swinging debate in the series thus far, with neither man needing the regular reminder by Edward P. Morgan, the program's moderator, that interrupting is permissible.

Miles charged that the briefing section of the program, preceding the panel discussion, included "half-truths" and had "prejudged" the issue—though the material given by John MacVane, the briefing officer, was based entirely on official figures.

Brademas defended the statistics and noted that "both the Democratic and Republican platforms, the Rockefeller Brothers report and the U.S. Office of Education" recognized a serious classroom shortage.

The Republicans didn't mean it, Miles countered.

Survey Cited

"I have a survey here showing that 63 percent of the delegates, when polled, voted 96 percent against any federal aid of any type," he said.

"Are you suggesting the Republicans have an undemocratic convention?" Brademas quipped.

Morgan, permanent host and moderator for the series, took a turn at interrupting to ask how it was that 600,000 students were forced into part-time sessions. Miles said the major reason was lag-time between the planning and the completed construction of schools.

Brademas charged that the U.S. chamber fights school aid at the federal level on the thesis that states and communities should do the job; but then local chambers fight school spending at the lower levels as well. Miles retorted that a survey of 700 communities showed chamber support for 1,200 out of 1,600 proposals for school improvements.

A feature of the opening minutes was an interview by Joel O'Brien, producer of the series, with a man who left teaching after seven years to take a job in an industrial firm's advertising department. He had been making $5,200 a year as a teacher; he started at $7,500 in the new post and now, less than three years later, earns $10,000.

Minimum Pay To Be Aired On 'Briefing'

An issue in which the labor movement has taken a leading role for years—the federal minimum wage—will be debated by two distinguished economists on the seventh "Briefing Session" television production.

Mary Dublin Keyserling, who is a professional associate as well as the wife of Leon Keyserling, will uphold the case for a stronger and more extensive law. Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, for more than 35 years a leading spokesman for the conservative view, will take the other side.

Rukeyser began his career as a newspaper reporter, and when only 23 became financial editor of the New York Herald Tribune. He has specialized in economic affairs ever since, and through syndicated columns, seven books and some 25 years of lecturing, became a widely-known popularizer of economic issues.

Mrs. Keyserling, once a college economics teacher, served as executive director of the National Consumers League during its campaign for the first Fair Labor Standards Act. She frequently represents the league and the National Federation of Settlements and Neighborhood Houses before congressional committees considering wage-hour improvements.

During the war she held important posts with the Office of Civilian Defense and the Foreign Economics Administration, and was chief of the international economic analysis division of the Dept. of Commerce until 1953.

1 in 6 Housing Units Poor, Report Shows

One of every six housing units in America is dilapidated or lacks some or all plumbing facilities despite an advance in the overall quality of housing during the 1950s, the 1960 Census of Housing has revealed.

Almost 47 million—or 80 percent—of the total inventory of 58.3 million units were in sound condition, according to preliminary census results released by the U.S. Bureau of the Census.

A total of 3 million units was classified as dilapidated and 8.4 million units were described as deteriorating because of deficiencies requiring repairs.

The report said the number of occupied units with all plumbing facilities, excluding dilapidated structures, increased from 27.7 million to 44.2 million units in 10 years. Such housing in 1960 made up 83 percent of all units as compared to 64 percent in 1950, the report noted.

Housing which lacked private bath, toilet or hot water or was dilapidated was distributed unevenly throughout the nation, the report pointed out.

The South accounted for about 30 percent of the nation's 1960 occupied units but had about half of the housing which was dilapidated or lacked plumbing facilities. The Northeast had 15 percent; the North Central region, 27 percent and the West, 8 percent of such housing.

The report added, however, that all regions reported a significantly smaller number of units in this category than they had 10 years ago.

The greatest improvement in housing quality, the report said, was in owner-occupied homes. Close to 90 percent of such homes, compared to 70 percent in 1950, were classified as non-dilapidated and containing all plumbing facilities. The total of 29 million such units in 1960 represented a rise of 78 percent over the 1950 figure.

Sunday School Week Backed By Meany

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has endorsed observation of National Sunday School Week Apr. 10-16 and termed the Sunday school movement a "means of giving our young people a way of life based on the natural law."

In a statement to Pat Boone, national chairman of the 17th annual National Sunday School Week, Meany declared:

"Our Sunday schools are a guide to faith, but they are more than that. They are the means of giving our young people a way of life, one that is based on the natural law. They teach our boys and girls that religion must not be confined to the church on Sunday, but must govern our every waking moment in every day of the week in every activity.

"Children who learn the rules of their faith in Sunday schools will be better persons in labor, business, industry, and the professions. They will make this country and this world more like God intended it should be."

The theme of this year's observance is, "Sunday School—Guide to Faith." National Sunday School Week is sponsored by the Laymen's National Committee, Inc., an interfaith organization.

Illinois Advisers Urge $6-$9 Jump in Idle Pay

Springfield, Ill.—A tripartite advisory board has unanimously recommended increases ranging from $6 to $9 weekly in the state's present maximum unemployment compensation benefits. If enacted, they would constitute the largest single increase in benefits since establishment of the jobless insurance program in Illinois.

Gov. Otto Kerner (D), hailing the decision of the nine-member labor-management-public committee, called on the Illinois General Assembly to "immediately enact" the program of higher benefits so they could become effective July 2.

Kerner said the increases—which would raise benefits for a single worker to $38 and provide a maximum of $59 weekly for a worker with four dependent children—would represent "a major contribution to the fight against recession in the state." The governor added that the new benefit levels would result in $24.6 million in added payments to Illinois jobless during the next two years.

The chief executive congratulated the three employer and three union members of the board for "compromising their differences," adding that the three public members played a "vital role" in bringing about agreement on a program to provide aid to an estimated 410,800 workers.

Agreement on a program for liberalization of benefits came only after the committee, deadlocked for several weeks, received demands from Kerner for a "substantial" proposal to replace a benefit structure which he called "woefully low."

Deadlock Broken

The committee had stalemated earlier when employer members refused to endorse anything more than a $2 weekly raise in benefits, effective Oct. 1, and union members insisted on a maximum rate equal to two-thirds of the state's average wage but not more than 50 percent of a worker's regular wage.

In urging the board to reach agreement, Kerner pointed out that Illinois currently has 325,000 unemployed. "If they can't live on unemployment benefits," he said, "the burden of supporting them is shifted to the Public Aid Commission." He added:

"We cannot afford the loss of self-esteem which comes to a worker who has to ask for relief. I feel we should move aggresively toward a substantial increase in the maximum. . . . In 35 states, including all but two of the industrial states, the maximum benefit is higher than the $32 which is the top possible benefit for the majority of Illinois' unemployed workers."

The tripartite board's unanimous recommendation would raise the benefit level for single workers from $32 to $38; a married worker whose spouse is not employed, from $37 to $43; a worker with one dependent child, from $40 to $47; two dependent children, from $44 to $51; three dependent children, $47 to $55; four or more dependent children, $50 to $59.

In calling for bipartisan support of the proposals by the legislature, Kerner said "it is obvious that our state government will be derelict in its duty if it does not take immediate steps to alleviate the plight of the unemployed and to concentrate all its resources upon the task of stemming the recession tide."

Kennedy Backed On Care for Aged

Milwaukee — The director of 18 Catholic hospitals in the Milwaukee archdiocese has come out in favor of Pres. John F. Kennedy's proposal to finance health care for the aged through social security.

Msgr. Edmund J. Goebel broke sharply with the American Medical Association, which favors private insurance to meet the need.

A medical care program such as the one the Administration has recommended, Msgr. Goebel said, would benefit both the elderly and the hospitals since it would pay the bills of some patients who otherwise might become hospital charity cases.

Abuses of Bracero Program Hit:

Labor Dept. Asks Protection For Farm Workers in U.S.

The Kennedy Administration has served notice on Congress that it will oppose continuation of the Mexican Contract Labor Program unless substantial changes are made to protect the wages and job opportunities of the nation's two million domestic farm workers.

Assistant Labor Sec. Jerry R. Holleman told a House Agriculture subcommittee that the large-scale importation of farm workers has undermined conditions of U.S. farm workers, resulting in "substandard earnings and underemployment."

In earlier testimony, the AFL-CIO had denounced the present program as "imported colonialism" and called for a complete overhaul, coupled with plans for its "final termination."

Holleman said the Administration would support a two-year extension if "needed improvements" were written into the law. At the end of that period, he said, Congress and the Administration should re-examine the program and "its impact on agricultural workers and producers."

First Hand Report

Holleman, former president of the Texas State AFL-CIO and a long-time member of a Labor Dept. advisory committee on farm labor, told the subcommittee that he has seen "at first hand" the "depressing effect" of imported labor on farm wages.

The Labor Dept. spokesman called for these specific reforms to increase wages of U.S. farm workers and protect them from competition from "bracero" labor:

- Provide authority for the Secretary of Labor to limit the number of foreign workers who may be employed by any employer "to the extent necessary to assure active competition among farmers for the services of U.S. farm workers."

At the present time, the Labor Dept. indicated, some farmers make only "token effort" to obtain domestic workers.

- Require under law that employers first offer U.S. workers terms and conditions of work comparable to those guaranteed to Mexican workers.

Local workers, Holleman said, should receive cash allowances equivalent in value to the housing and transportation furnished Mexican workers.

- Compel the employer of Mexican labor to give comparable wages and fringe benefits to domestic workers already in his employ, as well as those he hires after having contracted for Mexican workers.

Holleman cited examples "of American workers receiving 40 cents per hour for chopping cotton on the same farm where Mexicans receive the contract minimum of 50 cents."

- Prohibit use of Mexican nationals on work involving machinery or in other than temporary or seasonal employment.

No Real Shortage

Any claims by growers of a shortage of U.S. workers for skilled or year-round work, Holleman said, "reflect problems of wage levels and employe relations rather than true shortages of labor."

- Require employers who use Mexican nationals to offer American workers at least as much as the average hourly rate for farm labor in the state.

The Labor Dept.'s proposals provide for a gradual step-up of wages in localities where rates are considerably below statewide averages. In Texas, Holleman noted, both United States and foreign workers are frequently paid 50 cents an hour in areas where braceros are used, while the state hourly average for farm workers is 78 cents.

Declaring that "underemployment of rural people is estimated as the equivalent of 1.4 million fully unemployed workers," Holleman said the Kennedy Administration considers the problem "acute." He said weaknesses in the present law have stymied efforts by the Labor Dept. to prevent the contract labor program from undermining conditions of U.S. workers.

The Mexican import program, he pointed out, was originally enacted as a temporary measure during the Korean emergency and operates "for the benefit of less than 50,000 of the nation's four million farms."

The program, Holleman said, "should not be permitted to operate to the disadvantage of farmers producing the same crops with family labor."

AFL-CIO for Step-Up In Fight on Pollution

Labor has asked Congress to approve a stepped-up program to help states and communities protect rivers and waterways against pollution by sewage and chemical wastes.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. John T. Curran urged the House Public Works Committee to approve a bill by Rep. John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.) which would authorize $125 million a year for 10 years in federal grants to meet up to 30 percent of the cost of constructing sewage disposal plants. The present level of federal aid, under a 1956 law, is less than $50 million a year.

The Blatnik bill, co-sponsored by a number of other congressmen, calls for $35 million a year more than the measure which was vetoed last year by then-Pres. Eisenhower. Eisenhower in 1958 asked actual repeal of the smaller program he had originally approved.

Curran told the committee that "the President's natural resources message submitted to Congress on Feb. 23 makes it quite plain that the shadow of an executive veto no longer hangs over the vitally needed" anti-pollution program.

The AFL-CIO spokesman, strongly supporting provisions in the bill for expanded research programs, warned that "many new and exotic industrial wastes, inorganic in nature, are rapidly becoming the knottiest aspect of the water pollution problem in America."

He also endorsed the upgrading of the water polution program, under the Blatnik bill, to the status of an administrative agency directly under the Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare. At present the program is part of the functions of the Surgeon-General's office.

Under the Blatnik bill, any navigable stream would be subject to federal anti-pollution regulations. This provision, strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, was attacked by a spokesman for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce who told the committee stream pollution is "a matter for states and communities immediately involved."

The business group opposed direct federal aid for construction of sewage treatment plants, declaring that the federal role should be limited to research and technical aid.

The AFL-CIO testimony challenged "the often expressed fear" that federal aid programs would result in "encroachment" by the national government, and pointed out:

"State officials in the field of water pollution are overwhelmingly of the opinion that the grants-in-aid program has been of great assistance and feel that it should be expanded."

Labor Asks Bill to Aid Retraining of Jobless

The AFL-CIO has urged approval of legislation to provide $30 million a year in federal aid to retrain workers thrown out of work because of technological changes and shifts in the economy.

Stanley M. Ruttenberg, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, said a bill sponsored by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.) to help finance state retraining programs is needed "to meet the special problems of older workers whose skills and talents have become obsolescent in our fast-changing economy."

High Unemployment Seen

Ruttenberg told a Senate Labor subcommittee that high unemployment "will almost certainly continue through the remainder of 1961."

Existing training programs, he pointed out, "are geared to the normal requirements of young people" seeking trade or vocational training. The Clark bill would give priority in retraining to workers over the age of 30, those who are heads of families and who have had at least five years of work experience.

He suggested that the system of state grants be modified to meet the problem of labor markets which extend into two or more states. The Clark bill would provide grants to states on a matching basis in proportion to their rate of unemployment.

Similar Aid in Area Bill

A similar program of retraining assistance is provided for depressed areas in the bill which has already passed the Senate, Ruttenberg pointed out. The Clark bill, he said, would make such retraining possible for unemployed workers generally.

"We think this is a sound approach," the AFL-CIO spokesman declared. "Many unemployed workers have skills that have become obsolete and because of advancing technology they will not be rehired in the plants from which they have been laid off."

Convention Acts:

SIU Asks Expansion Of Merchant Marine

San Juan, P. R.—The Seafarers convention here has called for legislation and inter-union and union-management cooperation aimed at expansion of the American-flag merchant marine, revival of coastal shipping trade and protection of the principle of freedom of the seas.

The convention of the 75,000-member union, which includes workers in the fishing industry as well as deep sea, riverway and Great Lakes seamen, heard a sharp indictment of the "flabby management" of American-flag shipping.

SIU Pres. Paul Hall told the 200 delegates that labor must "take the lead in providing a fresh approach to the problems of the industry" and work with management in developing programs which would enable U.S. shipping to cope "with the realities of world trade."

He urged, and the convention endorsed, government construction subsidies to build modern ships for the growing bulk ore and oil import trade.

The convention approved a program of continued active organizing by the SIU in all areas and voted also continued support for "the organizing and protest activities of the Intl. Maritime Workers Union" which the SIU and the Maritime Union set up in 1959 in a joint drive to organize "runaway" American-owned ships flying foreign "flags of convenience."

In other convention highlights, the delegates:

● Urged SIU affiliates to step up training programs for their members to help them become licensed officers. The union viewed with concern recent tendencies "for a larger and larger proportion of licensed officers to come out of government academies, without experience in the foc'sle or understanding of seamen and the reasons for the existence of seamen's unions."

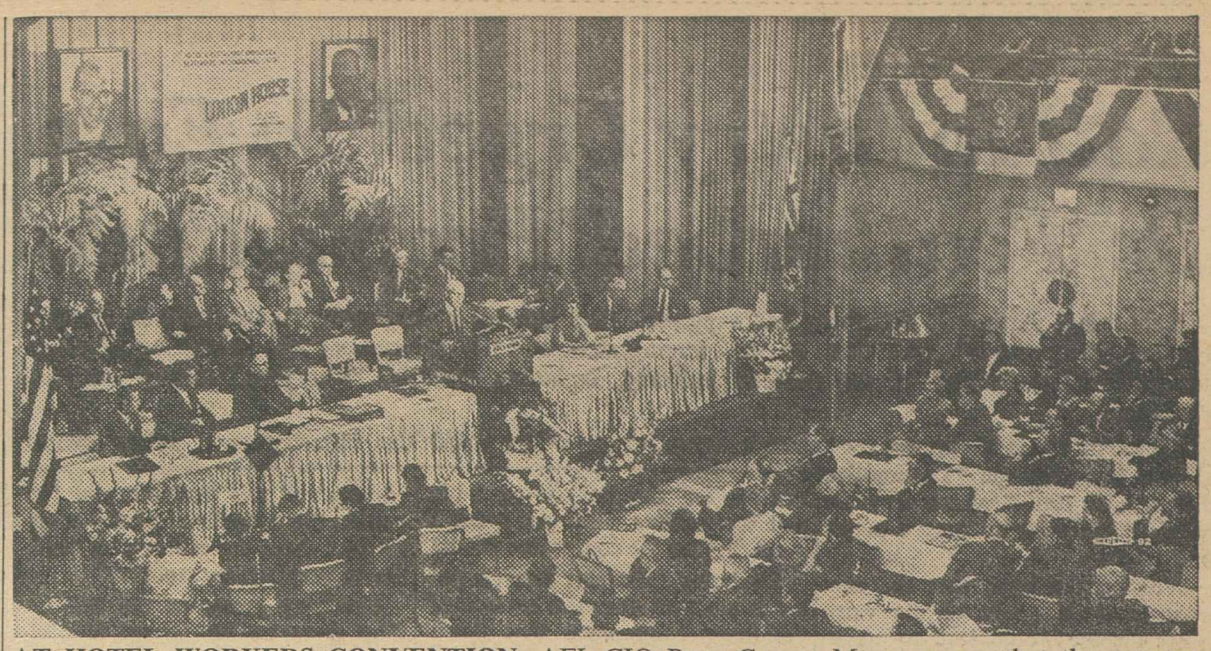
● Strongly endorsed the AFL-CIO program of social legislation, including medical care for the aged under social security and federal aid for housing and education.

● Called for federal fair employment practices legislation and charged that "anti-union employers in the shipping industry, as well as in other industries, are utilizing discriminatory hiring practices as a deliberate technique to defeat union organizing."

● Heard Alaska's Sen. E. L. Bartlett (D) warn that the domestic fishing industry faces a threat from the entrance of Soviet fishing fleets, not bound by conservation practices, into traditionally-American fishing grounds.

The convention re-elected Hall to another two-year term as president. Morris Weisberger was named executive vice president for the SIU's Pacific district, Cal Tanner for the Atlantic, Gulf and Great Lakes district, and Hal Banks for Canada.

The SIU—the first international union to hold a convention in Puerto Rico—adopted a resolution recommending San Juan as a site for union conventions because of the "cordial, pro-labor atmosphere." New Orleans was chosen as the site for the union's 1963 convention.



AT HOTEL WORKERS CONVENTION, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warns that the country cannot meet its international responsibilities unless the economy at home is healthy and growing. Convention approved a major new legislative program for the union.

Hotel Workers Convention Votes Expanded Legislative Operation

Philadelphia—The 35th convention of the Hotel Workers has launched a major drive to broaden its legislative and political operations by approving an annual legislative conference in Washington and deciding to set up full-time legislative representation in the nation's capital.

In addition, the more than 800 delegates representing the 70-year-old union's 440,000 members approved a strong civil rights resolution giving direction to its already-functioning civil rights committee.

These decisions were highlights of a convention in which the delegates also:

● Re-elected Pres. Ed. S. Miller, Sec.-Treas. Jack Weinberger and other international officers without opposition.

● Voted to hold conventions every five years instead of the previously-existing four-year plan.

● Approved technical amendments to the union's constitution to bring it into conformity with Landrum-Griffin Act requirements.

The convention acted on the legislative program after hearing Mrs. Esther Peterson, head of the Labor Dept.'s Women's Bureau and assistant to Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, warn the delegates that in order to secure minimum wage coverage for hotel workers "you will have to form a really effective lobby in your own behalf; no one else will do it for you."

Proposals for minimum wage coverage of hotel and restaurant workers were knocked out of the minimum wage bill last year, Mrs. Peterson reminded the delegates, and this year they "weren't even included in the final draft" of Administration proposals.

The reason is that the restaurant and hotel owners' lobby, "one of the most powerful in the nation's capital," she said, worked effectively in Congress against including such workers under the law's coverage.

"One day you had one lobbyist for your interests while the hotel and restaurant owners had 350 representatives lobbying for their interests," she declared.

The convention voted that the annual legislative conference, unprecedented in the union's history, would be held at the beginning of the session of Congress each year.

The full-time legislative representative provided for by the convention will have the duty of coordinating the union's legislative program and rallying support from city joint boards and state councils, the latter of which have specific legislative and political responsibilities.

His function will also include cooperation with the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Strikers Turn Spotlight On Union-Busting Firm

Hartford—After six chilly months on the picket line, Auto Workers' Local 379 is ready to "turn the heat" on anti-union practices of the Jacobs Manufacturing Co. with a nationwide publicity campaign.

By telling the Jacobs story to unions and the public, the UAW and the Connecticut State AFL-CIO hope to put the spotlight on such management practices as these:

● Insisting that the union drop contract clauses gained over 25 years of negotiations and give management a free hand in setting job rates and assigning new workers.

● Moving part of the manufacturing operations to a new non-union plant in Clemson, S. C., and reducing the work force by about a fourth without any advance notice to the union.

● Recruiting strikebreakers by advertising in newspapers in depressed areas that permanent jobs were available.

Since the strike started last Sept. 16 in West Hartford, 135 strikebreakers have been hired to keep up production of chuck parts and Diesel braking equipment. None of the local's 211 members has crossed the picket line, according to Local 379 Pres. Joseph Marci.

A union charge of refusal to bargain was reinstated by National Labor Relations Board General Counsel Stuart Rothman after a turndown in the regional office. Rothman directed that a complaint be issued against the company.

Marci gave this summary of the union's relations with the company:

The local was organized and signed its first contract with management in 1935. The union won a 16-week strike over contract terms in 1952, and a 2.5-week strike for a pension in 1955, two years after the plant was bought by the Chicago Pneumatic Tool Co.

The present dispute, Marci said, grew out of an agreement under which management installed a new incentive system. Three weeks after the contract went into effect in 1959, management announced it had built a new plant in South Carolina and was moving part of its chuck-making operations there.

More disputes arose over operation of the incentive system. The union claimed the company was not following the contract in applying the incentive system, and won an arbitrator's ruling to that effect.

When negotiations opened in 1960 on a new contract, management demanded that the union drop the point it won in arbitration, and make 105 other changes in the contract. Among clauses which management wanted to weaken, according to Marti, were those on seniority, grievance procedure, and work assignments. It demanded also the complete right to determine which workers were handicapped, and to lay them off regardless of seniority, the local president said.

The Connecticut AFL-CIO has asked all affiliates in the state to help Local 379 finance its publicity campaign against Jacobs. It is not asking for donations to the strike fund, which will continue to pay for relief of strikers and their families, according to Sec.-Treas. Joseph M. Rourke of the state labor council.

Union-Industries Show To Spotlight 'Progress'

Detroit—"Parade of Progress" will be the theme of the 1961 Union-Industries Show, which will be sponsored by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. Apr. 7-12 in Cobo Hall here.

The show, with more than $22 million worth of all-union displays, will call attention to the nation's progress in the fields of good labor-management relations, effective productivity and the betterment of wage scales and working conditions.

Joseph Lewis, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label Dept. and director of the exhibition, said that the show will once again bring together organized labor and its fair employers in a demonstration of the national progress that results through collective bargaining.

The annual display of goods and services identified by the union label, shop card and union button originated in Cincinnati, O., in 1938 and has been held every year since, with the exception of the World War II period.

Lewis said that the Union-Industries Show constitutes labor's "greatest single effort" each year to "influence the buying habits of its own members and those of the general public." In addition to telling the union label story to the hundreds of thousands of interested visitors, he said, the show offers the opportunity to carry the same message into the homes of many more millions in the trade union movement through the facilities of the labor press.

Lithographers to Appeal NLRB 'Hot Cargo' Rule

New York—The unaffiliated Lithographers have announced plans for a court challenge of a National Labor Relations Board ruling that a clause in the union's current contracts dealing with the handling of non-union work was, in reality, an illegal "hot cargo" provision.

The clause would permit the union to terminate the agreement and reopen negotiations for a new contract in the event an employer requested one of his employes to handle work performed in a non-union shop.

The labor board said the clause was designed as a "subterfuge" to circumvent the Landrum-Griffin Act's ban on "hot cargo" agreements, and added that it would have "precisely the same" effect as an agreement not to handle non-union products.

Lithographers' Pres. Kenneth J. Brown said, "We will require the board to test its decision in the court." Brown said the NLRB had "expressly refused" to rule on the union's contention that the Landrum-Griffin provision against "hot cargo" clauses was unconstitutional.

The NLRB's decision involved contracts of Local 17 in San Francisco and Local 78 in Miami, Fla.

In the San Francisco case, the board also ruled as illegal ALA clauses involving struck work, chain shops, the right to terminate and the right to refuse to handle non-union work. The union said the ruling lacks "real meaning" because the clauses had all been revised.

Under existing ALA practice, Brown said, the union is employing new language in these clauses. The new clauses were contained in the Miami contract and—with the exception of the disputed trade shop clause—were upheld by the labor board.

CWA Wins Vote In Phone Unit

The Communications Workers have won bargaining rights for more than 6,000 upstate plant employes of the New York Telephone Co. The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was CWA 2,526, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers 2,484.

The two unions won places on the runoff election ballot by defeating the unaffiliated Empire State Telephone Workers Organization, former bargaining agent for the upstate plant workers.

CWA previously had won bargaining rights for 18,000 downstate plant employes of the same company, formerly represented by the unaffiliated United Telephone Organization. It will seek one statewide unit covering upstate and downstate employes.

Goldberg's Suggestion:

Rail Industry Urged To Ease Its 'Featherbed' Propaganda

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg has suggested that railroad management "tone down its featherbedding propaganda" and that unions, management and the government join in seeking solutions to the "real problems" of the railroad industry, including 400,000 "lost jobs" during the past five years.

Goldberg made his appeal for "more imaginative steps" to build the industry at a safety award dinner honoring the "Locomotive Fireman of 1960," whose alertness was credited with averting a major rail tragedy.

Voicing the hope that the current tripartite study of the work rules dispute would lead to agreement on steps to improve both "the competitive position of the industry and the security of the men who work in it," Goldberg added:

"I would hope that every industry confronted with a profound problem of change would follow suit—before and not after the problem becomes one of critical magnitude."

Too often in the past, he said, "we have spent our thought in preparation for the bargaining table, and too seldom have we spent it preparing for the conference room."

Declaring "the best foreign policy is a sound domestic economy," Goldberg emphasized that Soviet Russia has not "caught up" with America's steel capacity by equalling U.S. production during the last quarter, but that the U.S. has slipped to the Soviet level by producing at half-capacity.

In a report on his "first 60 days in office," Goldberg told the members and guests of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen that the aim of his personal visits to areas of heavy unemployment has been to "dramatize" the problem and "to remind the conscience of the country that there are millions of families in very serious trouble."

Goldberg presented the BLFE's third annual safety award to Melvin L. Rake, 30-year-old Seattle, Wash., locomotive fireman.

Rake was the fireman—engineer's helper on a diesel locomotive — on the Great Northern Railway's "Empire Builder" streamliner on Dec. 27, 1959. Spotting the first signs of a landslide roaring down in the immediate path of the train, he quickly threw the emergency brake valve. As a result, only the four diesel units of the locomotive were hit by the landslide and pushed over a seawall into Puget Sound; the 200 passengers escaped unscathed.

For his alertness, a committee including Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.); Interstate Commerce Commission Chairman Everett Hutchinson; Louis B. Seltzer, editor of the Cleveland Press; Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, and BLFE Pres. H. E. Gilbert chose Rake from among the union's 12 monthly safety award winners.

Gilbert said Rake's feat typifies "the teamwork so necessary to safe railroading." Rail management has aimed its sharpest "featherbed" darts at locomotive firemen and has sought to abolish the position.

The unions' annual safety award is named after D. B. Robertson, president-emeritus of the BLFE. The winner also receives a $500 check.

FEDERAL ACTION to cope with mounting school crisis was urged by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann (right), at hearings before House Education subcommittee. Schoemann, who endorsed Administration program for grants which states may use for school construction and teachers' salaries, was accompanied by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Labor-Management Unit Meets at White House

free and responsible collective bargaining, industrial peace, sound wage and price policies, higher standards of living, and increased productivity.

In his executive order creating the committee, the President urged prompt consideration of how best to insure that American products are competitive in world markets, and a study of both the benefits and problems resulting from automation.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, designated by Kennedy to serve as chairman of the committee during its first year of operation, told reporters at a briefing following the meeting that the committee agreed it would not function to settle labor-management disputes or as a negotiating group in contract talks but would, instead, recommend policies that the President might adopt to encourage industrial peace.

Regular Meetings Set

The committee will meet again Apr. 3 and after that on the first Monday of each month, Goldberg said.

Among those addressing the committee's off-the-record session were Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson; Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, who will alternate annually with Goldberg in the committee's chairmanship; Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara; Under Sec. of State Chester Bowles.

Labor members present at the first session included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Ladies' Garment Workers Pres. David Dubinsky, Railway Clerks Pres. George M. Harrison, and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Sec. Joseph D. Keenan. Absent were Mine Workers Pres. Thomas Kennedy and Steelworkers Pres. David J. McDonald.

Management members attending included Thomas Watson, president of Intl. Business Machines; Joseph Block, president of Inland Steel Co.; Henry Ford II, board chairman of Ford Motor Co.; J. Spencer Love, board chairman of Burlington Mills, Inc.; John Franklin, president of U.S. Lines; Elliott Bell, publisher of Business Week; and Richard S. Reynolds, president of Reynolds Metals, Inc.

Public members, besides Goldberg and Hodges, who were present included Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta, Ga., Constitution; Dr. George W. Taylor, professor of labor relations at the Wharton School of Business Administration of the University of Pennsylvania; Arthur S. Burns of the National Bureau of Economic Research; and David L. Cole, outstanding labor arbitrator. Absent was Clark Kerr, president of the University of California.

Kennedy's TUC Bill Passed by Congress

the wage and coverage provisions by piecemeal amendment.

The coalition substitute, sponsored by Representatives A. Paul Kitchin (D-N. C.) and William H. Ayres (R-O.), is virtually the same measure which the House approved by a vote of 211 to 203 in the 86th Congress.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in letters to all House members urged them to support the Administration bill "without amendment." He assailed the proposed Kitchin-Ayres substitute as a bill which would provide "only the most meager improvements in the present law."

The wage fight flared amid these other developments on Capitol Hill:

- Kennedy, in a special message, called for a "fresh approach" to foreign aid which would shift emphasis from military to economic assistance for countries of Latin America, Africa, the Middle East and Asia. The President asked for a five-year, $7.3-billion loan program. Last year the AFL-CIO strongly endorsed the long-range commitment approach.
- The House Banking & Currency Committee, ending weeks of consideration, reported out a $394 million program of loans and grants to help chronically depressed areas. The bill differs in one major respect from the Senate-passed area redevelopment measure by requiring annual congressional appropriations instead of long-range commitments. A proposal for annual appropriations was defeated by a 49-45 vote in the Senate before passage of the measure.
- AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter T. Schoemann, chairman of the federation's Committee on Education, urged a House Education subcommittee to give approval to Kennedy's proposals for $2.3 billion in federal grants for public school construction and teachers' salaries. Schoemann said that the present school system is "sadly inadequate" and "is even less equipped to meet the demands of the years ahead."

The controversial religious issue continued to cloud deliberations on school aid, as Arthur S. Flemming, former Health, Education & Welfare secretary in the Eisenhower Administration, endorsed self-liquidated federal loans for private and parochial schools.

- Organized labor urged prompt action on continuance of the federal interstate highway program, with attention centered on road building rather than on bonuses to states to curb erection of billboards. AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. George D. Riley also called on the House Public Works Committee to make certain that families forced to move as a result of highway construction are able to obtain "decent, safe and sanitary homes within their means," plus adequate moving allowances.

8-25-61

Passage of the bill temporarily extending jobless pay benefits, a measure which Kennedy gave top priority on his list of legislative proposals, came in the Senate only after a hairline victory over conservatives on the method of financing added benefits.

Led by Sen. Harry Flood Byrd (D-Va.), conservative chairman of the Banking Committee, the coalition sought to place the entire cost on employers in the hardest-hit states by requiring each state to repay, starting in 1964, all federal benefits received in excess of the funds paid in through the temporary tax increase.

The conservative financing proposal, which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned in telegrams to all senators would "aggravate the already unevenly distributed burden of unemployment," was defeated by a 44-42 vote. The final version provided that all employers would pay equally to finance the extra benefits.

The bill will provide aid for some 725,000 workers who exhausted unemployment payment rights since June 30, 1960 without finding work, plus an estimated 2.5 million more who are expected to use up regular state benefits between now and Apr. 1, 1962, cutoff date under the emergency program.

Labor Backs Salk Vaccine 'Last Big Push'

New York—Organized labor has pledged support of the U.S. Public Health Service's "last big push" for Salk vaccine inoculation before the polio season starts.

Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, said communitywide action is necessary to "minimize the effects of polio this year."

Perlis cited public health statistics showing that 38 percent of the children under five years of age, and 63 percent of the men and 48 percent of the women between 20 and 40 still have not been fully vaccinated.

He urged local CSA representatives either to cooperate in existing community programs or to provide the leadership for developing polio vaccine drives, as labor representatives have done in many communities in the past.

Canadian Named UAW Education Aide

Detroit—William C. MacDonald, education director in the Auto Workers' Canadian region since 1948, has been named assistant to UAW Education Dir. Carroll M. Hutton.

Born in Saskatchewan in 1908, MacDonald was graduated from Moosomin, Sask., Collegiate Institute. He worked as an ore miner in Quebec for seven years before going to work for Chrysler of Canada in Windsor, Ont., and joining the UAW. He was a local union officer for four years.

New Manual Aids Unions With Records, Reporting

A new book designed to help the average union officer beset by involved and complex fiscal, accounting and reporting problems arising from the Landrum-Griffin Act has been published by the Bureau of National Affairs.

The 200-page "Accounting and Office Manual for Labor Unions," by Harry C. Fisher, is an easy-to-read, easy-to-understand approach to the reports and forms required under L-G.

In addition, the manual provides helpful guidance on union bookkeeping, including suggested financial reports to the membership, the best methods of keeping records on dues collection money, how to prepare a financial statement, the nature of taxes that must be withheld and data on tax forms to be filed.

Fisher, a certified public accountant from Los Angeles, has handled accounting problems for many AFL-CIO unions. The volume contains almost 100 "how-to-do-it" tables and forms that union treasurers, financial secretaries and other fiscal officers normally must handle.

"Accounting and Office Manual for Labor Unions" is available from the Bureau of National Affairs, 1231 24th St. N. W., Washington, D. C., at $8.75.

Critical Joblessness Hits Two-Thirds of U.S. Cities

Moves Set To Salvage Wage Bill

By Willard Shelton

The Kennedy Administration, hit by a one-vote setback on its minimum wage proposals in the House, has turned to the Senate seeking a bill broad enough to permit a final measure close to the President's recommendations.

The Senate Labor Committee with Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg in consultation began executive sessions at once. The prospect was that a bill would be cleared by committee about Apr. 11. Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) said floor action might come Apr. 12 or 13.

The House defeat, Administration Democrats said, came through absence of members, some of them northerners, who were pledged to support a compromise scaled-down Administration bill and failed to appear—although they were physically present for a quorum and a roll-call before and after the showdown vote.

Capitol observers acknowledged that the initial defeat for the Administration gave a substantial victory, even if eventually modified, to the Republican-Democratic conservative coalition that for years has blocked liberal legislation in the House.

Test on Compromise

The key test came on an Administration-supported compromise sponsored by Rep. Carl Albert (D-Okla.).

It was offered in an attempt to pick up support that Democratic legislative leaders told the White House they could not obtain for the broader Roosevelt bill approved by the House Labor Committee and carrying out Pres. Kennedy's own proposals.

The Albert compromise, as it went to the showdown vote, reduced the number of workers to be newly covered by the minimum wage law from the 4.3 million of the Roosevelt bill to 3.8 million. It provided protection only to the extent of a $1-an-hour wage, with no provision for statutory step-ups and with no time-and-one-half overtime wages.

Administration leaders reluctantly accepted the compromise and a pitched battle was waged between Kennedy backers and the conservative coalition for doubtful members.

The coalition, operated by Republican Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) and Democrat Howard W. Smith (Va.), offered a far

Kennedy Warns of Persistent Danger

By David L. Perlman

A record two-thirds of the nation's major industrial areas—101 out of 150—have been listed by the Labor Dept. as areas of "substantial unemployment." The March totals topped the 1958 recession high of 89, were triple the number listed a year ago and 25 more than the last tabulation in January.

The report came on the heels of a warning by Pres. John F. Kennedy that expected seasonal pickups in employment this spring will not necessarily reduce the high level of unemployment or mark the beginning of "a sustained economic growth" for the nation.

Kennedy, at his last press conference, refused to express unqualified agreement that the condition of the economy is "improving," declaring that it is "impossible" to make any precise judgment at this time.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg likewise has emphasized that "the Administration is gravely concerned about the unemployment problem which will persist" and declined to speculate that the "bottom" of the recession has been reached.

The sharp rise in the number of hard-hit areas came despite a leveling off of industrial production in February after a six-month decline. While some of the industrial areas surveyed reported an increase in employment over the past year, the Labor Dept. noted that in most cases the pickup in jobs "was not fully adequate to absorb the continuing growth in the local labor force."

Joblessness Widespread

The deepening jobless crisis was not confined to the big cities. The Labor Dept.'s list of smaller communities with substantial unemployment rose by 32 in the March report to a total of 184.

Substantial unemployment is defined by the Labor Dept. as an unemployment rate above 6 percent which is expected to persist for several months to come. The March total of 101 major areas so listed is the highest ever recorded during the 10 years the department has maintained comparable statistics.

Of the three categories of sub-

House Oks Areas Bill 250 to 167

By Gene Zack

The House, by a vote of 250 to 167, has passed Pres. John F. Kennedy's $394 million depressed areas bill after beating efforts of a conservative Republican-Democratic coalition to force through a watered-down substitute.

Final passage came after the House voted 291 to 125 to reject a coalition measure sponsored by Rep. William B. Widnall (R-N.J.) which would have cut funds to $275 million. The substitute would have provided only loans instead of a combination of loans and grants for hard-hit communities.

Action on area redevelopment came in the wake of a sharp setback for the new Administration on minimum wage legislation. The coalition, by a one-vote margin in that case substituted a bill calling for a $1.15-an-hour wage and coverage for only 1.4 million new workers. Kennedy had asked for a wage floor of $1.25 and coverage for 4.3 million more workers.

The Senate Labor Committee is scheduled to take up the minimum wage issue Apr. 11, and Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) has forecast that the Senate would pass a bill "approximately along the lines of what the President requested."

20 States Sign Pacts:

Machinery in Motion To Speed Jobless Pay

The Labor Dept. has set in motion the machinery for speeding extended unemployment compensation benefits to 725,000 workers who have exhausted jobless payment rights in the past nine months and who are still without work.

Within an hour after Pres. John F. Kennedy signed the TUC measure, first anti-recession bill passed by the 87th Congress, officials of 20 states had entered into agreements with the federal government to make the emergency aid available. Other states were expected to follow suit quickly.

Moving quickly to put the program into operation, many states have already begun taking and processing claims from the long-term jobless. The bulk of the claims is expected during the week of Apr. 3.

A Labor Dept. spokesman estimated that the benefit checks would be in the hands of a majority of those eligible by Apr. 15—less than 10 weeks after Kennedy, in his State of the Union Message, assigned top priority to the temporary program to "abate the waste and misery of unemployment."

In addition to the 725,000 present exhaustees, an estimated 2.4 million workers who are expected to use up regular state benefits prior to Apr. 1, 1962, will be aided by the program, which will pump some $1 billion in added benefits into the lagging economy.

A companion measure, signed into law by the President at the same time he signed the TUC bill,

Kennedy Asks $3.2 Billion Housing Bill

Pres. John F. Kennedy, launching an all-out fight against slums and substandard homes, has sent to Congress a comprehensive $3.2 billion housing and urban redevelopment measure.

The President said his proposals were designed to "reverse the steady deterioration of our cities" and to meet the housing needs "of millions of Americans who today live under conditions this nation can no longer afford."

In letters of transmittal to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.), Kennedy said his proposed bill spelled out the steps the government must take "to enable the housing industry to return to full production as soon as possible."

The President said that his bill

Meany Gives Blueprint for America In Accepting 4 Freedoms Award

New York—A blueprint for the American future was presented by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in accepting the Four Freedoms award, at a dinner here. Emphasizing that he did not regard the award as a personal tribute but rather as an honor to the labor movement, the AFL-CIO leader laid down as a program for America:

1. Guaranteeing a college education for qualified youngsters regardless of whether their parents have the needed money.

2. Providing jobs for the 13 million men and women who will enter the job market in the next decade.

3. Wiping out every vestige of racial and religious discrimination.

4. Improving production and distribution so as to ensure that Americans will have enough to eat.

5. Giving unstinting aid to underdeveloped nations.

6. Advancing the cause of peace in freedom.

7. Maintaining our military strength so as to deter aggression if possible and to turn it back if necessary.

Referring to the "titanic struggle for human freedom that goes on in the world," Meany declared: "To millions behind the Iron Curtain,

Peace Corps Seen Needing Union Skills

The newly formed Peace Corps may lean heavily on union-developed technical skills and apprenticeship training programs in recruiting young people to serve overseas.

The Peace Corps, to be made up of volunteers to work in the newly emerging nations, has begun distribution of 200,000 questionnaires which emphasize job experience and training.

The questionnaires were prepared by the Peace Corps with the advice of specialists from government, labor, business and education. They will go first to the 20,000 persons who have volunteered thus far to serve with pilot projects abroad.

Later the questionnaires will go to labor unions, business organizations and other interested groups, according to Peace Corps Dir. Sargent Shriver, to make it possible for as large a group as possible to volunteer for this service.

The 8,000-member New York Newspaper Guild, meanwhile, voted to put its full support behind the Peace Corps operation and launched a drive to aid in enlisting trained newspaper and magazine personnel, especially those with trade union backgrounds, to assist emerging nations in the building of their own news media.

The local called on management to offer all employes recruited into the corps unpaid leaves of absence, with all rights under their contracts unimpaired. Such action, the executive board said, would be "in the best spirit of union-management cooperation for the advancement of our national interests."

FIRST NATIONAL SAFETY Training Institute sponsored by the AFL-CIO and the U.S. Dept. of Labor got advice and information from this panel of experts. Left to right, J. V. Waite, Bureau of Labor Standards safety consultant; George Brown of the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety and Occupational Health; Stanley J. Butcher, chief of the BLS safety division; Francis L. Otto, assistant chief.

First Safety Institute Operated by AFL-CIO

The AFL-CIO first national institute in safety training has graduated its first class of union members after a week's intensive instruction in safety and occupational health, and a second class was ready to take its seats.

Twenty-five students from 18 union organizations in places as widely separated as Long Beach, Calif., and Waterbury, Conn., attended the pilot class in the Railway Labor building. Students were provided by AFL-CIO organizations, teachers by the U.S. Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards.

George Brown, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety and Occupational Health, told the opening session that the institute marked a pioneer step in labor history. After many years of cooperation in management and government programs, he said, labor is expanding its cooperation by sponsoring its own courses, and he paid tribute to the assistance of Dir. Arthur Motley of the Bureau of Labor Standards.

The training institute is designed to train union members who will in turn train others. Limited to 25 students per class, it will be held four times a year. Courses deal with beginning safety instruction, chemical and environmental training, including radiation safety, and mechanical and physical safety.

There is no charge for instruction but each AFL-CIO affiliate pays for its members' room, board and transportation.

State Classes Next

With the national program under way, state organizations and individual unions will be encouraged to hold safety institutes on state or regional levels.

Students were sent to the first class by Air Line Pilots, Auto Workers, Communications Workers, Government Employes, Glass Bottle Blowers, Fire Fighters, Chemical Workers, Hod Carriers, Operating Engineers and Rubber Workers.

Many managements now recognize, Brown said, that cooperation with labor has "opened opportunities for reducing deaths and injuries" on the job. More than 50 percent of all labor-management contracts now emphasize the fact that job hazards are a problem most easily solved by the joint efforts of labor, management and government, he said.

Four Freedoms Award Presented to Meany

freedom of speech is unknown today; freedom from fear is just a dream; freedom of religion just a myth; freedom from want is determined by the extent to which the military dictatorship requires production for human destruction rather than human needs."

Organized labor is in the forefront of the effort to achieve peace with freedom, he said, because "they know that the denial of human freedom anywhere, that slavery anywhere, for whatever reason, is a threat to freedom everywhere."

Previous recipients of the Four Freedoms award, which is bestowed by the Four Freedoms Foundation, have been former Pres. Truman, the late Gen. George C. Marshall, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, former Gov. Averell Harriman, former Gov. Herbert H. Lehman and other distinguished Americans.

Formal presentation of the award was made at a meeting in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg in a speech said Meany's leadership of American labor "has been characterized by honesty of opinion, firmness of judgment and constant awareness of the real values that should motivate labor organizations."

The four freedoms, first enunciated by Pres. Roosevelt in a message to Congress Jan. 6, 1941, comprise freedom of speech and expression, freedom of religion, freedom from want and freedom from fear.

Goldberg emphasized that "a way of life which offers intellectual freedom through political guarantees, and also offers economic freedom through wise social and economic legislation, is the highest creation of civilized man."

"Only from such a system could evolve a concept," he said, like that of the four freedoms. And if communism steals our rhetoric, abuses our vocabulary, distorts our semantics—they cannot undo the truth of our system. Both bread and equality, both freedom and security—these are inseparable. We can attain them. Communism cannot. That is the simple message of the four freedoms doctrine."

Goldberg told the dinner audience that he was bringing Pres. Kennedy's personal greetings and congratulations to Meany.

Harriman, now U.S. ambassador-at-large, attended the dinner, saying he had come especially from the nation's capital to pay tribute to Meany. He emphasized that the ideological struggle in the world is as vital as the economic struggle and that the role of the AFL-CIO in world affairs is "absolutely essential in any program which our government undertakes."

Elizabeth Reedy Wins Scholarship

Princeton, N. J.—Elizabeth K. Reedy, daughter of Wesley Reedy, assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, and Mrs. Reedy, has been awarded a Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship for graduate study in teaching.

Miss Reedy, a student at Lake Forest College in Illinois, was one of 1,333 students reeceiving the award, named for the World War I President and one-time head of Princeton University here. The fellowship covers the first year of graduate study, and is designed to stimulate interest in college teaching as a possible career.

TWU Warns of Union Gas Strike

New York—Pres. Michael J. Quill of the Transport Workers and officers of TWU Local 101 have taken to television, radio and handbills to inform the public of a possible strike against the Brooklyn Union Gas Co. Quill said management has refused to share its $8 million annual profit with the 3,000 employes represented by TWU.

The union, in many years of bargaining with the gas company, never has called a strike. At a membership meeting negotiators won a unanimous vote of authority to call a walkout if necessary, Quill said. He reported no progress had been made in negotiations.

Medical Care, Food, Responsible:

Cost of Living Rise Equals Record High

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's cost of living, pushed mainly by higher prices for medical care and food, resumed its upward trend in February to match last December's all-time high.

A slight rise of one-tenth of 1 percent erased the same margin of decline recorded in January—the first drop in a year— and left the Consumer Price Index at 127.5, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Labor Dept. reported. This means the market basket which cost $10 in the 1947-49 base period now costs $12.75.

A companion report showed that factory workers' spendable earnings and buying power were "steady" between January and February.

Spendable weekly earnings—what remains after deduction of social security and federal income taxes—in both months were $80.35 for a factory worker with three dependents and $72.81 for a worker without dependents.

Buying power or "real" spendable earnings—what remains after take-home pay is deflated by the rise in the cost of living—stood at $63.02 a week for the factory worker with a wife and two children.

This is how the factory worker with three dependents has fared in recent Februaries, comparing his buying power to the 1947-49 base period: $63.02 in 1961; $64.67 in 1960; $64.02 in 1959; $60.03 in 1958; $63.18 in 1957; $62.63 in 1956 and $60.38 in 1955.

Robert J. Myers, BLS deputy commissioner, told reporters the "relative stagnation" in the level of earnings has been due primarily to shorter hours. The rate of earnings is a little higher, he added, but actual hours of work have dropped.

Buying power is affected, he continued, because "increases in earnings have not quite kept up with increases in prices."

Food Prices High

"The 0.6 percent increase in average prices for medical care," the report said, "resulted primarily from higher rates for hospitalization insurance and surgical insurance. However, professional fees and hospital room rates also advanced."

Lower average prices for prescriptions and drugs in February continued the gradual decline which began last June, the report noted.

Food prices showed a slight rise of one-tenth of 1 percent over the month. Higher prices for fresh fruits, processed fruits and vegetables and poultry, plus hikes for restaurant meals, were almost nullified by lower egg prices.

The February CPI, at 127.5, stood 1.5 percent above February 1960, the report noted.

Food showed a 3.4 percent increase over the year and accounted for 60 percent of the overall rise.

Medical care prices have risen 3 percent since February 1960 and accounted for 10 to 20 percent of the overall rise.

The wages of about 120,000 workers, mainly in aircraft-missile firms and other metal-working companies, are tied to the February CPI through escalator clauses in union contracts.

Only some 30,000 of them—chiefly in Republic Aviation—will receive increases of 1 cent an hour, the report pointed out, since the February index of 127.5 was only one-tenth of one percent higher than the level of three months ago.

Jersey Unit Hits Hospital Rate Proposal

Newark, N. J.—Proposals to authorize the institution of an experience rating formula by the Hospital Service Plan of New Jersey have been opposed by the State Industrial Union Council in a memorandum to the legislative committee investigating the Blue Cross program.

Blue Cross asked that it be allowed to establish premium rates for various groups based on the number of hospitalizations, with a maximum range of 25 percent between the highest and lowest rates.

State IUC Pres. Joel R. Jacobson in objecting pointed out that the subscribers most affected, those in large industrial groups, are not represented on any Blue Cross policy-making body and that the effect of the formula would be to exclude from coverage those most in need of hospitalization.

He also charged experience rating would work an undue hardship on older and retired workers, and that by driving out "poor risk" groups, Blue Cross would shift the cost partly to the taxpayers and partly to other paying hospital patients.

Profits of Steel Industry Rose During Strike Year

The American steel industry chalked up higher profits in 1959—despite the 116-day nationwide steel shutdown—than it did in the recession year of 1958, the Steelworkers have reported.

The USWA also disclosed that crude steel production was 8 million tons higher in the year of the strike than in the previous 12-month period.

The disclosures came in a Steelworkers' publication, "The 1959 Steel Strike," prepared by the USWA's Intl. Affairs Dept. to explain the labor dispute to trade unionists overseas.

The publication was prepared by the USWA to show how the union's democratic rights were maintained during the long steel strike. The Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions had attempted to exploit the steel shutdown, endeavoring to picture it as an uprising of steel workers against capitalistic-monopolistic exploiters.

The union reported that crude steel production was 93.4 million tons in 1959 compared with 85.2 million tons in recession-ridden 1958. Profits racked up by the 28 major companies in the face of the 116-day strike were $792.9 million, compared with 1958's $764.4 million.

UAW Renews Demand:

Ford Co. Quizzed On Overseas Plans

Detroit—The Auto Workers have again asked that the Ford Motor Co. disclose to its workers company plans to produce smaller-than-compact cars in Germany and England and what this might mean in "export of jobs."

Pointing out that reports in Business Week magazine and the London Sunday Dispatch have revealed purported plans to produce overseas a group of cars smaller than the Falcon, the UAW renewed a request made last fall for a top-level meeting to discuss the company's program.

Ford's plans could mean fewer jobs in hard-hit auto centers of the United States, Dir. Ken Bannon of the UAW Ford Dept. said in a letter to K. D. Cassidy, Ford vice president in charge of industrial relations.

Bannon told Cassidy that the "American public generally, and your own employes particularly" have a right to know what Ford has in mind.

GM Locals Confer

Meanwhile, the UAW General Motors Dept. completed meetings of area subcouncils in preparation for the start of contract negotiations. After a special UAW collective bargaining convention in Detroit Apr. 26-29, the union's national GM Council will meet, at a time and place to be selected, to adapt the program to the needs of GM workers.

Bannon, in his letter to Ford, reminded the company that since it turned down the UAW request for a top-level meeting last year, these things have happened:

- Sales of U. S.-built new cars have dropped 22 percent over a one-year period.
- One out of every four auto workers is unemployed, and the nationwide jobless figure is almost 7 percent of the labor force.
- Ford has invested $335 million in the British Ford Motor Co. and began a $196 million expansion program to increase production by 50 percent. Ford of Germany is planning to increase capacity by 40 percent.

Business Week reported Feb. 25 that a car known as the Cardinal will be produced in Ford's Cologne plant for sale only in Germany; another, "jestingly called the Archbishop by people around Ford," will be made in Ford's Dagenham, England, plant; a third will be assembled in the U.S. from parts made in Cologne, the magazine said.

Bannon advised Ford that its employes have a right to know, directly from the company and not by way of news secured by magazine editors, what employer plans are.

GM Committeemen

On the GM front, UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock announced the names of the following union members who will take part in GM negotiations:

Chairman William Horner, Tarrytown, N. Y., Local 664; Vice Chairman Clarence Lyons, Local 23, Indianapolis; Sec. Robert Rowe, Defiance, O., Local 211; Samuel Seimarco, Local 598, and Elwood Moore, Local 326, Flint, Mich.; Frank Mills, Local 1231, Grand Rapids, Mich.; James O'Keeffe, Columbus, O., Local 969; Hubert Miller, Local 933, Indianapolis; Joseph Pratt, Local 31, Kansas City, Kan.; Adam Urquhart, Local 160, Warren, Mich., and Stanley Pencikowski, Local 735, Wayne, Mich.

'LOCOMOTIVE FIREMAN OF 1960,' Melvin L. Rake of Seattle, receives annual safety award of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen for his alertness in spotting early signs of a landslide and averting a major train tragedy. Left to right are: BLFE Pres. H. E. Gilbert, Rake, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, and Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), a judge in the contest. The award, named after D. B. Robertson, president-emeritus of the union, and a $500 check were presented at a banquet in Washington, D. C.

B&C Suspends Cross On Treasury Charge

Pres. James G. Cross of the expelled Bakery & Confectionery Workers has been suspended from office by his executive board—which earlier had agreed to pay him $250,000 if he would resign—and is charged with misappropriation of $35,000 from the union's treasury.

Also suspended was the B&C's second-ranking officer, Sec.-Treas. Peter H. Olson.

Cross and Olson face a union trial on the charge early in May.

An attorney for a group of B&C locals which last year sued for the ouster of Cross but later agreed to the $250,000 proposal meanwhile asked a federal judge to postpone a hearing on whether the settlement should be approved. The hearing date was put off until May 23.

The attorney for the so-called Local Union Reunification Committee said Cross, with the "approval and connivance" of Olson, had withdrawn $35,000 in union funds in 1959 and falsely reported it to the Labor Dept. as strike contributions to a New York City local which never received the money.

A Labor Dept. spokesman said the shortage was uncovered during an investigation ordered by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg at the time the $250,000 "deal" for Cross to resign was first reported in the press. A team of investigators from the department's Bureau of Labor-Management Reports scrutinized the union's financial reports, examined its books and questioned B&C officials about the $35,000 "discrepancy."

The proposed payment to Cross, as a settlement of his pension rights, had been denounced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "unconscionable" and "legalistic highway robbery."

The B&C was expelled from the AFL-CIO at the 1957 convention on charges of corrupt domination and the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers was chartered in its place. Since then a majority of union bakery workers have joined the AFL-CIO affiliate. The Local Union Reunification Committee has said that its goal is to pave the way for unification of the two unions and AFL-CIO affiliation.

Olsen until his suspension was one of the three officials named to govern the union when Cross, in early February, was given a leave of absence pending a court decision on the $250,000 settlement.

If the settlement is withdrawn or rejected by the court, the original suit against Cross and the B&C would still be pending. The suit alleges, among other things, that $65,000 in union funds were used to pay for a Palm Beach, Fla., home for Cross, suites in Washington, D. C., hotels and personal expenses and trips for Cross and his wife.

Board Denies New Hearing To 'Runaway'

The National Labor Relations Board has refused the request of an American-owned steamship company—West Indies Fruit & Steamship Co., Inc.—for reconsideration of its historic ruling last Feb. 16 that the company violated U. S. labor law in interfering with the right of crew members on the carferry Sea Level to join the Seafarers.

The Sea Level is a "runaway" ship, registered under the flag of Liberia, but plying between Florida and Havana. The board for the first time took jurisdiction over such foreign flag vessels, ruling that American labor laws apply to American-owned ships sailing principally in U. S. waters.

The employer sought a rehearing on the ground that one of the three NLRB members who voted against the company's arguments—Joseph A. Jenkins—had stated an opinion on broad issues allegedly involved in a speech delivered before the ruling was made.

Meanwhile Panama's foreign minister, Galileo Solis, told Sec. of State Dean Rusk that the ruling "violates centuries-old rules of international law" and may have "grave and serious repercussions."

SIU and the Maritime Union have been urging for several years that the NLRB has jurisdiction over U. S.-owned vessels. They deny the contention of Panama that the ruling violates international law. It applies only to American-owned ships, they have said.

CSC Programs Filmed in Color

Phoenix, Ariz.—A 48-minute full-color motion picture, describing the community service programs being operated by organized labor in this area, has been produced by the Phoenix and Maricopa County AFL-CIO.

Narrated by Bob Hope and featuring a professional cast, the film, "Our Community, U.S.A." is being made available for showing, at no cost, to local unions, civic and fraternal organizations, church and PTA groups.

Prints of the 16mm film are available through Milton Lee, labor staff representative of the Phoenix United Fund, 1515 East Osborn Rd., Phoenix.

Congressional Probe Of Rail Mergers Asked

The nation's railroad unions have launched a counterattack on the growing trend toward mergers of profitable railroads—mergers which the Railway Labor Executives' Association warns could throw an additional 200,000 workers out of jobs and squeeze out of existence marginal connecting lines.

At an RLEA press conference, Chairman G. E. Leighty and George M. Harrison, president of the Railway Clerks, proposed a full-scale congressional study of railroad mergers. Meanwhile, they said, the Interstate Commerce Commission should hold up action on pending merger requests.

In a related area, Pres. Kennedy asked Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg to explore with railroad unions the problems of rising unemployment in the industry, including loss of jobs resulting from merger. Kennedy directed the study in response to a letter from the heads of the 23 organizations affiliated with the rail labor executives' association.

Harrison told newsmen that continued merger of "well-to-do" railroads could wreck the nation's transportation network by stranding less prosperous lines and lead to government ownership "which we don't want."

He said mergers should be based on the nation's transportation needs under a master plan of regional systems as originally contemplated under a 1920 law which was repealed in 1940.

If all pending merger proposals were approved, Harrison said, they would result in the loss of 200,000 jobs on top of the 400,00 already lost during the past five years.

Social Security Fund Sound, Report Shows

The nation's social security system is in sound financial shape and will remain in a healthy condition despite increased benefit outlays in the future, Social Security Commissioner William L. Mitchell has declared.

The optimistic outlook, he said, was based on official estimates made by Cabinet officers in the former Republican Administration—Treasury Sec. Robert B. Anderson, Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell and Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Arthur S. Flemming—in their 21st annual report to Congress.

The latest actuarial figures show that both the old-age and survivors' insurance trust fund and the disability insurance trust fund are "soundly financed and, based upon the best estimates available, will remain so for the future," the social security commissioner declared.

During calendar 1960, Mitchell reported, $11.1 billion was paid out in old age and survivors' benefits while tax contributions and interest brought in $11.3 billion. For the disability trust fund, benefits amounted to $604 million and income totaled $1 billion last year, he said.

The estimates made by the former GOP Cabinet officers for the five-year period from 1960 to 1965 show that income will amount to $70.8 billion and benefits will come to only $67 billion for recipients of old-age and survivors' aid, while the disability fund will take in $5.9 billion and pay out $5.5 billion, Mitchell said.

The commissioner noted that the Kennedy Administration has proposed a series of improvements in social security law provisions, including the providing of health care for the aged, but stressed that all of the proposals contain provisions to make them "fully self-financing."

If those proposals are adopted by Congress, Mitchell said, "the system over the long run would continue to be self-supporting and soundly financed."

Law Firm Named As Counsel for IUD

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has retained the law firm of Feller, Bredhoff and Anker of Washington as its general counsel, IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther has announced.

The firm formerly was Goldberg, Feller and Bredhoff and was headed by Arthur J. Goldberg, then IUD general counsel and special counsel to the AFL-CIO and now Secretary of Labor.

SECRETARY George Apperson of the executive board of Washington Div. 689, Street Railway Employes, explains union record-keeping techniques to new employes of D. C. Transit System as part of a training system in which management and the union cooperated, which is repeated weekly for new workers. Apperson, standing is coordinator of the training program.

With Management Cooperation:

Transit Local Indoctrinates New Members in Unionism

New members of the Street Railway Employes in the national capital get something that most other workers do not have—education in unionism along with training in on-the-job skills.

Under contract between Division 689 of the union, the Washington, D. C. local, and the D. C. Transit System, Inc., employes "breaking in" are paid for every day of training given by the company and for one day of instruction on the union's constitution, bylaws, dues, health and welfare and credit union services. The union itself pays the trainees for the day they spend on union indoctrination.

The result has pleased both the trainees and the union officers who set up the program in spite of advice that it never had been done and never could be done.

The program has been so successful that the union is considering an offer of similar instruction, after work, for older operators and for members of non-operating departments.

D. C. Transit hires an average of four bus operators a week and begins a new training program each week. With management cooperation, the Street Railway Employes local set up its training program to take place during the company's basic classroom period.

Every trainee gets a union manual containing copies of the union bylaws and constitution, the local's last audit report, information on the jointly-administered health and welfare fund and health center.

Course instructors include Pres. Walter J. Bierwagen of the local union, who is also a vice president of the international union and treasurer of the Washington, D. C., Central Labor Council, and other officers—Vice Pres. Robert N. Ridgeway, Recording Sec. Elmer A. Staats, and Financial Sec.-Treas. Henry G. Steele.

Each officer tells what his duties are, and all answer questions about their salaries, how they are elected, how elections are conducted, members' rights, and other points of interest.

Staff workers and other leaders also give information on their specialties. Treas. Harold Miley tells of the Transit Employes Federal Credit Union. Dr. Henry H. Lichtenberg of the Labor-Management Health Center and Mrs. Vera Schwarz, head nurse, discuss the members' use of this broad prepaid medical care plan, and Leon Richeson, administrative assistant to health and welfare fund trustees, speaks on the financing. Roger E. Burgess, vice president of the international union and editor of its publications, discusses the function of the labor press.

Longer Trainee Course Weighed

The "short course" in union affairs which new D. C. Transit bus operators get may be doubled in length to two days.

Officers of the Washington local of the Street Railway Employes are studying proposals to provide speakers and information about the Union Label Dept. and other integral parts of the labor movement.

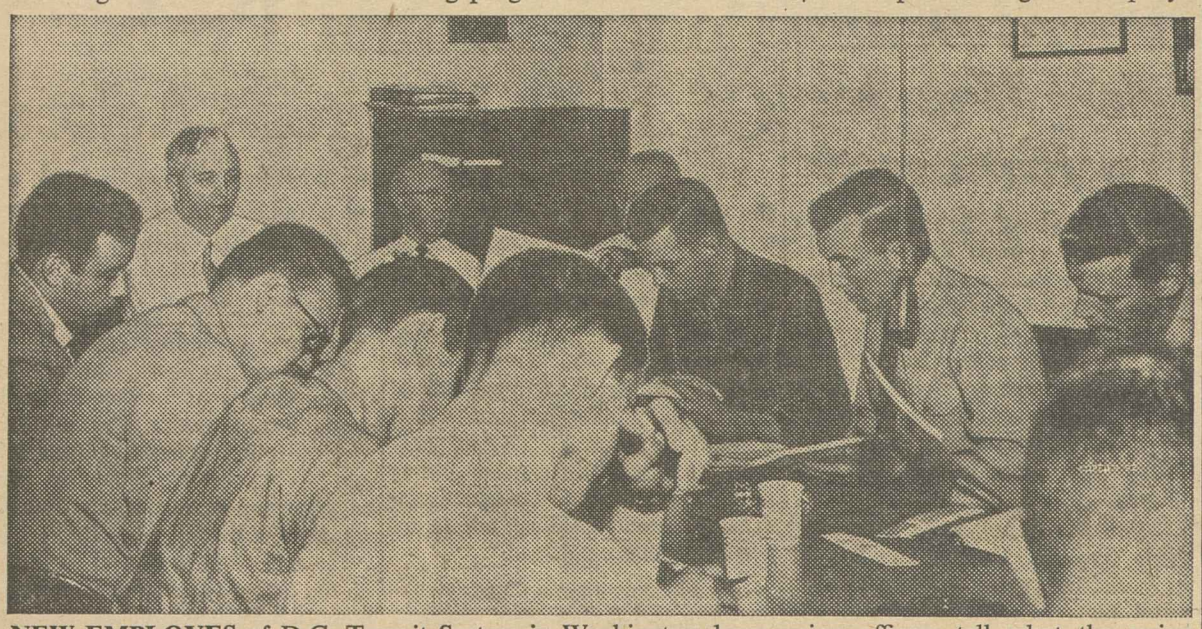
Classroom sessions include a discussion of political education and such union-won benefits as vacations, paid holidays and pensions. Student evaluation sheets, after the training session, have included comments like these:

"I had a different opinion about unions until this meeting."

"I learned a lot about unions I did not know before."

"I think these sessions should be a 'must' for all new employes."

Details of the training program were worked out in six months of careful preparation. The officers won approval for it from the membership, and George Apperson, secretary of the executive board, set up the system as training coordinator.



NEW EMPLOYES of D.C. Transit System in Washington hear union officers tell what the union does for members in a unique training program sponsored by management and the Street Railway Employes. Time lost in class is paid for by the union. The picture shows two union officers—Pres. Walter J. Bierwagen, facing camera, left, and Financial Sec.-Treas. Henry G. Steele, to Bierwagen's left—telling about the union's dues structure.

Labor Board Reverses Its Ruling On Validity of Dues Checkoff Clause

The National Labor Relations Board has reversed an earlier ruling that a union contract was, in effect, invalid because it contained a requirement that members must notify both management and the union of their intention to revoke dues-checkoff authorization.

Last October, Board Members Arthur A. Kimball, Joseph Alton and John H. Fanning ruled that a contract between the unaffiliated Mine Workers Dist. 50 and the Boston Gas Co. violated the Taft-Hartley Act and therefore was not a bar to a representation election.

Organized labor generally protested the ruling charging that it would lead to "widespread disruption of peaceful labor-management relations" and the labor board agreed to review the decision, which had been handed down on an election petition filed by the Utility Workers.

Following a study of briefs filed by the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept., the Building & Construction Trades Dept., the Metal Trades Dept., and 11 affiliated international unions, the board reversed its decision and held that the contract provision was not an "impediment to an employe's freedom" to revoke his dues-checkoff authorization.

In the latest decision, Boyd Leedom, former chairman, and Philip Ray Rodgers, neither of whom had taken part in the original ruling, held that the contract was legal. Reversing their earlier stands were Jenkins and Fanning. Kimball filed a separate dissent in which he declared that nothing in the briefs field by organized labor "persuades me to alter my original position."

In its brief filed with the NLRB challenging the original ruling, the AFL-CIO contended that thousands of union contracts contained similar provisions based on a Justice Dept. interpretation of Taft-Hartley 12 years ago.

AFL-CIO General Counsel J. Albert Woll and William S. Tyson pointed out to the board that in 1948 an assistant U.S. Attorney General reviewed the language of a contract specifically calling for written revocation notices to both union and employer and gave approval of the language involved.

"For more than 12 years," the AFL-CIO brief declared, "labor and management have relied in good faith on this interpretation of the assistant Attorney General. It is plain that the assistant Attorney General did not consider the notification requirements to impinge upon the employe's individual choice."

NMU Council Supports 30-Hour Week Demand

New York—The 35-member national council of the Maritime Union has approved 1961 contract proposals covering an across-the-board wage increase for 40,000 crewmen on deep-sea ships; a shorter workweek to be used for accumulating vacation time so seamen can be with their families, and five other important contract changes.

At least two of the seven points are "strikeable" issues, Pres. Joseph Curran told a press conference. Contracts expire June 15.

In a resolution, the national council said the shorter workweek on a "time back" basis should be a major union objective in negotiations. The council called on members to "take whatever action may be needed" to achieve the goal.

Next in importance, it said, are contract provisions intended to assure that "all ships owned or operated by contract companies" shall be covered by the basic agreement.

Curran said this demand was aimed at companies which operate ships not only under the American flag but also under foreign flags, particularly those of Panama, Liberia and Honduras. One such company is National Bulk Carriers, which has a contract covering 15 vessels but also operates 195 foreign-flag freighters.

The council listed two major problems confronting the union—unemployment, and the need to provide additional time ashore for those who are working in view of today's "lightning ship turnarounds."

Asserting that a decrease in the workweek from 40 hours to 30 would give seamen approximately 65 days of paid leave after a year's work, the council said such a provision is sound and just "in view of the fact that a seaman's work requires him to live in the factory 24 hours a day, subject to call at any hour, day or night, seven days a week."

Other objectives are increased pension and welfare contributions by employers; acceptance of the principle of one person to a room in all new ship construction; general improvements in living and working conditions, and the use of relief crews on deep-sea vessels.

IUD Creates New Anti-Bias Section

Creation of a permanent anti-bias committee, designed to asssist Pres. John F. Kennedy's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, has been announced by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther, in a letter to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, chairman of the President's committee, said the new unit within the department would work "to effectuate the purposes" of the executive order issued by Kennedy.

The IUD committee, headed by Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey, will coordinate the department's cooperation in obtaining industrial union compliance with anti-bias directives on government contracts, Reuther said, and will undertake an education program to explain the need for nondiscrimination.

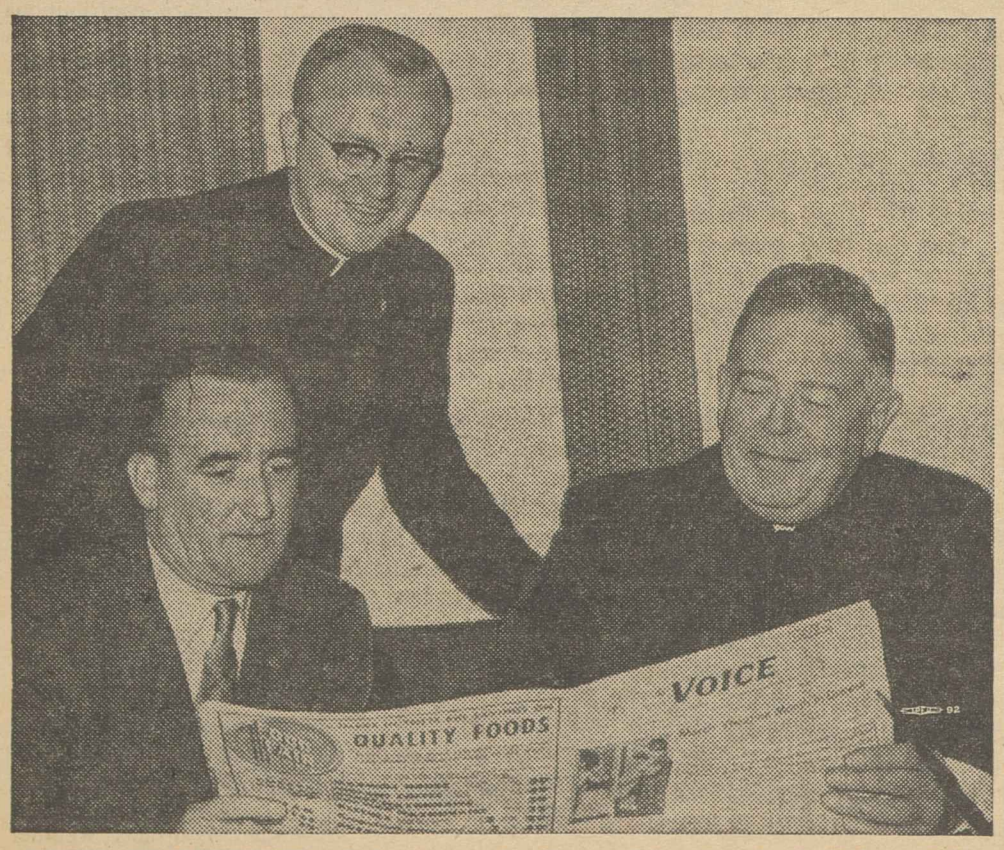
U.S. Hearts Opened to Cuban Refugees

MEDICAL CARE is rendered families which have fled Communist-oriented dictatorship of Fidel Castro. The service, being given by Dr. Mariam Bosch, is furnished through Dade County Health Dept. with emergency funds made available by U.S. Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

DISTRIBUTION of food for hungry Cuban families is supervised by nun at Centro Hispano Catolico, Roman Catholic center for Spanish-speaking families, one of many social agencies which have expanded services to meet needs of refugees.



SCOPE OF REFUGEE relief program is discussed by Joseph A. Beirne (left), AFL-CIO vice president and chairman of federation's Community Services Committee, with Bishop Coleman F. Carroll (right) and Rev. Bryan O. Walsh (standing), director of Catholic Charities in Dade County.

WITH FOOD FOR FAMILIES provided by relief agencies working to ease plight of refugees who have poured into Miami area, these Cuban women sit on the stairs outside social agency. They are waiting for their fathers and husbands to help carry packages to their temporary homes.

Job for the Government

THE IMPACT OF AUTOMATION on a recession-ridden economy, aggravating unemployment and adding to unused plant underlines the need for government action if the social benefits of the new technology are to be equitably distributed.

Some of the problems posed by automation can be handled through collective bargaining. But many others can be solved only by national legislation in the areas of unemployment compensation, education and training, a shorter workweek, aid to distressed areas and, above all, economic policies designed to sustain a growth rate of 5 percent a year.

Automation holds a tremendous promise for a prosperous nation and vast improvements in living standards. But in the transitional period the emphasis must be on preventing social dislocation and human suffering, a task that can best be accomplished on the national level by governmental policies and actions.

For Want of a Vote

THE CHILDHOOD REFRAIN "for want of a nail a kingdom was lost" accurately describes the fate of minimum wage legislation in the House last week.

For want of one switched vote, an acceptable compromise measure went down to defeat in a teller vote, 186 to 185. The one-vote victory margin for the Republican-Dixiecrat coalition raises some interesting questions on the behavior of House members.

It should dispel for all time the hedging comment often heard on the Hill that one vote won't make any difference. It should provide the final and convincing proof of the discipline and effectiveness of the conservative coalition. And it should focus new attention on the failure to vote and the absenteeism that plague liberal and moderate efforts to secure agreed-to legislation.

The non-record vote that settled the fate of minimum wage legislation in the House found 371 members passing up the aisles. A few hours earlier a quorum call raised 412 members. A roll call shortly after the teller vote recorded 419 members. Clearly, the difference was the key to the outcome of the teller vote. Observers noted that about half of those not voting were in moderate or liberal classification. The coalition ranks held tight.

The fate of other welfare and economic legislation in the House hinges on whether the liberal-moderate elements can bring the same discipline and conviction to the fray that has characterized the GOP-Dixiecrat coalition. Good intentions are not enough.

Exploded Again

THE PERENNIAL PLAINTS of the opponents of the social security system—that the trust funds from which all benefits flow are unsound—has been blown out of the water for the 21st consecutive year.

It probably won't appear in Chamber of Commerce or American Medical Association publications, but three Eisenhower Administration Cabinet officers in a report to Congress declared flatly that the funds are "soundly financed and, based upon the best estimates available, will remain so for the future."

The annual report points up the position of organized labor that the social security system can provide new and expanded benefits to all Americans so long as the program is soundly financed by employer and employe payments which entitle Americans to benefits as a matter of right.

Another Anti-Union Weapon:

Propagandists Have a New One —'Competitive' Price Position

A PHRASE WHICH the American people are likely to have dinned in their ears a great deal in the coming months is the American "competitive price position" in world markets.

The phrase means different things to different people, but for the most part it is used by the business community as a convenient weapon to beat down wages on the grounds that high American wages have ruined our export market.

Last year it was used as a propaganda slogan to account for the "flight of gold" as reflected in a drop in the American balance of trade to an unfavorable position and a loss of American-owned gold from the storage vaults in Fort Knox.

One of the reasons that we are likely to hear a good deal more about our wage structure is that Pres. Kennedy recently told his President's Committee on Labor-Management Policy that one of the things it might study is "our competitive position abroad" as affected "by the wage-price structure here at home."

It should be noted that on the very same day that Kennedy made his suggestion, the Office of Business Economics of the Dept. of Commerce published a report that throws a great deal of light on the real reasons for the decline in U.S. monetary holdings in 1960. This report is certain to play an important role in the coming debate on what is happening to our gold, and why.

IN THE FIRST PLACE, far from being the cause of the unfavorable balance of international payments, our export trade—high wages and all—increased heavily in 1960 and gave us a favorable trade balance of $3.8 billion as compared with a deficit of $100,000,000 in recession-ridden 1959.

That surplus, however, was offset "by an equal rise in the outflow of capital, much of which was for short-term investment and for speculative purposes, particularly in the latter part of 1960."

In addition, government expenditures abroad increased partly because of American contributions to two new international organizations, to increases in foreign aid and to a drop in loan repayments by foreign countries.

But the biggest villain in the piece, if you want to use that term, was the net outflow of U.S. capital. This outflow rose by $1.2 billion, by far the greater part of which was in short-term investment abroad as American capital sought to profit from European prosperity, to speculate on the price of gold or to escape taxation at home.

The final quarter of 1960 gave us the highest adverse payments balance for the entire year, resulting in a "decline in monetary gold holdings of the U.S. and the rise in our liquid liabilities of $1.2 billion," said the Commerce Dept.

One of the biggest reasons for this heavy rise was the action of the Ford Motor Co., in sending $370,000,000 abroad in order to buy out the minority interests of its British subsidiary at the very time that the Eisenhower Administration was trying to save just about the same amount by ordering the families of our military forces abroad to return home.

By year's end the U.S. had an unfavorable balance of payments of some $3.8 billion, about the same as in 1959, most of it due to the outflow of private capital and none of it due to an unfavorable balance in the exchange of goods and services.

ONE ASPECT OF THIS outflow of private capital that needs particular attention is the export of private capital as a tax-dodging device. Only recently Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), declared:

"There are two general types of tax haven abuses. The first consists of schemes to transfer income and profits from business in the United States into a foreign haven without paying U.S. income taxes. The second type centers around the uses to which these untaxed funds are put after they get into the tax haven."

What this means is that U.S. funds leave the country but do not come back in the form of profits, as they are supposed to. Gore cited cases of dummy trading corporations, reinsurance schemes and similar devices so that profits actually made by American companies at home are credited to dummy corporations abroad and thus escape American taxation. In other cases the profits made abroad—if they are ever repatriated—come back in such a form that they escape full taxation. (Public Affairs Institute—Washington Window.)

Morgan Says:

Negro Extremism in America Reflects Nationalism in Africa

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

WHILE THE STRUGGLE over the fate of the brown man quickens in Laos and continues in the Congo over the fate of the black man, there are storm signals flying across the fields of race relations in New York and other parts of the country. And the wind that blows is a cutting wind of hatred.

Morgan

In a way it is remarkable that more embittered minorities of the growing American Negro minority have not broken away into extremist groups. Progress in lifting them out of the slough of second-class citizenship—while continuing—has been agonizingly slow. But, against the pulsing chaos of new nationalism in Asia and Africa, fringe groups of Negro Muslims and nationalists, so-called, have stepped up their activities in the U.S. Significantly, their themes of racial warfare between black and white, political, economic and otherwise, run counter to everything responsible people on both sides believe and are trying to achieve. What these grubby cults are accomplishing is the establishment of a sort of White Citizens Council in reverse. Ironically they are doing the white supremacists' work because the latter can exploit their extremist attitudes to discredit the Negro population as a whole.

In Monroe, La., Police Chief James C. Kelly testified that he and six officers raided a Negro Muslim temple last week because they had proof the self-styled "black supremacy" group was of subversive nature. Whether the proof stands up or not, the impact of the incident can only be negative in an atmosphere pervading many areas of the South, in which communication between white and Negro communities is already virtually non-existent.

Nobody seemed to take these pseudo-religious bands of Negroes very seriously until the day after last Valentines's Day. It was on Feb. 15 that an ugly scene of violence erupted in the visitors' gallery at the United Nations Security Council, interrupting Ambassador Adlai Stevenson in mid-speech. The demonstration was part of a series of obviously organized protests against the assassination of Patrice Lumumba in the Congo. The most stunning fact was that, in contrast to the Gandhi-like techniques of the successful Montgomery, Ala. bus boycott and the more recent southern sit-ins, American Negroes were ringleaders of the violence. The UN's Ralph Bunche and other recognized spokesmen of the majority of American Negro citizens were quick to denounce the riot and disassociate themselves from the rioters who count a relatively small number of actual followers. But subsequent publicity has put such groups as the Nation of Islam, the Muslim Brotherhood, the United African Nationalist movement and lesser ones in the public eye.

Under a leader named Elijah Muhammad the Islamites espouse racial segregation and allegedly propagate racial hatred. For this and other reasons, the Muslim Brotherhood denounces the Muhammed movement and contends it is not authentically Muslim. There is a bewildering collection of smaller fringe groups, some of all these betraying unmistakable signs of anti-semitism.

Their existence would be of less importance if it were not for a couple of broader ramifications. One is the growing impatience of Negro Americans over their inching progress in gaining full civil rights and the other is a marked "hate the white man" attitude simmering below the surface in the more turbulent areas of Africa. This was one of the findings reported by Saturday Evening Post Editor Stewart Aslop after a tour of that continent.

Such reputable interracial groups as the NAACP and the Urban League have denounced the dissident extremists but they are caught somewhat in the middle. Conceivably a younger, intelligently aggressive Negro leadership may emerge from the sit-in movements. The youngsters involved, mostly serious-minded, educated college students, disavowed violence and have no known connection with the Black Nationalists but they are by no means satisfied with the tempo of the activities of the NAACP and the Urban League.

Obviously, if the sit-in leaders and the larger latter groups can collaborate more closely in their non-violent pursuit of first-class citizenship and if the country as a whole can be convinced of the necessity to quicken their progress, the threat of the brooding extremist outfits should dwindle away. But their very existence today is a warning. Part of the warning lies in the fact that Negroes are human, too. If they can be provoked into losing their patience, nothing would suit the white supremacists better and nothing would set the cause of interracial understanding in this country back more severely.

Washington Reports:

Democrat, Republican Praise U.S. Atom Test Ban Negotiators

MATERIAL NOW in nuclear weapon stockpiles could be diverted to peaceful purposes if the United States, the Soviet Union and other nations agreed on a permanent nuclear test ban.

Rep. Melvin Price (D-Ill.), member of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, made this statement as he was interviewed on the nuclear test ban talks now under way in Geneva. Price appeared with Rep. James E. Van Zandt (R-Pa.), also a member of the joint committee, on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

"The very ingredient that causes the bang in atomic weapons is the most useful for peaceful purposes," Price said.

Van Zandt and Price said that the American negotiating team was given an unusually thorough briefing by Administration experts and the joint committee.

"Arthur H. Dean, the head of the American team, appeared before our committee in executive session," Van Zandt reported, "and went to Geneva fully informed on what the Administration and the joint committee, which represent the people, want."

"Dean is also a veteran in dealing with the Communists, having dealt with them in the Korean negotiations at Panmunjom, and he has followed other negotiations with the Russians through recent years." Price added. "He's experienced, able and energetic. He is not so naive as to be caught in any pitfalls."

Van Zandt said that if the Russians "have been cheating" during the current moratorium on tests, they may be on a par with the U.S. on technical weapons, "or ahead of us."

To make certain there was "no cheating" under a permanent test ban agreement, Price said, the pact would have to provide that an international investigating team would have the right to make an on-the-spot investigation in case seismological reports left them in any doubt.

Both congressmen agreed that other nations, such as France and Red China, must be partners to an international permanent test ban agreement. Van Zandt said it has been predicted that China will have a weapon within the next few months. However, both men asserted, no nations except the U.S., the Soviet Union and Great Britain should be in the Geneva talks at this time.

"We're having difficulties enough trying to arrive at an agreement among three nations," Price declared, "but certainly we will not have an effective test ban or effective disarmament agreement until all nations in the world are parties to it."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE ADMINISTRATION'S SETBACK in the House on the minimum wage bill came on what is called a teller vote—a device in which members are not recorded by name, as in a rollcall, but march around the chamber with some dispatch, passing up the center aisle between two tellers, or counters, appointed to tally the number voting for or against a measure.

Teller votes are used when the House is sitting in Committee of the Whole to consider amendments to a bill approved by a legislative committee and cleared for action by the Rules Committee.

If a proposed amendment is beaten in Committee of the Whole—either by an unchallenged voice vote or by teller vote—it is dead. The vote is not subject to a later rollcall.

This machinery was in operation when the Administration-backed minimum wage bill went to the floor.

THE BILL approved in the Labor Committee, the measures in line with Pres. Kennedy's recommendations and sponsored by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), never came up to a vote.

House Democratic leaders had taken the pulse of the chamber and concluded that they could not pass the Roosevelt bill intact against the conservative coalition of northern Republicans and southern Democrats.

They therefore proposed a substitute sponsored by Rep. Carl Albert (D-Okla.) which maintained an increase in the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour but scaled down the coverage from 4.3 million more workers to 3.8 million. It also provided that newly covered workers would not be protected by overtime pay provisions and that their wage guarantee would be only $1 an hour.

This substitute was further scaled down on the floor, on an amendment by Rep. Carl Vinson (D-Ga.), to eliminate laundry workers from coverage. Employes of large laundries would have been covered under the Albert substitute. The Administration accepted the warning that the bill could not otherwise be passed.

The conservative coalition, headed by Rep. Charles A. Halleck (R-Ind.) and Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), still refused to accept this reduced proposal. They waged an all-out fight for the Kitchin-Ayres bill.

Rep. William H. Ayres (R-O.) solemnly assured members that they could "in good conscience" support the Kitchin-Ayres bill in order to beat the scaled-down Administration bill and then "vote against" Kitchin-Ayres "in the final analysis."

Halleck took the floor to re-enforce this appeal. Members who thought "nothing should be done" to increase minimum wages and expand protection to additional workers "ought to support" the Kitchin-Ayres bill, he said.

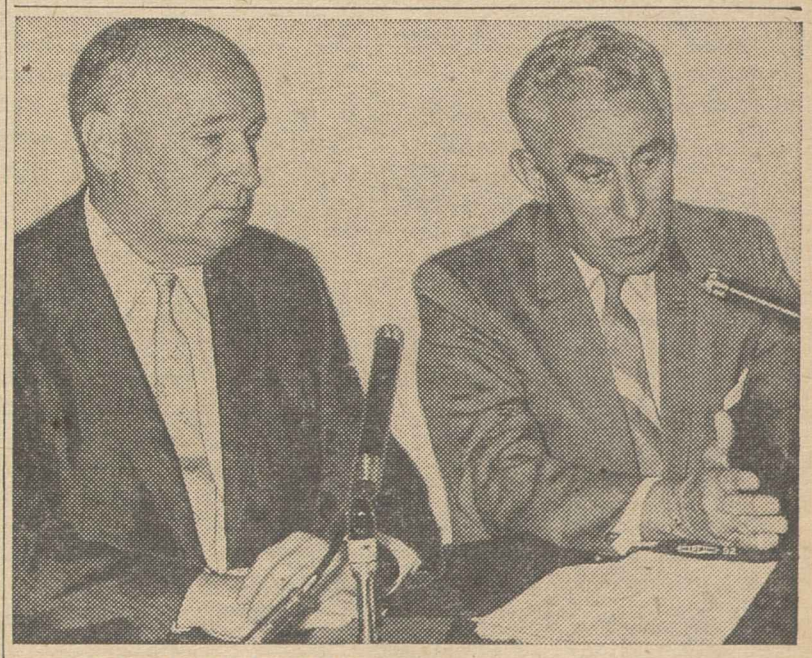
HOUSE DEMOCRATIC LEADERS and Administration spokesmen felt confident they had enough votes to pass the scaled-down substitute. But they fell short by a one-vote margin, 186 to 185, and the triumphant coalition went on to pass the Kitchin-Ayres bill. Democratic leaders said that some northern members generally credited with liberal voting records simply were not on the floor for the critical Albert bill vote.

There is an elaborate system of House Democratic assistant whips, each of them assigned to make sure that members from his own geographiacal area are on the floor and well informed when critical votes are taken. Albert, sponsor of the Administration-backed substitute, is himself the chief whip.

A number of southern Democrats followed Vinson in supporting the Albert substitute. The coalition forces, which in the past have often won handily, barely squeaked through. But they won.

As an example of the problems, one of the assistant whips is Kitchin himself.



THE AMERICAN TEAM in the Geneva nuclear test ban talks has been unusually well briefed by Administration experts and the Joint Committee, Rep. Melvin Price (D-Ill.), left, and Rep. James E. Van Zandt (R-Pa.), members of the Joint Committee, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.

How to Buy:

There Are Just as Many of Us Now as When Barnum Said It

By Sidney Margolius

EVER NOTICE HOW all the major brands of tooth paste and other toiletries cost the same; that major brands of bread have the same price tag; that many of the milk companies on your route are likely to charge the same price; that even diaper services and other services in your area charge the same rate?

The price rigging of electrical equipment for which several corporation executives recently were jailed actually is only a small part of the price fixing that goes on and compels you to pay high charges for many necessities.

Sometimes by actual agreement, sometimes by pressure from manufacturers, sometimes simply by observing each other's prices, many sellers nowadays charge you the same price for basic goods and services.

In the drug business, the tendency of manufacturers to exact the same fee for vital drugs, such as the antibiotics, compels you to pay from two to eight times as much as these drugs normally should sell for, investigations have shown.

For example, Dr. Karl Wachtel, medical director of the Nassau County, N. Y., Public Welfare Dept., says that encouraging doctors to prescribe drugs by their generic (scientific) names rather than by brand names has reduced the prices of prescriptions often by one-half. And in some cases, as in cortisone drugs, the price of the same drug under a generic name costs only a small fraction of the brand-name price.

In auto parts, the FTC has cited a number of manufacturers and wholesalers for regulating the prices at which they sell repair parts, seat covers and other car needs. Often this is done through the franchise system. The manufacturer takes away the distributor's franchise if he sells for less than the price established by the manufacturer.

ONE OF THE MOST flagrant cases of price-fixing, which shows how sellers get together to keep up their rates, has been uncovered in the diaper-service industry in New York State. The Attorney-General charged that eight big companies not only held regular meetings to decide prices, but followed trucks of companies not in the combine to take their customers away by cutting prices—which later they raised. In some cases, the combine members even bought out the routes of the competing companies. The diaper services did not fight the state's complaint but simply agreed not to do it any more.

U.S. Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy has said that price-fixing was far more widespread than people realized. He reported that the government has investigations going on in almost every part of the country.

One of the toughest situations is in the bread business. It is a fact that bread could be priced as much as 7 cents a loaf less than it now sells for if the distribution problems of the bakers could be solved. Instead of 24 cents a pound loaf, as some brands now cost in a number of cities, bread could sell for as little as 17 cents.

But what happens is that the bakeries tend to set their prices at the level required by the highest-cost bakeries. This allows the chain stores an excellent opportunity to bring out their own brands of bread at a lower price than the advertised brands. Since the chains do not have the same distribution problems as the bakeries, such as servicing a large number of small stores, they can under-cut prices just a little and still make a satisfactory profit.

HOW CAN YOU PROTECT yourself from this widespread price-fixing? In the last analysis, the situation can only be corrected by vigorous action by the U.S. Justice Dept., the FTC and your own state authorities. Until it is, all you can do is seek out the lower-priced brands, provided they are satisfactory in quality and made under fair working conditions. For example, the fact that all the major toothpaste brands now sell for the same 83 cents for the large tube does not mean that this is a justified price at all. There are many satisfactory brands at half the price.

Most Effective Device:

Auto Seat Belt Urged To Safeguard Riders

THE AUTOMOBILE SEAT BELT is the most effective device for preventing serious injuries and deaths that has been developed in recent years, according to the labor department of the National Safety Council.

When cars crash into each other, a tree or some other object, the driver and passengers, without seat belts to hold them, fly forward until they hit something solid. They may be thrown out when a door opens and hit the ground or the pavement; or they may stay in the car and be slammed against the windshield or dashboard. The chances of being killed are five times greater when hurled out of a car than in being thrown around in the car.

A seat belt prevents a passenger from being hurled out of the car or banged around in it. Drivers and passengers who wear safety belts are 35 to 60 percent safer than are people without belts.

A seat belt has a distinct advantage in case a car catches fire or is submerged in water after an accident. Since a belt holds a driver or passenger in place in the car, the chances of being knocked unconscious and burned to death or drowned are greatly lessened. A belt can be instantaneously released by a conscious person with a flip of the hand.

Only belts meeting the standards of the Society of Automotive Engineers should be purchased. The installation also should be in accordance with SAE specifications.

THE ONLY SURE WAY to get full value from automobile safety belts is to develop the habit of fastening the belt on getting into the car, even before turning on the ignition switch. They are useless unless worn whether going a few blocks or on a long trip. It's a fact that most people are killed within 25 miles of their homes. Furthermore, belts should be worn whether driving at low or high speeds. Most fatal accidents occur at speeds under 40 miles an hour.

"I urge all union members to equip their cars with safety belts for the protection of themselves, their wives and children," states Lloyd Utter, NSC vice president for labor and safety director of the Auto Workers.

"Last year 5,000 men, women and children, many of them members of union families, would not have died in traffic accidents if they had been using a seat belt. Furthermore, many more thousands of members of union families would not have been hurt or seriously injured."

Under no circumstances are seat belts a substitute for knowing and observing traffic rules and regulations. Belts only reduce the possibility of a more serious injury or being killed, but do not prevent an accident.

From Soup to Nonsense:

The Subject Takes Pen in Hand And Writes the Book Herself

By Jane Goodsell

FOR A LONG TIME NOW I have been waiting for somebody to write a book for children on the care and feeding of parents. I can't wait any longer, and I am ready to speak a few words on the subject myself.

So stash away your bubblegum, kiddies, and lay aside your plexiglass space helmets and pay attention. I am about to explain to you the strange behavior of your elders.

Of course I am well aware that you know too much about us already. You were born with an uncanny insight into parent psychology. You know, with the sure touch of genius, the precise moment to employ the temper tantrum, the delaying action, the piteous sob and the sudden fever.

We are aware that most of us are bigger than most of you. We could probably lick you in hand-to-hand combat. But we are hampered in the struggle of youth against age by having consciences. It is like having our hands tied behind our backs.

You, you hard-boiled little characters, can employ the direct tactics of guerilla warfare. Anything goes as long as it works.

We, on the other hand, are bound by the soft rules of diplomacy. We have read the works of the Doctors Freud, Spock and Gesell, and we worry about giving you complexes. We are terrified of undermining your self-confidence, of hurting your feelings and warping your minds.

FURTHERMORE, WE are a little in awe of you. We never run when we can walk, and you never walk when you can skip, jump, hurtle through space or turn somersaults.

We are phlegmatic creatures who dote on peace and quiet. You are happiest when you are bouncing a ball, imitating a machine gun and watching Gunsmoke, all at the same time.

You think that snow is the cat's pajamas, and we whimper about traffic snarls and plugged gutters. You make us feel like sissies.

We aren't very sure of anything, but you speak with the voice of authority on all subjects. You state flatly that oatmeal stinks, that it isn't going to rain, and that you won't catch cold if you don't wear a sweater.

You should know too, my tots, that when your parents aren't thinking about you they're worrying about something else. They are bothered by feelings that people are talking about them or that they forgot to disconnect the iron. That's why we often don't notice the jet planes overhead. And why we sometimes forget to mail your letters enclosing the premium boxtop and 15 cents.

And that, my children, concludes our lesson for today. Except for one parting shot.

Someday you will find yourselves gazing into the eyes of your own first-born, eyes that look back at you with a soft, baby stare.

You'll think those eyes look innocent. Just you wait!

Canadian Unemployment Climbs to 11.3 Percent

Ottawa, Ont.—Unemployment in Canada rose to 719,000 in mid-February, 11.3 percent of the work force, the Canadian government has reported.

The number of jobless increased 26,000 over January and was 120,000 above the same period in 1960 as the nation sank deeper into its worst unemployment crisis since the Great Depression.

Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Claude Jodoin said the labor movement had warned last fall of the signs pointing to record post-war unemployment. At the time, he recalled, "we were called spreaders of gloom."

Despite optimistic statements by federal cabinet ministers, experts have warned that continued economic setbacks and bad weather make it unlikely there will be any improvement when the March report is compiled.

Asks One Overseas Agency:

Kennedy Proposes 5-Year Aid Program

Pres. John F. Kennedy, declaring that existing foreign aid programs are "bureaucratically fragmented, awkward and slow," has proposed integrating all overseas assistance programs under a single new agency.

At the same time, in a special foreign-aid message to Congress, the President called for a five-year $7.3-billion loan program. "A program based on long-range plans instead of short-run crises," he declared, "cannot be financed on a short-term basis."

The AFL-CIO last year strongly endorsed the long-range commitment approach to give greater continuity to the nation's foreign aid efforts than is possible when Congress votes on annual appropriations.

Creation of a new foreign aid agency was advocated by Kennedy in his message in which he criticized present programs on the ground that their "weaknesses have begun to undermine confidence in our effort both here and abroad."

The proposed new agency, he said, would have an administrator reporting directly to the President and the Secretary of State. It would embrace activities now covered by the Intl. Cooperation Administration, Development Loan Fund, Food-for-Peace Program and the Peace Corps.

For fiscal 1962, Kennedy told Congress, he will adhere to the $4 billion foreign aid budget proposed in January by former Pres. Eisenhower.

He urged, however, that these funds be "sharply shifted," reducing military aid from Eisenhower's $1.8 billion level to $1.6 billion, and putting economic aid at $2.4 billion with a "much greater portion" for development loans.

In asking for a five-year authorization, the Administration proposed $900 million for fiscal 1962 and $1.6 billion for each of the remaining four years. Long-term loans, Kennedy said, are the "instrument of primary emphasis" for his foreign aid program. He said they would be made at low-interest or no-interest rates, and be repayable at terms varying from short periods to as long as 50 years.

AFL-CIO Asks Clear Labels on Orange Juice

The AFL-CIO has criticized the "irritating and misleading" labels which appear on commercial orange juices and has endorsed strict labeling standards proposed by the Food and Drug Administration.

Testifying at FDA food standards hearings, Anne Draper of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research declared there is a "need for clear and appropriate labeling" to avoid consumer confusion.

Such descriptions as "freshly squeezed orange juice," "100 percent pure orange juice," "pure frozen orange juice concentrate," and the like, the federation spokesman said, do not indicate fully whether the juice has been subjected to special treatment in processing.

Miss Draper criticized what she termed the "reverse English" system of labeling by which processors suggest their product is fresh without actually making such a statement. This system, she said, forces the consumer "to look at all the other packaging labels of similar products in order to deduce, perhaps inaccurately, what is not in any one package purporting to contain orange juice."

The AFL-CIO spokesman said the FDA's proposed labeling requirements "appear to drive concretely toward a solution of the semantic confusion" resulting from present practices in the industry.

She urged, however, that the FDA reconsider its use of the word "pasteurized," pointing out that it carries the suggestion that unprocessed fresh juice might be "dangerous to health," although it refers only to a heat treatment designed to retard spoilage.

She also asked that another term be substituted for the phrase "reconstituted orange juice," on the ground that it gives the impression the juice was produced through "salvage operations" when it refers only to a concentrate to which the consumer adds water.

IUD Offers Ad on Writing Congress

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has launched a major campaign to impress trade unionists with the importance of a flood of letters to Congress urging action on labor's legislative program.

The IUD has prepared a tabloid-size page, suitable for use in most union publications, explaining how to write to Congress and why such letters are important.

The page is available both in mat form for newspapers using a letterpress format and in glossy proofs for papers which use the offset process. They are available without cost through the IUD's public relations department, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

Africa Next On Schedule For 'Briefing'

"African Forecast" will be the objective of the eighth "Briefing Session" program, with two leading authorities joining host Edward P. Morgan and news analyst John MacVane in the half-hour discussion.

Louis E. Lomax, author of the recent book, The Reluctant African, and Prof. Alphonse Castagno of Queens College will be the panelists.

Lomax, a newspaperman and prolific free-lance writer, worked on the Afro-American, the Chicago American and other publications before concentrating on African affairs. He recently returned from two months in Africa.

Castagno spent 18 months in Africa on a Ford Foundation grant. Previously he had studied the problems of colonialism at the Universities of London and Florence, and at Columbia University. He also conducts a radio series, "Africa in Transition," over WNYC, New York.

MAXIMUM ARGUMENT over minimum wages was generated at "Briefing Session" encounter between Mrs. Mary Dublin Keyserling, left, and Merryle S. Rukeyser, economists of different schools.

Wage Floor Debated On 'Briefing Session'

Whether minimum wage legislation extends essential relief to underpaid workers or imposes a "subsidy burden" on small employers for the benefit of incompetent fumblers was the focal point of a debate on "Briefing Session," the public affairs television series presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Antagonists were Mary Dublin Keyserling, Washington economist and long-time official of the National Consumers League, a supporter of wage-hour improvements, and Merryle S. Rukeyser, widely-syndicated financial columnist, who sees such legislation as "just one step in the direction of destroying a competitive society."

In accordance with "Briefing Session" practice, the discussion dealt with general principles and objectives rather than specific legislation that was being debated in Congress at the same time.

The present law is "quite out of date" because it guarantees only a "pittance wage on which no American can live" and denies even this much protection to 20 million wage earners, Mrs. Keyserling asserted.

"It is simply fantastic that in a country as rich as ours we should have to be fighting so hard to get a wage higher than this tragically low $1 an hour," she said.

Rukeyser said he, too, favors higher living standards, but "minimum wage legislation is based on a completely false diagnosis of the trouble."

"The trouble is that in certain areas, in certain groups of our work force, we have people who are handicapped either by age or illness, or by inexperience or lack of training, and who are less productive than other workers," he argued.

Lost Jobs Predicted

Applying a minimum to these people, he claimed, would force them out of jobs; and furthermore, wage-hour improvements would "'widen the gaps" in production costs between this country and foreign competitors.

These "false issues," Mrs. Keyserling retorted, can't conceal the fact that "millions of our low-income families have been left behind," and must have more purchasing-power not only for humanitarian reasons, but as a device to end the current recession and lessen the chance of others.

Rukeyser said the "inefficient, badly-trained people at the bottom" are primarily a "social problem."

"Possibly the remedy is through the food plan, or through tax exemption, or giving them some kind of government aid," he suggested; but in any event the "burden should not fall on the small and marginal employer, but on governmental and private philanthropy."

Rukeyser also urged unions and management to join "in the spirit of cooperation and harmony (to) look at the cost sheet and eliminate from it all types of waste."

Mrs. Keyserling denied that low wages were paid only to the "inefficient." In general, she charged, Rukeyser was using "the same arguments that were used in '38 and '49 and '55 against the act in the first place, and against its strengthening."

In summing up, Edward P. Morgan, host and moderator of the series, put it this way:

"I am reminded of the fact that many more years ago than I care to count, my minimum and maximum wage for mowing lawns was about 25 cents an hour; and now, baby-sitters are getting over a dollar. Whatever that means, we can talk about it later."

Two Major Awards Won By Morgan

Edward P. Morgan, ABC news commentator whose broadcasts are sponsored by the AFL-CIO, has been named winner of two major awards in the communications field.

A five-judge panel selected Morgan for the Alfred I. duPont Radio & Television Award and the Headliners Club of Atlantic City has chosen him for its annual award for "consistently outstanding network radio newscasting."

The duPont award—a plaque and a $1,000 check—was presented to Morgan at a dinner in Washington, D. C. He was cited for "the soundness and thoroughness of his reporting, for his integrity in interpreting the facts as he sees them, and for his willingness to be forthright when he feels that the urgency of an issue requires it."

The board of judges, headed by Fred C. Cole, president of Washington & Lee University, said Morgan "represents the best tradition of vigorous commentary at a time when the personal commentator in broadcasting has often yielded to other forms of reporting . . . and when voices in public debate are often muted by considerations irrelevant to responsible personal judgment and integrity."

The Headliner Award will be presented at Atlantic City on Apr. 8, at a program honoring the nation's outstanding newspaper writers and radio and television newscasters.

Labor Groups Start 89 Credit Unions

Madison, Wis.—Labor groups organized 89 new credit unions to serve a total of 98,964 members last year, the Credit Union National Association has reported. That makes 1,248 such groups serving labor organizations exclusively.

Labor groups formed credit unions in 30 states, including 12 in California, 10 in Illinois, and eight in Ohio. Among unions, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers led with 16 new credit unions.

U.S. Educational TV Grants Urged by Labor

Organized labor has expressed its "strong support" of federal grants for the expansion of the nation's educational television facilities because "commercial channels are loaded with gunslingers, private eyes and soap operas."

While the "prime force" in educational television must come from local groups, Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation declared in a letter to Rep. Morgan Moulder (D-Mo.), chairman of a House Interstate Commerce subcommittee, "federal grants . . . are an essential prerequisite to any real expansion" for educational TV.

A bill providing $51 million in federal grants for educational television has passed the Senate by a vote of 67 to 13. It would authorize up to $1 million in aid to each state and the District of Columbia for equipment for such stations. At least two differing measures are pending in the House.

The AFL-CIO endorsed the principle of federal aid without specifying a choice of method.

Could Sharpen Skills

Biemiller pointed out to the House subcommittee that educational television could play an important role in sharpening the skills of all Americans in political science, sociology and literature and in helping the public to learn all of the issues facing the government.

The value of educational TV has been proved "in those areas fortunate enough to have stations in operation," Biemiller said.

"Its usefulness has been established as a tool in public elementary and secondary school classrooms and as an effective implement for adult education during the evening hours," he added.

During the Senate debate before passage of the educational television bill, Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), chief sponsor of the measure, pointed out that the Federal Communications Commission had allocated 264 TV channels for educational purposes but that so far only 54 of these have been used.

Netherlands Gives ILO Fund $122,000

Geneva—The government of the Netherlands has announced it will contribute $122,000 to the endowment fund of the Intl. Labor Organization's new Intl. Institute for Labor Studies.

SOON-TO-BE-ABANDONED Norge refrigerator plant at Muskegon, Mich., is shown above. Also to be abandoned are 1,400 union members with a total of 21,043 years of service.

Democrats Set Moves To Salvage Wage Bill

more restricted measure, the Kitchin-Ayres substitute.

They beat the Albert compromise on a 186-185 vote, with no rollcall and no parliamentary method of forcing one.

Then, openly seeking support from House members who basically oppose "the philosophy" of any federal minimum wage law, the coalition pushed through the Kitchin-Ayres substitute on a nonrecord 206-162 vote and confirmed it on a 216-203 rollcall.

The Kitchin-Ayres substitute limits the increase in the minimum wage to $1.15. If offers coverage for only 1.4 million workers now unprotected instead of the 3.8 million of the Albert bill. It embodies a highly restrictive definition of interstate commerce for minimum wage law purposes.

The wage bill defeat was the first suffered by the Kennedy Administration in either branch of Congress. It pointed up, however, the razor-thin margins which the White House must take into account in taking its domestic programs to the House.

Experienced observers listed significant factors in the battle:

● The Republican membership dominated by Halleck was under strict discipline. After a party caucus, only four to six GOP members broke away and supported the Albert compromise.

● The lineup of southern Democrats in the coalition was dented but not broken. An estimated 25 southern Democrats voted with the Administration and some abstained. Dozens of others voted against Kennedy and the Albert compromise.

● The defection of northern anticipated votes was decisive. Administration spokesmen say several from northern states stood in the corridors or sat in their offices when the vote was called. As many as 20 members may have been involved in the "sit-out" tactic.

Heavy pressure was exerted by retailers and other employer lobbyists against wage protection for their employes.

The minimum wage vote confirmed early analysis suggesting that the 87th Congress, with 22 fewer northern Democrats in the House than the 86th, would confront the Kennedy Administration with a serious battle on liberal domestic proposals.

The Senate in recent years has generally been more friendly to liberal economic legislation. The nature of any minimum wage bill given Senate approval was expected to influence an agreed compromise worked out in House-Senate conference committee.

Report Spotlights Plight Of Migrant Workers

New York—"The average hired farm worker can expect to earn the lowest wage in the entire American economy. His annual earnings will be less than $900. He can expect to be unemployed about half the year . . ."

This stark summary of the expectations of two million seasonal and migrant farm workers is part of the annual report of the National Sharecroppers Fund which for 20 years has sought to prick the nation's conscience and spur legislation to protect farm workers.

The report does however, point to several signs of progress including gains resulting from the AFL-CIO farm worker organizing drive in California and growing public awareness of the plight of migrant workers.

During 1960, Exec. Sec. Fay Bennett reported, "millions of Americans received their first knowledge of the conditions of farm labor" from the CBS television documentary "Harvest of Shame."

While the nationwide average wages for farm workers showed only "a barely perceptible increase" over the previous year, "impressive headway in raising the wages of farm workers was made in California last year as a result of the work of the Agricultural Workers Organizing committee, AFL-CIO."

The Sharecroppers Fund noted: "Higher wages for workers throughout entire crop areas where AWOC activities were centered were won with a minimum of labor disputes and crop losses. Crop losses that did occur took place because a few growers adamantly refused to relinquish their arbitrary control over wages and conditions and submit these issues to collective bargaining."

On the debit side, the report pointed to evictions and threatened evictions of Negro sharecroppers and tenant farmers in two Tennessee counties shortly after they had asserted their right to vote.

AIW Members Hit Hard:

Norge to Abandon Muskegon; 1,400 Workers Left Jobless

Muskegon, Mich.—This industrial city, already hard-hit by unemployment, is reeling from what the Allied Industrial Workers charge is a below-the-belt blow from the Borg Warner Corp. and "industrial piracy" on the part of a southern community.

Early this year Borg Warner officials admitted, after repeated denials, that the company plans to close its Norge refrigerator plant here and move into a new factory built for it at Greenwood, Ark., and financed by a tax-exempt bond issue, of which the company itself bought a large share. The move will take place this summer.

Left behind in the move will be 1,400 Norge production workers who have invested a total of 21,043 years of their lives in the service of the company.

While their union—Local 404 of the AIW—is trying to negotiate a settlement on pensions, severance pay and transfer rights, the outlook is bleak for those who will be stranded in Muskegon.

More than three-fifths of the production workers are over 40 years of age. There are 306 between the ages of 50 and 60, and 95 who are between 60 and 65.

There are already long lines of jobless at the unemployment compensation centers and among those who have exhausted jobless benefits there are growing lines at the county welfare office and at surplus food distribution points. For the older workers especially, the future appears grim.

No Consultation

There was no consultation with the union, no negotiations with the city officials of Muskegon by the company. Local 404 Pres. Ray Everett sums up the feeling when he says:

"What really gets me is the fact that this company denied up and down that they had any intention of moving.

"They never asked us to modify a single word in our contract so as to improve their competitive position, if that's what they needed to stay in business."

Greenwood, on the outskirts of Fort Smith, Ark., captured the plant with the help of an Arkansas law enacted last year which permits local communities to issue bonds for the construction of plants to attract new industries.

AIW officials see in the move a familiar pattern of lower wages and, with a new work force without years of seniority, sizable savings on vacations and pensions.

"All of these 'savings' will leave a big hole in the economy of Muskegon and represent a step backward for the nation's economy as a whole," the union declared, adding: "Countless thousands of workers . . . from New England to Minnesota can testify that industrial piracy is a real and threatening fact today."

AIW Pres. Carl Griepentrog has voiced his concern at conditions which enable companies to "escape their collective bargaining and tax responsibilities." In a letter to midwestern congressmen, he wrote:

Griepentrog Protests

"Our union believes that there must be jobs at good rates of pay for all Americans if our economy grows at a higher rate during the next decade.

"We do not believe that it is good public policy to allow large corporations to pick up and leave, abandoning hundreds of workers of advanced ages who will add problems to an area already overburdened with a high rate of unemployment."

Bliss, Miller Lead Race for Morton's Post

Ray Bliss, Republican state chairman in Ohio, and Rep. William Miller (R-N. Y.), are leading contenders to succeed Sen. Thruston B. Morton (R-Ky.) as chairman of the Republican National Committee.

The committee is expected to meet about June 1 to select its new chairman. Morton, who has headed the committee for the past two years, announced plans to leave the GOP committee post following the Democratic presidential victory last November. His own term in the Senate expires at the end of next year and he must seek reelection.

Bliss, veteran GOP leader in Ohio, helped swing that state to Vice Pres. Nixon in the presidential race. Two years earlier, Democrats scored almost a clean sweep in the state because of what Bliss said was the presence of the "right-to-work" issue on the ballot.

Miller, now serving his sixth term in Congress, has piled up a record of 29 "wrong" and only 5 "right" votes, according to the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. In the 86th Congress he voted for the Landrum-Griffin Act and against area redevelopment, housing, education and minimum wage legislation.

House Passes Kennedy Depressed Areas Bill

Committee approved a scaled-down version of Kennedy's proposals for higher social security benefits. By a vote of 22 to 2 it favored a 10 per cent hike in cash benefits for widows, instead of the 13.3 per cent boost urged by the President; a hike in minimum benefits from $33 to $40, instead of the $43 Kennedy recommended; and optional retirement, with reduced benefits, for men at age 62.

● Kennedy sent Congress "urgent" proposals for a $650 million increase in defense spending and disclosed plans to arm the nation with more than 1,300 ballistic missiles by 1965. He called for assembly-line construction of Polaris missile submarines, charted expanded production of intercontinental missiles and declared that the U.S. must be strong enough so that if it received a surprise nuclear attack, it could still retaliate "with devastating power."

● The President revised former Pres. Eisenhower's fiscal 1962 budget, adding $3.2 billion to the previous GOP estimates of $80.9 billion. The biggest increases were for school aid, housing and farm programs, plus a 10 percent hike in the space program.

At the same time, Kennedy forecast a $2 billion budget deficit for the current fiscal year which ends June 30 because of declining tax revenues resulting from the recession. A year ago, Eisenhower had predicted a $4.2 billion budget surplus; had revised it downward to a surplus of $1.1 billion by August; and, in his message just before leaving office, told Congress that lower tax revenues had caused the expected surplus to shrink to less than $80 million.

The depressed areas bill passed by the House differed in one major respect from a similar measure which the Senate approved earlier. It called for annual congressional review of loans and grants, while the Senate defeated a similar provision in favor of long-range financing. The bills will go to a House-Senate conference to adjust this difference.

The area redevelopment bill provides $200 million in long-term, low-interest-bearing loans to industrial communities qualifying under a formula based on unemployment averages; $100 million to rural depressed areas; and $94 million for retraining of workers in new skills.

Administration of the program will be handled under the Commerce Dept.

The measure is virtually the same as liberal area redevelopment bills which Eisenhower vetoed in 1958 and 1960.

Religion-Labor Group Set Up

Roanoke, Va.—A Religion and Labor Fellowship dinner sponsored by the Roanoke AFL-CIO was attended by 51 clergymen and labor representatives who have organized a program committee for future meetings.

Named to the committee were Protestant, Catholic and Jewish leaders and these labor representatives: Pres. John R. MacKenzie of the labor council; Frank Mundy, Sheet Metal Workers; Harvey Hafter, Ladies' Garment Workers; and C. E. Reynolds, Steelworkers.

Honor Paid To Memory Of Furuseth

New York—The memory of Andrew Furuseth, who lobbied in Congress for nearly half a century in behalf of legislation safeguarding the rights of seamen, was honored recently on the 107th anniversary of his birth.

Memorial services were held in the Seaman's Church Institute in New York and on a ferry plying between the Battery and Staten Island, which halted off Greenville long enough to permit members of the Friends of Andrew Furuseth Legislative Association to drop a wreath on the surface of the water.

Furuseth, president of the former Intl. Seamen's Union and secretary of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, also was honored at a memorial service in the Great Theater at Sailors Snug Harbor, Staten Island.

A native of Norway who came to this country in 1880 and died in 1938, Furuseth was active in pushing a law through Congess on the eve of World War I directing Woodrow Wilson, then President. to abrogate all treaties with foreign nations which had attempted to impose their laws on merchant seamen aboard vessels flying their flags while the ships were in U.S. ports.

AFL-CIO Tells House:

U.S. Program Urged In Automation Crisis

The AFL-CIO has called on the federal government to make up for "wasted years" of inaction by moving "quickly and positively" to help the nation's economy adjust to automation and ease the impact of fast-growing technological unemployment.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Stanley Ruttenberg told a House Labor subcommittee that the price of continued government inaction would be recurring recessions, mounting unemployment, poverty-stricken communities and possible loss of confidence in the American economy, both at home and abroad.

He proposed to the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), a far-reaching program of government studies, planning, legislation and spending to supplement programs developed through collective bargaining and labor-management conferences.

The "greatest responsibility" rests on the federal government, Ruttenberg said, "since solutions for the impact of radical technological change are beyond the best efforts of the affected workers, companies and communities."

Earlier the Holland unit heard from various union leaders firsthand accounts of the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs in industry and offices, with the end not nearly in sight.

Ruttenberg called for the government to begin immediately to plan for the impact of technological developments "that are now on the drawing boards" in terms of the probable effect on employment and on skill requirements.

Planning Ahead Essential

This, he said, is essential for planning ahead "in terms of education, training and retraining, vocational guidance and counseling and labor-management efforts."

The AFL-CIO spokesman called for transformation of the U.S. Employment Service into "a national placement agency." At present, he pointed out, "the Employment Service offices are run by the states and much of their attention is concentrated on the operation of the unemployment insurance system. Their job placement efforts are extremely limited."

Ruttenberg proposed that comprehensive lists of job vacancies be developed "not only for the local labor market, but nationally as well."

"The Employment Service should be capable of providing counseling service for displaced workers and for young people who are entering the job markets—both in aiding people who seek guidance in vocational and technical training and in finding jobs for job-seekers," he said.

Ruttenberg emphasized the need for stepped-up vocational and retraining programs—encouraged by federal grants-in-aid and unemployment benefits during periods of retraining.

He emphasized, however, that "in a period of slow economic growth and high levels of unemployment, the practical question is: retraining for what?"

Only a more rapid rate of economic growth can provide alternative job opportunities for which displaced workers can be retrained, Ruttenberg pointed out.

Rapid introduction of automation during the seven years of slow economic growth from 1953 to 1960 resulted in the elimination of more than 3 million jobs, he said, of which 1.5 million were in manufacturing, 1 million in farming, 400,000 on the railroads and 200,000 in mining.

The special problems of older workers must be met through a combination of federal leadership and joint labor-management cooperation, the AFL-CIO spokesman said.

Special efforts should be made to "re-engineer jobs in order to maintain employment opportunities for older workers who are physically and mentally capable of working," he added.

Through amendment of the Social Security Act and changes in pension programs through collective bargaining, workers should have the opportunity to retire at an early age, Ruttenberg said. But he emphasized that early retirement plans should be optional. "Any effort to cast older workers out of their jobs simply on the basis of age would run counter to the achievements of science," he said.

Ruttenberg called for "an open mind" and "flexibility" on the issue of how rapidly the workweek should be reduced.

"If economic growth fails to pick up substantially and unemployment remains at high levels, standard working hours should be reduced at a rapid rate, without a cut of take-home pay, in order to spread employment opportunities," he said.

"If the rate of economic growth will pick up rapidly and bring about a much lower unemployment level than in recent years, the pace of reducing hours should be relatively slow."

The test, he said, "should be practical economic conditions, rather than doctrinaire views."

Chicago Federation Aids Educational TV

Chicago—The Chicago Federation of Labor and WCFL, its radio station, have made a $2,000 contribution to WTTW, educational television station which has asked the public to contribute about one-third of its 1961-1962 operating budget of $896,000.

STAGE ON WHEELS sponsored by New York City's organized fashion industries and the Ladies' Garment Workers featured stars from seven Broadway hits at the inauguration of a coast-to-coast dress-up-for-Easter "Fashion Goes to Town" campaign.

Kennedy Asks $3 Billion Housing Bill To Fight Slums, Spur Home Building

not only calls for extension of a number of previously approved programs but also "proposes vigorous new lines of action." These include greater assistance for housing for the elderly, more liberal financial aid for rebuilding and remodeling homes, and greater incentives to encourage use of new materials and methods to reduce housing costs.

Although the bill calls for $3.2 billion in expenditures, it would add only about $300 million to the $728 million in housing outlays budgeted by former Pres. Eisenhower for fiscal 1962. The rest of the money—most of it in direct Treasury outlays rather than in annual appropriations—would be spent over a 40-year period.

The Administration bill called for:

- $2.5 billion over the next four years in grants for slum clearance and urban renewal projects, plus $80 million for urban planning assistance over the same period. In both cases, the federal government's grants would constitute two-thirds of the total cost of projects.
- Authorization for the Public Housing Administrator to contract for the approximately 100,000 additional dwelling units originally contemplated in the Housing Act of 1949.
- Increasing from $50 million to $100 million the authorization for direct loans to sponsors of housing projects for the elderly, plus broadening of the existing law to include public bodies or agencies as well as non-profit corporations.
- An additional $50 million for loans to communities for such public facilities as water, sewer, highway and transit facilities. This would raise the loan authorization level for such projects to $200 million.
- $45 million for a five-year extension of the farm housing program.
- A two-year experiment in making FHA-insured 40-year no-down-payment mortgages available to families of modest incomes. The present general mortgage ceiling of $9,000 on a one-family house would be retained, but the ceiling allowed in high-cost areas would be raised from $12,000 to $15,000.
- A new program of low-interest FHA loans for rental and cooperative housing projects for families earning too much to qualify for low-rent public housing.
- New authority for FHA to insure loans of up to $10,000 for basic structural improvements or additions to houses becoming dilapidated or obsolete, with repayment at no higher than 6 percent over a 25-year period.

Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), chairman of the Senate Housing subcommittee and sponsor in the past of of liberal housing measures, said he was "impressed" with the Administration proposals and pledged that he would start hearings Apr. 4 on Kennedy's program. Sparkman indicated Senate passage might be expected about Apr. 1.

In his letters to Johnson and Rayburn, Kennedy declared:

"I fully believe the enactment of these measures will start us once again toward providing decent housing for all Americans and halting the blanket of blight which has been spreading over our cities."

Mental Health Programs Urged

New York—Joint labor-management efforts to establish industrial mental health programs for employes could lead to better industrial relations, stable employment and higher productivity, Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, has declared.

Speaking at the 38th annual meeting of the American Orthopsychiatric Association here, the CSA director said a sound program of mental health in industry must depend on union-management sponsorship "outside the controversial arena of collective bargaining."

Perlis said that in addition to being helpful to the individuals involved, a mental health program could help create "an atmosphere of civility so that collective bargaining sessions, even on a national and regional basis, may proceed with greater understanding."

Conway Sworn In As Housing Deputy

Jack T. Conway, administrative assistant to Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther for the past 15 years, has been sworn in as deputy administrator of the Housing & Home Financing Agency.

The oath of office was given by Housing Administrator Robert C. Weaver.

How Automation Strikes You Depends on Where You Stand

Witnesses testifying before the Holland subcommittee on the link between automation and unemployment included three union officers and a big business executive. Here are some of the things they said:

HOWARD COUGHLIN, president of the Office Employes: During the year 1961, an estimated 10,000 computers will be installed in business offices employing 1.4 million clerical workers and result in the elimination of 350,000 of these jobs.

"We are continuing to train students at our high schools and business colleges for occupations which will cease to exist in the next five years."

H. C. CROTTY, president of the Maintenance of Way Employes: Largely as a result of mechanization, the number of workers employed on railroad road maintenance has decreased 59.4 percent between 1946 and 1960.

"We in the brotherhoods realize there will be technological changes. We have cooperated for the good of the industry. But unfortunately we have not shared in the fruits of technological progress."

PATRICK E. GORMAN, secretary-treasurer of the Meat Cutters: The number of jobs in the industry has been declining by 7,000 a year in the last five years while production has increased. "This is only the beginning," he said, describing machines ready for installation which would displace entire departments of workers.

A study undertaken by a joint labor-management committee found that of 2,411 workers who lost their jobs when Armour closed three plants, 55 percent were still unemployed one year later. Particularly for older workers, women and workers facing color bars, "these automation severances had been close to economic death sentences."

R. CONRAD COOPER, executive vice president of U.S. Steel Corp.: Objecting that government action to stem technological unemployment might be so costly that it would hinder industrial expansion, he said: "Let us not lose sight of the fact that probably the most powerful remedial force we have lies in the actions which the affected individual himself contrives and carries out."

Unemployment Hits Two-Thirds of Cities

stantial unemployment, 71 large cities were listed in Group D, with between 6 and 9 percent of the work force idle, 17 were in Group E, with joblessness between 9 and 12 percent, and 13 were in Group F, with unemployment of 12 percent or more.

The 25 major areas which moved into Group D for the first time are: Fresno, San Francisco-Oakland, San Jose and Stockton, Calif.; New Haven, Conn.; Wilmington, Del.; Miami and Tampa-St. Petersburg, Fla.; Chicago and Rockford, Ill.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Wichita, Kan.; New Orleans, La.; Kalamazoo, Lansing and Saginaw, Mich.; Manchester, N. H.; Syracuse, N. Y.; Cincinnati and Dayton, O.; Tulsa, Okla.; Seattle, Wash.; Kenosha, Milwaukee and Racine, Wis.

Waterbury, Conn., and Battle Creek, Mich., moved from Group D to E.

Seven major centers moved into the over-12-percent-unemployed Group F. They were South Bend, Ind.; Detroit, Mich.; Lorain-Elyria and Youngstown-Warren, O.; Erie and Scranton, Pa., all formerly in Group E, and Flint, Mich., which fell two categories from Group D.

108 'Depressed' Areas

Not a single major area was listed in Group A or B, denoting areas of labor shortages or low unemployment. The only four cities which had been in Group B dropped to Group C with "moderate" unemployment ranging from 3 to 5.9 percent.

The Labor Dept. listed 20 major areas and 88 smaller areas in the "depressed area" category of substantial and persistent labor surplus, where unemployment in most cases has averaged at least 50 percent above the national average for at least three of the last four years.

Record Benefits Paid

At the same time the department reported that the number of persons receiving unemployment benefits during the week ended Mar. 11 was "a record high for this time of year," despite a drop of 89,300 from the previous week's level.

The insured unemployment rate of 8 percent of the covered work force compares with a 5.8 percent rate a year ago.

For the week ended Mar. 18, the number of initial claims filed, signifying new unemployment, rose 30,100 to a total of 413,400 for the week. Large-scale layoffs in the auto industry were cited as the chief factor in the increase of new claims.

The Labor Dept. said the biggest pickup in employment this spring is expected in the construction industry, where a seasonal increase is normal, but noted that home-building activity continues to lag.

Publicly financed building will contribute heavily to the upturn, the department predicted.

Machinery in Motion For Jobless Benefits

provides extended aid for some 60,000 jobless workers protected by the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Under this measure railroad workers can receive up to 13 weeks of added benefits.

The first states to sign agreements with Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg in ceremonies at the Labor Dept. were Arkansas, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Vermont and Wyoming.

Three to 13 Weeks

As enacted by Congress, the program calls for paying jobless benefits for a period half again as long as present state programs allow. Thus TUC benefits will be paid for periods ranging from as little as three weeks in "right-to-work" Indiana to a maximum of 13 additional weeks in most heavily industrialized states. In no case, however, can an unemployed worker draw the combination of federal-state aid for more than 39 weeks.

The speed with which the program is being put into effect stems from the fact that benefits will be paid entirely out of federal funds, with states agreeing merely to act as agents of the federal government in making disbursements.

This contrasts sharply with the TUC program enacted in 1958 during the Eisenhower Administartion, when states had the option of joining the program. Since the federal funds were only "advances" under the 1958 act, and states had to agree to repay them, many states required legislative action to amend existing programs.

As a result only 15 states and the District of Columbia accepted the advances, while six other states dipped into their own surpluses for extended benefits.

Program Differed

The Kennedy Administration's TUC program differs markedly from the Eisenhower plan in another major respect: the method of financing.

The 1958 law placed the financial burden directly on employers in participating states, so that unemployment compensation funds in states hardest hit by joblessness were drained still further by the extended aid.

The present law, however, finances the emergency benefits through a temporary four-tenths of 1 percent increase in payroll taxes paid by all employers. It establishes a new principle of equalizing the cost on the doctrine that the recession is national, rather than local, both in origin and in scope.

GM Agrees to Pay Additional SUB

Detroit—The Auto Workers have announced the signing of an agreement with General Motors Corp. making added supplemental unemployment benefits payable to laid-off workers during the period of the new temporary unemployment compensation law.

UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock said that under the GM memorandum of agreement, jobless union members would thus be entitled to a maximum of 39 weeks of SUB benefits—the same ceiling established under the TUC law—instead of the previous maximum of 26 weeks.

The union said efforts were being made to win similar agreements with Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp.

Funds Sought for BLS Study of Automation

The Kennedy Administration has asked Congress to appropriate funds for major new studies by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Statistics on the impact of automation and foreign trade on employment.

BLS Commissioner Ewan Clague outlined the proposed studies to a Senate Appropriations subcommittee. To carry out these and other new projects in addition to the bureau's continuing workload, Clague asked for a $12.17 million appropriation, approximately $1 million more than the current budget and some $325,000 higher than the amount proposed in the Eisenhower Administration's proposed 1962 budget.

Clague said the first phase of the automation study "will cover selected industries in which technological change seems to be producing declines in employment." The second phase, he said, will be "an extensive investigation of the impact of technological changes on individual workers."

Among the questions the study proposes to answer, Clague said, is what has happened to employes, including older workers and skilled workers, who have been displaced by automation.

In the foreign trade area, Clague declared, more information is needed than is now available "on the employment created by exports and the unemployment created by imports." Detailed information is needed, he said, to help determine U.S. policy, to furnish information for Congress and to advise the President "on the effect of tariff modification on domestic employment."

Other projects planned by the bureau, Clague indicated, include "development of more meaningful information on the characteristics of the unemployed," collection of data on employment of scientific, engineering and technical workers, improved statistics on labor turnover, continued annual surveys of salaries in private industry for comparison with salaries of federal employes in these fields, and analysis of recent collective bargaining contracts and the publication of a series of bulletins on this subject.

'Scab' Curb Bill Signed In Maryland

Annapolis, Md.—Maryland Gov. J. Millard Tawes (D) has signed a labor-backed bill barring the use of professional strikebreakers in any labor dispute.

The new statute makes it unlawful "for any person who customarily and repeatedly offers himself for employment in place of employes involved in a strike" to take the place of a striking worker or to seek employment in a struck establishment.

Maryland is the fifth state to restrict the use of strikebreakers and the third to act this year. The others, in order of passage, are Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Washington.

The newspaper and printing trade unions, which have been leading the drive for enactment of "citizens' job protection bills," expect favorable action in several other states after legislatures return from Easter recesses.

DiSalle Kills GOP Plan on Jobless Pay

Columbus, O.—Ohio Gov. Michael V. DiSalle (D) has vetoed a Republican-sponsored unemployment compensation bill which the State AFL-CIO charged would have made it more difficult for workers to qualify for full jobless benefits.

The bill coupled a 13-week extension of benefits when statewide unemployment exceeds 6 percent with a series of eligibility restrictions which labor said would have reduced benefits for the lowest-paid workers, increased the penalty for workers who quit their jobs, deducted severance pay from jobless benefits and barred payments during enforced "vacations" resulting from plant shutdowns.

Unemployed Ohio workers will receive extended benefits under the federal temporary unemployment compensation law "without gimmicks," the State AFL-CIO declared in applauding the governor's veto.

DiSalle accused the Republican-controlled legislature and the "Scrooge-like" business lobbies of trying to "take advantage of the misery of the people" and demanding "a pound of flesh" from Ohio's unemployed in exchange for additional weeks of compensation.

The GOP bill, he said, was not conceived "for the purpose of helping, but for the purpose of gaining an unfair advantage as a result of difficult conditions."

W. W. Stone Named UAW Aircraft Aide

Detroit—Wise W. Stone, staff representative in the Auto Workers' national aircraft department since 1948, has been named assistant director by UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, head of the department.

Labor Seeks Surplus Food Program Role

Broadening of the surplus food program to permit nonprofit agencies, including unions, to handle distribution when state and local governments fail to assume their full obligation has been urged on the Kennedy Administration by Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne.

Beirne, an AFL-CIO vice president and chairman of the Community Services Committee, made his suggestion in letters to Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Abraham A. Ribicoff and Agriculture Sec. Orville L. Freeman.

The AFL-CIO, Beirne declared, is concerned "not only with basic economic policy and legislative action to prevent and cure mass unemployment but also with the need for vigorous measures to help meet the needs of the unemployed."

Terming the surplus food program "the last resort against hunger and starvation," the CWA president emphasized that the distribution of food by the government should "never be considered a substitute for a sound public assistance program," but instead should be regarded as a "supplementary measure."

Joblessness at 6.9 Percent, Hits Postwar March Record

Warning Issued on Long-Term Danger

By Robert B. Cooney

Unemployment fell less than seasonally between February and March to a total of 5.5 million, the government reported as a spokesman warned that even with an economic upturn unemployment will be "a serious problem for many months to come."

The March jobless total was a 20-year high for the month.

The key seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment edged upward by 0.1 percent to 6.9 percent for March, also a postwar record rate for the month. The previous March high was 6.7 percent in 1958, when 5.2 million were jobless.

"The challenge of the next year is to put everybody to work" who wants to work, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg told a press conference later in announcing the Administration's objective of creating 7.3 million new jobs.

"The job outlook is of great concern to the Administration," Goldberg stressed repeatedly. He said the goal of reducing unemployment to a 4 percent level would require a boost of $60 billion or over 10 percent in the nation's output if there are to be jobs for the current jobless, the net increase in the labor force, those on part-time and those whose work suffers the impact of automation and increasing productivity.

Dr. Seymour Wolfbein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, told reporters the job summary for March underscores what Pres. Kennedy, Goldberg and others have been saying—that high job levels "will not resolve the unemployment problem and we will have a serious problem for many months to come."

States Sign TUC Plan Agreements

Nationwide coverage for the long-term jobless under the federal program of temporary unemployment compensation benefits was assured as 49 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico agreed to participate in the plan.

All but a handful of the 46 million workers covered by the federal-state jobless insurance program live in those states which have submitted signed agreements to the Labor Dept. to pay the extended TUC aid, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg declared.

Only Mississippi and the Virgin Islands still have not completed arrangements to take part in the program, Goldberg said. He added that agreements from these states to pay added benefits, under the first anti-recession measure of the Kennedy Administration to be enacted by Con-

Easter Recess Ends:

Congress Gets Set For New Vote Tests

By Gene Zack

The 87th Congress prepared for a finish fight on minimum wage legislation and passage of social security improvements—two of the five measures on Pres. John F. Kennedy's anti-recession priority list—as congressmen trooped back to the nation's capital after the Easter recess.

After three months of operation, Congress could point to two other anti-recession measures: temporary unemployment compensation benefits and separate House and Senate bills on area redevelopment.

The fifth priority measure—extension of aid to dependent children to cover families of jobless workers—has been passed by the House and is now awaiting action by the Senate Finance Committee.

In addition, Congress has put its stamp of approval on Administration requests for participation in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, increased support prices on feed grains, extension of the sugar import quota law, and authorization to the President to reorganize executive agencies.

These actions came after procedural battles which stalled routine organization in the opening days of the session. The House settled its organizational fight by voting 217 to 212 to enlarge the Rules Committee to break a 23-year blockade of liberal legislation by a conservative Republican - southern Democratic coalition. The Senate organized after voting, by a 50-46 margin, to defer action on possible rules changes making it easier to shut off filibusters.

Kohler Strike Marks Seventh Anniversary

Seven years after the start of the Auto Workers strike at the Kohler Co. in Sheboygan, Wis., workers inched a step closer to final settlement of a National Labor Relations Board decision holding the company guilty of unfair labor practices.

The Supreme Court on Apr. 3 turned down the company's plea that adjudication of its attack on the NLRB decision be transferred from the District of Columbia appeals court to another appellate court circuit in Chicago. The walkout began Apr. 5, 1954.

Some of the fired strikers have been rehired since the labor board decision. The UAW has filed exceptions to parts of the ruling.

Union Marks Triangle Fire Anniversary

New York—Fifty years after the Triangle Shirtwaist Co. fire, unions still are battling delays in legislation to protect workers from death and injury.

That note was sounded by Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers at a memorial service attended by more than a dozen survivors of the tragic fire in which 146 garment workers died in 1911.

As a fire bell tolled slowly and a Fire Dept. honor guard of 50 men stood at attention, four veterans of the long fight for industrial safety placed a wreath at the corner of the building where workers were trapped in a garment loft at Greene St. and Washington Pl.—Frances Perkins, former secretary of labor; Rose Schneiderman, Pauline Newman, and Dubinsky.

In a talk preceding the ceremony, Dubinsky lashed out at legislators who had rushed through passage of a bill delaying the effective date of new industrial fire hazard regulations by as much as one year.

The ILGWU publication Justice called the bill a "firetrap" measure and charged that its passage was due to the direct intervention of State Industrial Commissioner Martin Catherwood.

Dubinsky recommended, and the meeting agreed, that a message of protest be sent to Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) urging him to veto the bill.

Kansas 'Work' Forces Beaten on Ripper Bill

Topeka, Kan.—Kansas anti-labor forces seeking to "put teeth into" the state's constitutional ban on union shop agreements have won a court victory but suffered a legislative setback.

The Kansas Supreme Court, overturning a lower court decision, has ruled that an agency shop agreement requiring non-members to pay a service fee to the union which bargains for them violates the state's so-called "right-to-work" amendment.

On the legislative front, however, a "ripper" bill which would have provided mandatory jail sentences and triple civil damages in cases involving either a union shop or agency shop agreement died on the House calendar without coming to a vote.

The bill, which had been approved by the GOP-controlled House Labor Committee, also would have banned so-called "mass picketing." It would have set a minimum penalty of one year in prison for use of "force" or "threats" to keep strikebreakers from crossing a picket line, and would have made it unlawful for strikers to use "abusive or insulting language" when addressing strikebreakers or speaking of them within their hearing.

Other provisions of the bill, strongly supported by the "Kansans for the 'Right-to-Work'" organization, would have opened the door to harassment lawsuits against unions, required the licensing of business agents, compelled a state-conducted vote among all workers at least 15 days before a union

4,500 in SIU Benefit:

Seafarers on Lakes Gain Welfare Plan

Detroit—A comprehensive health and welfare plan covering 4,500 sailors in the fleets of 22 Great Lakes shipping companies is featured among the new contract provisions ratified by members of the Seafarers in six Great Lakes ports.

The plan, administered by three trustees from the SIU and three from shipping lines, is financed by an employer contribution of 95 cents per day for each unlicensed crewman in the 22 fleets. Payment into the fund and benefits to the seamen and their dependents began on Apr. 1.

Major features of the new plan include a $4,000 death benefit, hospitalization for a maximum of 120 days, payment of extra charges for hospital services and medicines up to $200, a $300 surgical benefit and a $56 weekly sickness and accident benefit for a maximum of 26 weeks.

Al Tanner, SIU vice president in charge of the Great Lakes District, hailed the plan as "a notable and outstanding contribution to the welfare and security of SIU members and their families."

Pay Boosted Also

The contract negotiations, which began in December, also produced an hourly wage increase of 6 cents for rated men and 4 cents for unrated men retroactive to Mar. 1. New pay rates now range from $1.71 in the lowest job classifications to $2.44 in the highest.

A new job security feature won in bargaining provides that when a vessel goes out of service during the shipping season, the crew will be reassigned to other vessels within that fleet on the basis of their seniority.

2,800 Out in Brooklyn Gas Pact Dispute

Brooklyn—More than 2,800 members of the Transport Workers have struck the Brooklyn Union Gas Co. for wage increases, increased company contributions to medical-hospital plan costs, and other contract improvements.

As negotiations were resumed at the request of Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D), TWU Local 101 extended its picket lines to the company's Staten Island plant, to 20 meter repair shops and to banks where company customers have been paying their gas bills.

The union and management broke off contract talks Mar. 29 and the strike started Apr. 1. Wagner asked both parties to meet in his office after the strike started and got resumption of negotiations.

At the meeting, union spokesmen objected to the failure of company Pres. John E. Heyke to attend.

After a meeting of the strikers in Brooklyn Borough Hall, Local 101 began distribution of 500,000 leaflets in Brooklyn, Queens and Staten Island urging consumers to delay paying gas bills until the strike is settled and meters are read by union meter-readers.

Labor Board Lays Down Rule In Contested Subcontracting Case

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that a business firm can end all jobs involved in a bargaining unit without negotiation with the union and contract out the work previously done by its own workers, provided the decision is made for "economic rather than discriminatory" reasons.

The board, in a 3-1 decision, ruled that such an action by Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. of Emeryville, Calif., was not an unfair labor practice, though employes were notified only four days before the expiration of the old contract and at a time when Steelworkers Local 1304 was unsuccessfully seeking negotiations on a new agreement.

In a dissent, NLRB Member John H. Fanning said the decision would mean that in the future "employers by the simple expedient of unilaterally subcontracting work may abolish every job in a collective bargaining unit and thereby eliminate union representation."

The USWA, which had represented Fibreboard's 50 maintenance and powerhouse employes for 22 years, notified management May 26, 1959, of the union's demands as to wages, hours and working conditions to replace the existing contract due to expire July 31. A few days later the company acknowledged receipt of the notification and promised to contact the union "at a later date regarding a meeting for this purpose."

During June and July the union was met with delays either because the director of industrial relations was out of town and unavailable or because he was attempting to arrange a bargaining session.

On July 27, four days before the contract was to expire, the company notified union representatives it had decided to contract out the work being performed by USWA members and that "in these circumstances . . . negotiation of a new contract would be pointless."

The company said it had been studying the cost of doing maintenance work for a two-year period before deciding to subcontract the work. The contractor finally selected was actually chosen the day after the union was notified and the contract for the work was not signed until a week later.

The contract for the work was given to Fluor Maintenance, Inc., which employs union workers.

Despite USWA protests, the company refused to negotiate on either the subcontracting decision or on termination pay. The three-member NLRB majority—Philip Ray Rodgers, Boyd Leedom and Joseph Alton Jenkins—said the company was not bound to negotiate since "no employes remained in the unit to be represented by the union."

In his dissent Fanning assailed what he termed the "inconsistency" of the majority, declaring that their decision was the same as saying that "discharging some employes in a unit without bargaining is unlawful, but discharging all of them is not."

Restrictive Laws Hit At Canada's New Party

Ottawa, Ont.—Conservative forces in Canada are moving to harass if not block trade unions seeking to combine with other liberal elements to establish a new political party.

In British Columbia the anti-labor Social Credit government has already rammed through the legislature a law barring unions from spending any of their money on politics—local, provincial or national.

In Ontario, Atty.-Gen. Kelso Roberts denounced union support for the New Party, now coming into being as the result of efforts of the Canadian Congress of Labor and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

In Quebec, cabinet officers said agency-shop service payments to unions by non-members would be jeopardized. In Alberta it was charged that the province's "leading Communists" were in the New Party—an accusation interpreted by union leaders as a prelude to action aimed at weakening the new group.

Contributions Banned

The British Columbia law makes each union a "person" and denies "him" the right to contribute to any political party. Specifically, the law has these provisions:

- Trade unions may not directly or indirectly contribute from membership dues—received either directly or through the checkoff—to any political candidate, political party or candidate not affiliated to any political party.
- The law applies even if every member of a local union votes in favor of making a political contribution.
- Each union is required to furnish its employers with a statutory declaration that it is complying with the law and intends to do so. It has been pointed out that no local union can give a guarantee concerning expenditures by a body to which it pays dues, such as the CLC or an international union.

The law applies to local central bodies as well as local unions.

It was passed after bitter CCF defense was ground down by the sheer weight of the Social Credit majority.

Louis Marciante Dies; Headed N. J. Federation

Atlantic City, N. J.—Louis P. Marciante, president of the New Jersey Federation of Labor for more than a quarter of a century, died here at the age of 62. He had been hospitalized with a heart ailment.

Marciante, as a 16-year-old apprentice, joined Local 269 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Trenton and in two years was elected business agent, later becoming president. After service with the Marine Corps during World War I, he was elected secretary of the Mercer County Building & Construction Trades Council and later president of the County Central Trades Council.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler praised him as "a man whose leadership has contributed so much to the well-being of the American workers."

In a telegram of sympathy to his widow, Mrs. Louise Marciante of Margate City, Meany and Schnitzler declared: "His dedication to the principles that represent the highest ideals of the labor movement will be remembered by all trade unionists."

Marciante was elected president of the state federation in 1934 and reelected ever since. A forceful speaker, he was regarded as one of the state's most influential political leaders.

Although he had to begin work before finishing high school, Marciante had a lifetime interest in improving the state's school system. He served for 12 years as a member of the Trenton Board of Education.

USWA Asks Better Kennecott Contract

Phoenix, Ariz.—The Steelworkers will seek a 32-hour week with 40-hour pay in addition to a "substantial wage increase" and jobless pay benefits in upcoming negotiations with Kennecott Copper Corp.

'Union Vocabulary' Given in 3 Languages

Mexico City—The Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) is distributing an unusual trilingual "Trade Union Vocabulary" containing 462 commonly-used trade union terms in Spanish, English and Portuguese.

The publication also outlines in each language the roles of ORIT, the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the international trade secretariats. It was compiled by the ORIT Education Dept. as one of the last acts of its director, Daniel Benedict, former AFL-CIO staff member who has become inter-American secretary of the Intl. Metalworkers Federation

Con Ed Aids Tuition Under Union Pact

New York—A unique company-supported education program has been worked out by Local 1-2 of the Utility Workers, which represents 25,000 workers employed by Consolidated Edison here. Under the agreement, the company will pay 50 percent of costs of tuition, up to $250 per year, for employes who desire to take school courses that will improve their chances for advancement.

There is no limitation on the type of study or the number of years, Michael Sampson, the local's business manager, said in announcing the agreement. They may be technical, general or professional.

"We started negotiating with the company on this issue because we've been disturbed over the fact that the company went out and hired people with certain skills, but made no effort to develop skills within the work force," Sampson said.

"We though that Con Ed workers on the job should have a chance to improve and advance themselves and we're happy that the company sees it that way, too."

Other Benefits Improved:

Pact Gives $5 Hike To 8,500 at Macy's

New York—An 11th-hour settlement, hammered out after 60 hours of almost continual bargaining, has brought a $5 wage package and improved pensions, health and welfare benefits to 8,500 Macy's department store employes. The pact, which also embodies the first department store agreement on handling automation problems, covers workers at the main Herald Square store here, as well as in branches in Flatbush, Jamaica, Parkchester and White Plains.

The automation agreement provides that retraining shall be given workers assigned to new machinery and that workers permanently replaced shall receive severance pay based on years of employment.

Announcement of the settlement was made by Pres. Sam Kovenetsky of Local 1-S of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Workers, at a meeting at Manhattan Center. Since only 4,500 workers could get in, an overflow meeting for another 1,500 workers was held at 500 Eighth Avenue.

Kovenetsky announced the proposed contract direct from the marathon bargaining session where the pact had been worked out. Settlement terms include a $3 increase retroactive to Feb. 1, and another $2 boost effective Oct. 1. Minimum wages were raised from $46 to $50 and will climb to $52 for the second year of the contract.

Pension payments increase from $35 to $50 per month for workers at age 65 with 25 years of service. A new feature grants $55 per month to workers with 30 years of service. Payments to workers who retire with 15-to-24 years' service remain unchanged.

In addition to the major provisions, the health and welfare program has been improved and life insurance has been raised from $1,000 to $1,500.

Agreement was reached with the aid of Harold Felix, city commissioner of labor, and George Moskowitz, chairman of the State Mediation Board.

Kovenetsky described the agreement as a "guide post" in department store bargaining nationally.

The agreement, which climaxed four months of negotiations, came after a mass demonstration outside Macy's Herald Square store by thousands of Gotham's trade unionists, representing 50 local and international unions. The rally was coordinated by the New York City Central Labor Council to demonstrate its support of the Local 1-S members.

The ratification meetings, which halted work in the five stores, were unanimous in approving the pact. While negotiations were under way, Local 1-S produced a television program which gave the union side of the controversy to the public.

THE AYES HAD IT when union employes of five Macy department stores in the New York area voted approval of new contract terms. Some 4,500 members of Local 1-S, Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Workers crowded Manhattan Center when this picture was taken. An overflow meeting of 1,500 other workers also approved the settlement.

Beirne, Haggerty Named Peace Corps Advisers

Pres. John F. Kennedy has named two trade union leaders to a newly-formed National Advisory Council for the Peace Corps.

Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and an AFL-CIO vice president, and Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. were appointed to the 33-member council which is headed by Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas is honorary chairman.

Kennedy said the advisory group was set up to give the Peace Corps organization "guidance and counsel in the development of its activities."

In another move to implement labor cooperation with the Peace Corps program, Harry H. Pollak of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs was appointed as liaison for the Peace Corps and the AFL-CIO.

Pollak, who will serve without compensation, will work several days a week at Peace Corps headquarters. He will assist in the development of projects involving workers in various trades and in recruiting and selection of participants, and will advise on relations with unions in countries in which volunteers will serve.

Both Beirne and Haggerty have expressed strong support for the goals of the Peace Corps.

Beirne described the Peace Corps as "a magnificent idea in the main line of the American hope for a peaceful and democratic world." He said "no other single proposal of the Kennedy Administration has created so much admiration and excitement at home and abroad."

Haggerty said the Peace Corps provides "an opportunity to utilize the keen abilities and skills of our young people" in the task of assisting in solving world problems.

He added: "Just as we mobilized our people for service in the Seabees in time of war, so can we mobilize these vital human resources in time of peace."

Dept. of Education Gives Steward Tips

"Twenty Ideas for Shop Steward Meetings," an illustrated four-page feature, appears in the March-April issue of Education News & Views, published by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. Education committees will find ideas in this article to improve their shop steward training programs.

A report on a two-year union leadership program now going on at the University of Chicago is contained in another article, "Workers Will Read More Than You Think."

Also appearing in the new issue of Education News & Views is the story of a weekend seminar which the Texas State AFL-CIO runs for college students. The students pay their own way, make their own agenda and get the facts on the labor movement from top state federation officials.

NMU Fund Lists 2,000th Pensioner

New York—Veteran seaman Pablo Diaz has been informed by an old shipmate, Pres. Joseph Curran of the Maritime Union, that approval of his pension application has brought to 2,000 the number of retired seamen receiving benefits from the NMU-employer pension fund.

Diaz will get benefits of $100 a month. He is 65, has been sailing in American-flag ship engine departments for 37 years, and joined NMU in 1937.

Jobs Boosted By Tax Cut, AFM Finds

New York—Last year's reduction in the federal cabaret tax—from 20 percent to the present 10 percent—has boosted night club bookings for professional musicians, increased their income an estimated $9 million a year and may have actually increased federal tax revenue, according to a survey by the Musicians.

The union, which has fought for repeal of what it called the "discriminatory, job-destroying" tax on "live" entertainment at night clubs, said its locals have reported that bookings of musicians at cabarets increased an average of 34,861 hours per week during the three months ending Jan. 31 over the comparable period the previous year.

Projected on an annual basis, Pres. Herman D. Kenin said, this amounts to more than $9 million in added salaries for musicians, plus additional millions in wages of other cabaret workers.

The rise in gross receipts plus the higher taxable earnings of workers resulted in higher federal tax revenue, Kenin noted.

Sugar Mill Strike Won in Puerto Rico

San Juan, P. R.—Striking employes in Puerto Rico's South Coast sugar grinding mills have ended their recent strike after winning basic wage demands.

Wage rates rose to $1.10 an hour in the new contracts signed with the Packinghouse Workers. Earlier, employers had offered only about $1.06 an hour. Over 2,000 workers are affected by the new contract.

Wage rates in the mills are far higher than those paid to sugar plantation workers, who receive only about 50 cents an hour basic wage for their work in the fields.

One of the plantations directly concerned by the strike of sugar workers was that of Luce & Co.

A previous AFL-CIO news story, quoting a union statement that the company was owned or controlled by the family of Henry Luce of Time and Life magazines, has been denied by the publisher. Neither the publisher nor his family has any economic interest in Puerto Rican sugar cane farming, a spokesman for Luce indicated.

ACWA Tells South of Non-Union Sewell Plant

Atlanta, Ga.—The Clothing Workers have launched an educational campaign in southern states to inform union members, and all other consumers, that clothing produced by the giant Sewell Manufacturing Co. of Bremen, Ga., is made under non-union conditions.

The union has been trying for 25 years to organize Sewell, which is part of an industrial complex employing 4,000 workers in Georgia and Alabama.

ACWA Pres. Jacob Potofsky, in letters to all AFL-CIO city and state central bodies in the South asking their help, said the company has employed every known anti-union technique to keep the union out of its plants.

The company, Potofsky said, has been successful in keeping its employes out of ACWA and has grown big while paying substandard wages.

While 98 percent of the men's clothing industry has been organized, Sewell workers have been earning as much as 25 percent less than union workers with similar skills and occupations, the union said.

Potofsky told AFL-CIO affiliates that many Sewell workers have signed ACWA cards through the years, but have been frustrated by intimidation, loss of jobs, and company threats of plant closings if the organizing drive succeeds.

In 1946 the company was ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to stop illegal practices, but continued to resist the union. The NLRB found the company guilty of unfair labor practices involving discriminatory discharges, threats to close the plant, and illegal surveillance of union adherents, the ACWA asserted.

Saying that the atmosphere in Sewell plants is "one of terror" during organizing drives, the union said workers dared not talk to each other about the union for fear of losing their jobs. Suspected union supporters are harassed, transferred to lower paying jobs, or fired, the ACWA said.

Potofsky said union members can help in the Sewell campaign by telling retail merchants that they "will not subsidize an anti-union company" by buying Sewell products.

Experience has shown, he said, that many retailers will respond favorably when union members make a determined effort to explain their feelings about non-union merchandise.

The ACWA educational campaign was launched here by ACWA Vice Pres. Gladys Dickason and Charles English, codirectors of the ACWA Southern Organizing Dept. Its strongest efforts will be directed at educating consumers in North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee and Mississippi, where much of the men's clothing produced by Sewell is sold.

URW and U.S. Rubber Open Parleys May 8

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers will open contract talks May 8 in New York City for 25,000 members of 18 local unions covered by contracts with the U.S. Rubber Co.

Already in negotiations with Goodyear, Firestone, Seiberling and General Tire for contract improvements affecting 44,500 workers, URW also has asked for contract talks with the B. F. Goodrich Co. for 12,500 employes in eight plant locations.

The URW-U.S. Rubber agreement runs out June 1. URW Pres. George Burdon said the U.S. Rubber section of the union's international policy committee will start meeting May 2 in New York to prepare for negotiations.

The union has notified Goodrich that it wants to open negotiations on a contract to replace the current master agreement expiring June 9.

The union has bargaining rights for about 82,000 rubber workers employed by the six companies. Its policy committee voted at a recent meeting that URW goals in 1961 negotiations will include a general wage increase and a program aimed at reducing loss of jobs because of automation. The industry has reported near-record earnings, the committee pointed out.

The Jobless Figures

THE GOVERNMENT'S March report on employment and unemployment has touched off a rash of stories that the recession is "bottoming out," that there are new "bright spots" in the joblessness situation and that generally things will work out for the best.

Any of these conclusions can be reached from a superficial reading of the Labor Dept. report which shows employment rising and unemployment dropping. A more careful analysis of the figures would dispel the spring-like optimism and reveal the cold grip of unemployment on the nation's economy.

Employment showed a more than seasonal gain in March of more than 40 percent. But unemployment declined only about two-thirds of what is normally anticipated for the month. The result: a 6.9 percent rate of unemployment, seasonally adjusted.

For the past four months the jobless rate has remained practically unchanged between 6.6 and 6.9 percent despite the better-than-seasonal increases in jobs. In both February and March the unemployment rate reached postwar record highs—higher than in any February or March in previous recessions. In both months, also, employment set new postwar records.

These seemingly paradoxical trends expose the real nature of the problem—a rapidly increasing labor force searching for jobs in a period of recession. And even a normal recovery from the recession will not provide the jobs to bring the unemployment rate down to the 3 percent level that tends to mark a prosperous economy.

The need is for a sharply expanding economy operating at a 5 percent growth rate level to make the beginning of a dent in the joblessness figures, as well as additional government action attacking the hard-core problems of unemployment that will not yield to growth alone.

There are no indications that the rate of unemployment will decline in any meaningful sense in the next few months regardless of what happens to employment.

This is the import of the March figures—continuing chronic high unemployment.

Letters to Congress

COMPARED TO the records of past Congresses, the opening months of the first session of the 87th Congress produced more activity—if not actual legislation—than most.

It passed a temporary unemployment compensation measure and moved toward final passage of aid to depressed areas bill. Hearings on other important measures have been completed and bills are nearing the floor stage.

As it returns from its Easter vacation, Congress will face showdown votes on many of the key items in the Kennedy program to combat the recession and stimulate long-term economic growth. The legislative outcome will depend in great degree on whether the President has made a deep enough impact in presenting his program to stimulate voters into demanding congressional action.

The results of the next 90 days will depend in great part on how loudly and strongly the voters speak up in the letters from back home, and on how well they have presented their case for action to the vacationing legislators.

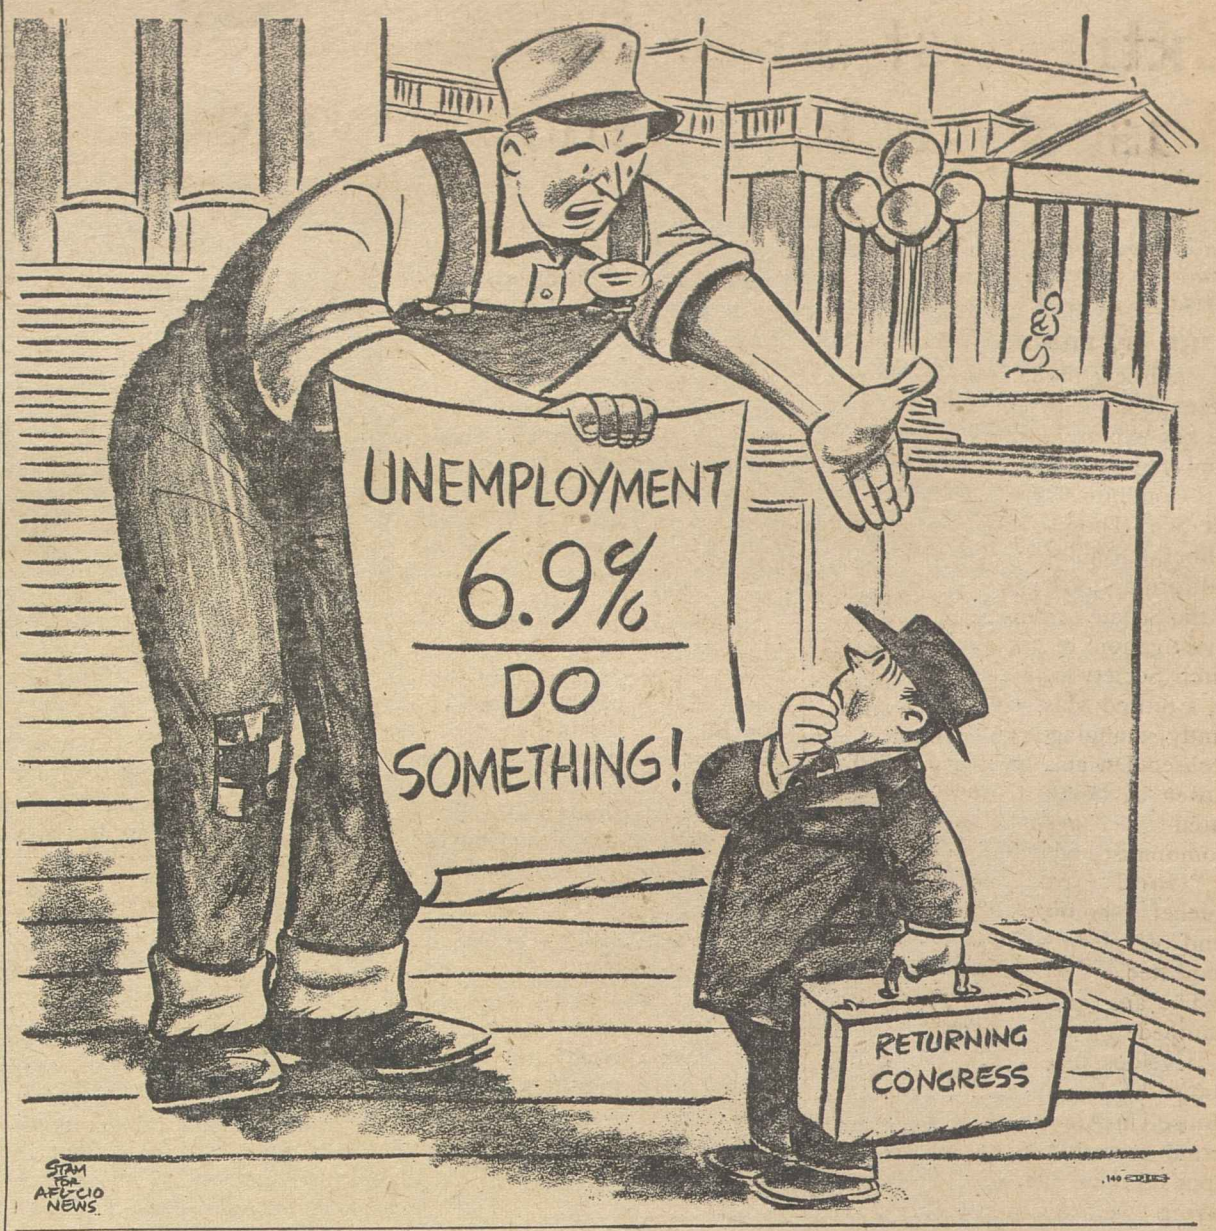
'I'd Like To Get Back to Work, Too'



'The Company Is Master':

Royal Commission Vindicates Newfoundland Loggers' Strike

The inhuman conditions that prompted Newfoundland loggers to strike early last year on the call of the Woodworkers still exist, according to the recently released report of a Royal Commission of Inquiry. The report in essence vindicates the union's position and condemns the formation of a province-controlled union by Premier Joseph Smallwood. Excerpts are printed below.

ON PRICING, or establishing rates: ". . . In the West (of the province), where the multiple pricing system is in great part dead, there is less vocal discontent because the men have been pressed down pretty well to the dead level of a flat rate and have grown resigned to it. They can take it or leave it. If a man kicks there are just now only too many to take his place. Improvement must come from the outside . . .

"The labor is heavy and the life uncomfortable. But they are well off to have jobs these days.

". . . Loggers seem to think that the agreement of 1960-62 (by the Smallwood union) and prior agreements gave every cutter a 'raise'. They have not read it. It does not do so; but it is understandable they should think it does.

". . . Some tell us they are getting the same prices in the same class of woods as they were getting six or seven years ago.

". . . If the same wood which last year was priced at $7.40, $7.50 and $7.60 is this year priced at $7.00, $7.10 and $7.20, who is to know, and what can be proved? For there is no objective standard of 'wood'. It is always a matter of opinion.

". . . The company is master of the logging world on this coast. If it drops a man his job is gone, to which he is accustomed. His equipment is rendered useless to him. He must find some other occupation, if he can. The negotiation can hardly be called that. One side is too powerful. It is the sole buyer and financier . . . The company must eventually prevail. The company asserts that the contractors are independent, their own masters. In law they may be independent, in practice they have no independence at all.

". . . The result of it all is this. The wood department is under pressure from above to keep down the cost of wood. Thus driven it can only look at the contractor and say, 'Perhaps this year we can get the wood from him more cheaply', leaving him, however, enough 'profit' to get by. The strong contractor resists the 'squeeze down' as far as he can; insofar as he succeeds he is in a better position to give his cutters better pay. Wage-earners' payments are fixed. The weaker contractor is squeezed down a little, and can help himself only by squeezing down a little on the men; by adjustment of prices so that the cutters get a little less; by saving on food, its quality rather than its quantity as a rule; by making a little money on the 'van' (merchandising goods to the loggers); and of course, by seeking speed and efficiency in such things as haul-off, driving, etc., where perhaps with luck he can cut time. Human nature is human nature, and a man must save himself. Hence the system often presses in the end on the cutter."

ON JOBBERS CAMPS: "The extemporized habitations of the men, made out of anything that came to hand, and equipped with 'bits and pieces' are really dark and squalid hovels which would not be used as hen houses except by the most primitive farmer. Dirt is everywhere. Rats are common. Dilapidation is the rule."

ON CONTRACTORS' CAMPS: "The contrast in some contractors' camps is striking. The camp is unpainted, dark and dirty. The light is from a limited number of common flat-wick kerosene lamps. Said one old logger to us, 'When you have lighted one, you have to light another to find it.'

". . . With the introduction of electric power we think that piped water should be required in all cases . . . Surface or dipping or bog wells should not be accepted. Arrangements for carrying off waste water from wash basins or other such things should be of metal and not of wood . . . Besides provision for hand basins and hot water for the cook, which is most necessary for sanitary reasons, there ought to be hot water to spare for warming shower baths . . .

". . . Every bunkhouse should be provided with enough tables and chairs to allow, say half the inmates of the bunkhouse at one time to sit up at a table for the purpose of reading, writing or playing games: one table sufficient for six in a bunkhouse accommodating seventy men is obviously not enough; the rest lounging on their bunks in semi-darkness. People are entitled to some degree of comfort.

". . . We had complaints of stale and inferior food being rejected by the men. We have no reason to suppose these complaints were not true."

Morgan Says:

Extremist John Birch Society Based on Ignorance, Hysteria

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THE PETRIFIED FOREST of American political thought is about to be explored but the expedition is not likely to get very far unless the key explorers show more heart for it than they displayed today. A congressional probe of an anti-Communist group is something of a novelty but Sen. Thomas Kuchel, a liberal Republican from California, took the floor of the Senate to request an investigation of the John Birch Society whose leader, a retired Massachusetts candy manufacturer, has accused Dwight D. Eisenhower of being a "dedicated . . . agent of the Communist conspiracy."

Morgan

"Good God," cried Kuchel, "should the American people permit this kind of spleen to be poured on a man who has dedicated his whole life to freedom?"

The answer to his question was no thundering stampede on the part of his colleagues to action. It develops that in reply to a number of queries about the society, the Senate's counterpart of the House Un-American Activities Committee, the internal security subcommittee headed by Mississippi's James Eastland, has issued a form letter saying "we are happy to state that it seems to be, from our records, a patriotic organization."

However, Chairman Walter of the Un-American Activities Committee did indicate he has ordered a preliminary investigation of the John Birch Society. This move came after Republican Rep. Edgar Hiestand of Burbank, Calif., asked for one to clear the record, he said, of a lot of inaccurate charges including accusations that the organization is fascist or dictatorial. Hiestand confirmed he is a member of the society and said he was quite sure other congressmen were too.

Interestingly enough, when Rep. Henry Reuss, Democrat of Wisconsin, asked some days ago for an investigation of the group, Walter wrote him that the committee had received no information indicating that an investigation should, or could, be made by it.

Founded in secrecy in December 1958 by a man named Robert Welch, of Boston, the group was named for a fundamentalist Baptist preacher from Georgia who became a missionary, then an intelligence officer and was killed in China 10 days after V-J Day. Welch dedicated his group to fighting communism and explained something of his philosophy and his tactics in a document circulated to members called the Blue Book. Fighting communism is a highly laudable and respectably popular exercise but Welch considered most efforts panty-waist affairs and decided to engage the enemy on its own terms. The extremes of his thinking have alarmed such pillars of conservatism as the Los Angeles Times, rated tart comment from Time Magazine and drawn denunciations from such unradical types as Richard M. Nixon and mild Republican Sen. Milton Young of North Dakota, both of whom Welch has attacked.

PERHAPS THE MOST complete and carefully-documented expose of Welch and his Society extant is a series of five articles of Pulitzer-prize-winning calibre in the Los Angeles Times by Reporter Gene Blake, published early in March. In writings either before or since founding the John Birchers, Welch has not only accused ex-President Eisenhower and his brother Milton of being Communists but named Harry Truman, Chief Justice Earl Warren, CIA Chief Allen Dulles and the late John Foster Dulles, Franklin D. Roosevelt and Gen. George Marshall as part of the conspiracy too.

Democracy, Welch believes, "is a deceptive phrase, a weapon of demagoguery and a perennial fraud." He argues the Communists are using it to take over the government and have already made dangerous headway. He conceived of the John Birchers as a "monolithic society" under himself as absolute leader to battle communism with every wile and "to promote less government, more responsibility and a better world." One of the 10 points of his Blue Book exhorts, "Organize fronts—little fronts, big fronts, permanent fronts, all kinds of fronts." In a bulletin last September Welch urged his members to "take over the PTA's."

This sounds like a plot for a bad television serial, but the society already claims chapters or members in all 50 states, with a goal of 100,000 members in 1961, a million ultimately. Its chapters have intimidated citizens with middle-of-the-night phone calls denouncing them as Communists, inundated editors and legislators with letter-writing campaigns, pressured school boards and vilified ministers, praised the Un-American Activities Committee and widened circulation of the distorted film Operation Abolition. A county education official is privately reported as saying the society has already produced chaos in the schools of Fullerton, Calif.

Eventually a movement so heavy with ignorance and hysteria, however well-intentioned, should fall of its own ridiculous weight but it can cause great damage in the interim—damage that inquiries by the Eastland or the Walter committees are not likely to alleviate because they have been causing the same kind of harm to our vulnerable body politic.

Washington Reports:

$1.25 Minimum Wage Forecast By Rival Committee Members

SEN. PAT McNAMARA (D-Mich.) and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) have predicted that a more liberal minimum wage bill will be passed by the Senate than was approved by the House, and that Congress will finally agree on an increase in the wage to $1.25 an hour, with broader coverage than in the House version.

The predictions were made by the two members of the Senate Labor Committee on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

McNamara has a bill before the Senate that would increase the minimum wage to $1.25 and extend protection of the act to 4 million additional workers, mostly in the retail trades. The House has passed a measure that would increase the minimum to $1.25 but extend coverage to only about 1.3 million more workers, with the latter to get a minimum of $1. The McNamara measure approximates the demands of the Administration.

Javits said that a committee bill is expected modeled after the McNamara bill. He indicated he expected it will pass the Senate with limited change.

THE PROVISION THAT each covered unit must do at least $250,000 in business annually "and in addition on each such unit must be dealing in goods which cross the state line to the extent of 25 percent of its business seems to me to be a pretty good compositive definition of interstate commerce, and it should go far to reassure people who are worried about arbitrary or undue extension of retail coverage," Javits declared.

Asked about the charge that the proposed increase is inflationary, McNamara said, "It's just a case of providing a living for these people, not even reaching a minimum standard accepted by the government."

Javits said he didn't believe the act would "imperil anybody economically. I think it is just a matter of bringing up those who are far below where they ought to be." He pointed out also that such a measure would help protect industries in states that have liberal minimum wage laws of their own.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE STRATEGIC political problems of the Kennedy Administration after three months of Congress can be observed in the conduct of the two top-level party organizations, the national committees.

The Democratic National Committee, with new Chairman John M. Bailey of Connecticut presiding, is seeking a way to translate the President's personal popularity into votes for Administration bills in the House of Representatives.

In the House, GOP Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) has maintained tight control of his minority delegation. Conservative southern Democrats are in the habit of voting with Halleck and their own leader, Chairman Howard W. Smith (Va.) of the Rules Committee, and the Kennedy forces are short of a solid majority.

Bailey set up a midwestern conference of Democrats over the Apr. 7-9 weekend designed to "build a grass-roots fire" for Kennedy's domestic programs.

His doctrine is that if the people know the facts about the "big issues such as the minimum wage," they will demand congressional support of the President.

THE REPUBLICAN National Committee approach is tentative but probing for weaknesses.

Observers have noticed that GOP publicity releases are avoiding a heavy-handed tone and are couched in light, needling terms—purported news from inside the White House by "Tom Kitten," the erstwhile Caroline Kennedy cat, or witticisms describing Cabinet members by what are considered appropriate book titles.

This approach presumably reflects a Republican acknowledgement of Kennedy's personal prestige after his first two and a half months as President.

The probing nevertheless goes on constantly.

The Republican National Committee publicists are paying extraordinary attention to the Peace Corps. GOP speakers are addressing student groups—not attacking the Peace Corps idea, which obviously has attractiveness for many young people, but clucking their tongues over whether the Administration has the right idea and warning the students that they should be very sure what is required of volunteers. These speeches are processed and sent out as GOP National Committee releases.

Such questions as these are raised: Will the corpsmen be protected adequately against corporal punishment under the laws of countries of the Middle East if they should be convicted there of "minor offenses"? Will corpsmen be given "complete and competent instruction" in the techniques of Communist penetration and "knowledge of proven methods of combatting Communists in the field"?

A THEME running through Republican publicity ever since the campaign is the suggestion, although not the official charge, that Democratic "big city bosses" stole the election from Vice Pres. Nixon last November.

The national committee is pushing promotion of what it calls a "non-partisan" pamphlet entitled "Are You a 'Shadow' Voter?"—a 12-pager that is asserted to present "for the first time in political history a practical, comprehensive set of election anti-fraud rules." The GOP says the booklet "exposes irregular practices by political bosses and offers non-partisan advice for the voter's protection."

Republican newspapers and writers have plugged the booklet enthusiastically. There is a noticeable absence of quotations from newspapers and columnists equally devoted to clean elections in big cities but also aware that rural county courthouse rings, which tend to be Republican, have techniques for vote-stealing that sometimes make city bosses envious.

A few Republicans think that their party's real trouble in the big cities in that GOP members of Congress vote almost solidly against measures to help the cities solve overwhelming problems of urban blight, traffic congestion, water pollution and school shortages.

CONGRESS WILL PASS a more liberal minimum wage bill than the limited one approved by the House, according to Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), left, and Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), who has introduced a $1.25 minimum bill in the Senate. The senators were interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.

JAPANESE PUBLISHERS and editors are just as interested in political affairs as their American counterparts, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler was told by a delegation of political writers and editorial writers from leading Japanese newspapers. Pictured in a visit at AFL-CIO headquarters are, left, Ryoichi Miura, associate political editor of the Mainichi Shimbun, and Schnitzler. Miura and eight colleagues were briefed on U.S. labor and politics by members of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Collective Bargaining Report:

Union-Won Pay Hikes Seen Needed To Rout Recession

Despite the opposition to be expected from business interests, union-negotiated wage hikes would help pull the nation out of the recession, according to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

The current issue of Collective Bargaining Report, a department publication, observes that management will press to hold down contract gains but attacks the industry argument that "for the good of the economy, wage increases should be extremely small or eliminated altogether."

Inability of consumers to buy the products American industry can produce is a major factor in bringing about and prolonging recessions, the AFL-CIO publication says, adding:

"Rising wages are beneficial for the economy and indeed are desperately needed by the nation to build up consumer demand so that idle men and machines will be put back to work.

"Increases in wages and salaries are particularly valuable in a recession period, when it is necessary to offset the loss in total wage income stemming from rising unemployment and reduction in hours worked."

Acknowledging that most contract settlements during 1961 may be roughly similar to those of the past two years—wage increases of 3 to 5 percent plus improved fringe benefits—the AFL-CIO publication points out that "larger increases are justified and can readily be taken in stride by most of industry."

Based on bargaining experience during past recessions, employers may be expected to emphasize the condition of the economy as a reason for "restraints" on wage increases. The AFL-CIO publication emphasizes that "this appears to be done primarily for psychological reasons, in a desire to soften union pressures for increases, but the recession is rarely truly a major issue at the bargaining table."

The Dept. of Research also points out that there will be "great diversity in the many thousands of settlements during the year" with the increase negotiated dependent on such factors as membership attitude, union strength, management attitude, the economic condition of the particular company or industry and the weight given to contract benefits other than wages.

Some 3 million manufacturing workers are covered by long-term agreements which will provide automatic increases during 1961, the most common of which is between 8 and 9 cents an hour. In many cases, cost-of-living adjustments will be added to the scheduled raises.

Among some 600,000 construction workers under long-term agreements, about half will receive increases of 17 to 21 cents an hour during the year.

Reviewing wage negotiations during 1960, the Dept. of Research cites Labor Dept. statistics covering nearly 7 million workers, mainly in manufacturing, under collective bargaining agreements for units of 1,000 or more workers.

Thirty-five percent of the workers received hourly increases of 9 to 10.9 cents; 18 percent were between 7 and 8.9 cents; 25 percent under 7 cents, and 22 percent over 11 cents.

The tabulation does not include the value of fringe benefits, which in many cases were a considerable factor in the contracts.

Kansas 'Work' Forces Beaten on Ripper Bill

could call a strike, and required detailed annual reports and an annual filing fee to be submitted to the state by every local union with 25 or more members.

Ironically the court decision invalidating the agency shop was based in part on the fact that no criminal penalties are provided in the "right-to-work" amendment adopted in a 1958 referendum.

The Kansas high court made a distinction between the situation in Kansas and the Indiana "right-to-work" law which that state's Appellate Court has held does not bar agency shop agreements.

A constitutional amendment, the Kansas court said, can be interpreted in a broader manner than a statute, and particularly a statute which carries a criminal penalty, as is the case in Indiana.

It quoted the Indiana court decision on the agency shop as pointing out that "the law is well settled that [a] penal statute will be strictly construed and not construed to include anything beyond its letter."

The Kansas State AFL-CIO submitted a brief to the court arguing for the legality of agency shop contracts in the state.

Efficient Planning by Management Can Cut Hospital Costs, Experts Say

New York—Health and welfare experts here overwhelmingly support organized labor's claim that hospital costs can be cut dramatically by more efficient management and better planning. This was the consensus of speakers at a day-long conference on the cost and quality of hospital care sponsored by representatives of labor, management and the Foundation of Employe Health, Medical Care & Welfare, Inc.

The conference drew some 100 trade union leaders, 75 employer representatives, and trustees of approximately 100 health and welfare funds.

Top physicians joined union spokesmen and leading figures in health plans in asserting that impressive savings in hospital operation could be effected through coordinated efforts by physicians, prepaid health plans and hospital managements.

Suggestions for more economical hospital administration included the sharing of expensive equipment, less wasteful operation of out-patient departments, common purchasing of supplies, joint payroll and data processing systems, pooling of hospital resources and services, and conversion of some hospitals into nursing homes or special purpose institutions.

Martin E. Segal, health, welfare and pension consultant, charged "deliberate downgrading of prepayment medical plans" and called on insurance companies to institute independent audits of claims and take other steps to correct possible abuses.

He deplored what he termed "a concept held by some physicians—that insurance is to protect the physician's income rather than the patient's."

The contention that 20 percent of the bed day use in hospitals could be cut with large capital cost savings and dramatic reductions in the cost of purchasing hospital care was made by Donald B. Straus, vice president of the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York. Straus noted that if some 5,200 general care beds could be closed down in New York City without the need for replacement, capital cost savings at the rate of $30,000 per bed would total $156 million.

Dr. Ray E. Trussell, newly appointed city commissioner of hospitals, led other speakers in declaring that prepaid health and hospital plans have a responsibility to keep the public regularly and fully informed about proper standards of physicians as well as new developments in medical care.

Dr. Martin Cherkasky, director of Montefiore Hospital—one of the three highest-cost institutions in the city—told the conference that "before hospital costs can be lowered, the basic character of medical practice must be changed."

He predicted wages in hospitals will continue to rise until they are equal to those in industry. A scientific and medical "explosion" has added to the rise in hospital costs, he asserted.

'Free of Pressure,' Morgan Lauds AFL-CIO, Network

News commentator Edward P. Morgan gave what he described as "a commercial in reverse" in accepting the Alfred I. duPont Radio & Television Award for the "thoroughness" and "integrity" of his radio reporting and commentaries.

Deploring commercial pressures on broadcasting, which make it "sometimes very difficult for a reporter with a sense of purpose . . . to squeeze his findings in between the filter ads and the deodorant commercials," Morgan added:

"I might be hollering in a vacant lot or stacking unpublished commentaries in a closet if the ABC network and the AFL-CIO, my sponsor, had not afforded me an outlet for my views . . .

"My criticisms, including those of broadcasting and the labor movement, have been free of pressure or censorship."

Labor 'Cram Courses' Back Union Programs

A "cram course" in government sent 40 members of the Rubber Workers and 25 Textile Workers Union of America business agents back to their home locals from Washington, D. C., with improved ideas of how to win support for their union's legislative programs.

Course tutors—John W. Edelman of TWUA and Joe Glazer of URW—said most of the students attended "class" for a week, then wrote papers on their experiences.

The TWUA institute, second of the year, has been held at least once every year for 12 years, but was the first held exclusively for TWUA business agents.

Twenty-five agents from 13 states attended a briefing session addressed by Paul Swaity of the TWUA Education Dept.; William DuChessi of the TWUA Committee on Political Education; and Edelman, legislative representative in Washington. At other meetings TWUA Sec.-Treas. John Chupka spoke on the meaning of legislative institutes, and Staff Dir. William G. Phillips of the Democratic Study Group on the job ahead of the 87th Congress. The group also heard members of Congress and legislative aides.

The "field work" consisted of attendance at congressional hearings, sessions and committee meetings; appointments with senators and congressmen from home states and districts; and a visit to the new State Dept. building.

AFL-CIO staff members spoke on pending bills—Raymond Munts of the Dept. of Social Security on unemployment compensation, Seymour Brandwein of the Dept. of Research on wage and hour legislation, Jack Beidler of the Dept. of Legislation on working with congressmen, Dir. Stanley Ruttenberg of the Dept of Research on full employment, Russell Allen of the Industrial Union Dept. on federal aid to education, Frank Fernbach of the Dept. of Research on state and local taxes, and Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the Dept. of Education.

The URW institute brought in 40 union members from 10 states for the same kind of intensive study of the legislative process. Among those who spoke were Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) and Dir. Nelson Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

France Honors Veteran Unionist

A veteran French trade union leader who was instrumental in cracking the Communist's Party's attempted subversion of the Marshall Plan has been promoted to an officer of the Legion of Honor.

Pierre Ferri-Pisani, of Marseille, is an old friend of the American trade union movement. In the 1946-49 period he was instrumental in keeping ports open to unload Marshall Plan aid in face of a concerted attempt by the Communists to strike the ports for political purposes.

During World War II the 60-year-old Ferri-Pisani was one of the first leaders of the French resistance movement. He was arrested in 1943, imprisoned, later sent to Buchenwald and other Nazi concentration camps and finally liberated in May 1945. In 1946 he was named a knight of the Legion of Honor and awarded the Croix de Guerre with palm and star.

Union Marks Triangle Fire Anniversary

Cavanagh, Jr., warned that the measure, designated as the Albert-Folmer bill, would set back the safety campaign 50 years to the days when the Triangle fire led to a surge of public interest in worker safety.

Mrs. Perkins gave an eyewitness account of the Triangle tragedy, and told how labor and civic groups launched a vigorous campaign for safety laws in New York and many other states.

Other speakers included Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, widow of former Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who stressed the need for constant vigilance; Mrs. Esther Peterson, head of the Women's Bureau of the U.S. Dept. of Labor; and Prof. Robert S. Holzman of New York University.

The ceremony included unveiling a bronze plaque at the site of the fire, and memorial rites at the graves of seven unidentified victims in the Evergreens Cemetery.

The Albert-Folmer bill would delay until Apr. 1, 1962, the effective date of fire safety legislation enacted after 24 workers lost their lives in a 1958 factory fire.

'Not in Best Interests':

Meany States Policy On 'Buy American'

A "Buy American" campaign runs counter to the "best interests of American workers" and the policy of the AFL-CIO, federation Pres. George Meany has declared.

Meany defined labor's position on the issue in a letter to the secretary of a union label committee replying to one of many he has received requesting clarification of the AFL-CIO position on "Buy American" promotions.

The AFL-CIO president wrote Larry Russell, secretary of the label committee of the Polk County Labor Council in Des Moines, Ia., that the federation "cannot lend its support to the promotion of a 'Buy American' program," and added he hoped "that your union label committee would not undertake such a campaign."

Stressing labor's support of programs to promote international trade, Meany pointed out that "many millions of Americans are dependent for their livelihood on the sale overseas of the goods they produce. The United States cannot hope to sell goods on the world market unless we are willing to buy goods from other free nations."

The other side of the issue, wrote Meany, is that the free nations will either trade with us or be forced to trade with the Soviet Union and its satellites. "That would help the Communist cause," he said. The only alternative for these nations is to shut off trade, which would also aid the Communists as their economies withered away.

"For these reasons—jobs of U.S. workers, U.S. economic health and U.S. foreign policy—we must support more, not less foreign trade," Meany went on.

The AFL-CIO insists, however, "that action be taken to deal with real harm to American workers and to U.S. industries that may result from large-scale foreign imports of certain products into the U.S."

The job, he added, is to relieve the harm that has been done and prevent future harm, "not create additional damage to other American workers and industries, or, in fact, the nation as a whole by supporting 'Buy American' campaigns."

The AFL-CIO is continually working with the U.S. government, through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, with the international trade union movement, with the Intl. Labor Organization and "every other possible source to ease and prevent serious injury from import competition," Meany said.

Radio, TV Stations Hit For Coverage of Politics

Congress has been urged to restate the principle that radio and television stations, as a condition for retaining their licenses, must allocate "equal and adequate time" for both free and paid political discussions in advance of national, state and local elections.

Testifying before Senate Interstate Commerce subcommittee, Morris S. Novik, a radio and television consultant, pointed out that during the 1960 presidential campaign 70 out of 315 radio stations affiliated with the American Broadcasting Co. network refused to carry a paid political series because of "station policy" against such programs.

Novik, who is a radio and television consultant to the AFL-CIO, said the series, sponsored by the Ladies' Garment Workers, involved both political talk and entertainment. He said the difficulty encountered in scheduling the broadcasts proved that "the worst problem is not equal time" but rather "getting any time for political discussions on radio."

The communications consultant also said that despite the public interest in the debates between Pres. John F. Kennedy and Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon during last year's campaign, 35 independent television stations and 10 network affiliates did not carry the debates, and that a maximum of only 919 out of the 3,500 licensed commercial radio stations carried the broadcasts.

Novik urged that the Federal Communications Commission call a conference of television and radio officials and representatives of the major political parties to work out ground rules for future handling of political broadcasts, and that such a conference be held "early enough to apply to the 1962 elections." He recommended that the conference consider these proposals:

- Political announcements by disc jockeys or other personalities, on their own programs, "should be forbidden as a violation of fair play and good taste."
- The practice of scheduling political spot announcements immediately following a program sponsored by the opposition party should be barred.
- The last-minute "blitz or saturation campaign" by one candidate or party should be prevented. Such last-minute drives, he said, "have been a blight on several recent campaigns, including the last one."
- Stations should not use their editorial time for political comment unless "they are prepared to give equal opportunity to the opposition."

Supreme Court To Hear Appeals

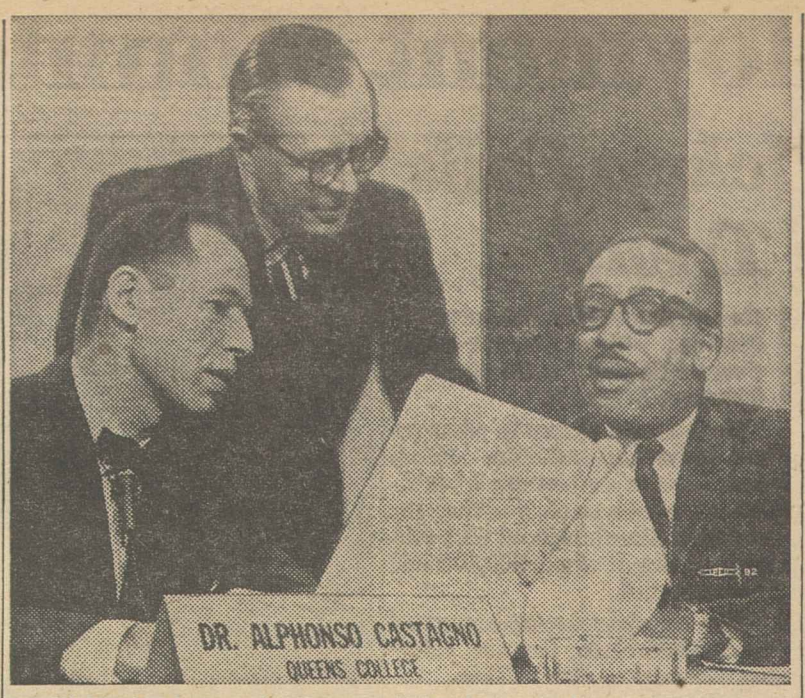
The Supreme Court has agreed to review the conviction of former Teamster Pres. Dave Beck, who is appealing a 15-year sentence received in a Washington State court for alleged misappropriation of $1,900 in union funds.

The high court also agreed to hear arguments on the appeal of Carpenters Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson, who is facing a six-month jail term for contempt of Congress.

The court will hear both appeals during the October term.

Beck, convicted on a charge of pocketing the proceeds from the sale of a Cadillac owned by the Western Conference of Teamsters, contends that stories in the press and on radio and television inflamed the grand jury that indicted him and made a fair trial impossible.

Hutcheson, convicted for failing to answer some questions during hearings by the McClellan special Senate committee, contends that he was within his constitutional rights to decline to testify on matters dealing with a highway land case for which he was facing trial in Indiana courts at the time of his appearance before the Senate committee.



LESS HEAT but perhaps more light than usual was generated on the latest "Briefing Session" program, "African Forecast." Panelists were Prof. Alphonso Castagno of Queens College, left, and Louis E. Lomax, newspaperman and author. Looking on is John MacVane, briefing officer for the program.

U. S. Policy on Africa Termed 'Shortsighted'

American policy toward the emerging nations of Africa, and toward the remaining colonies there, should "reflect what we as a people believe, rather than . . . what we as a people fear."

This observation by Louis E. Lomax set the keynote for an edition of "Briefing Session," the public affairs television series presented by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Under the title of "African Forecast," Lomax and his fellow-panelist, Prof. Alphonso Castagno, examined the convulsions in the world's second largest continent. While they disagreed on some details, such as the timing of independence movements, they united on the proposition that until very recently, American policies toward Africa were shortsighted or worse.

"To be absolutely explicit about it," Lomax said, "we have got to come up with a foreign policy which states the American principles of freedom and equality of mankind in very concrete terms, rather than one which simply expresses our fear of communism."

Castagno, assistant professor of political science at Queens College, stressed the need for more positive action to aid educational and economic development of African nations. There are two basic "impediments" to American influence, he added—first, racial problems in the United States, and second, our country's alliances with some nations that still have colonies.

He was especially critical of our relationship with Portugal and Portugal's colonies.

"They (the Portuguese) are telling us what our policy directions ought to be in NATO, and we cannot tell them what they ought to do about Angola and Mozambique, which suggests we are a satellite of Portugal," Castagno said.

A "long-range view" should lead us to put pressure on Portugal to give "some independence" to those colonies, he went on, so autonomy would be granted "bit by bit" as education and technology improved.

Lomax rejected the gradual approach.

"This business of telling people that we must wait until they can do certain things before you, who have your foot on their neck, will move your foot, is the thing that makes them maddest," he insisted.

"If they are willing to accept gradualism it is fine. If they wish to move swiftly then let's move with them. We should think of the Africans as we think of ourselves, and remember that the things that would pain us as individuals probably pain them."

The author of "The Reluctant African" also said he was shocked to find the extent of American investments in the Union of South Africa. He recommended that the holders of such investments get rid of them now, not just for moral reasons but because they will eventually be lost.

Edward P. Morgan is host and moderator of the programs. John MacVane is briefing officer.

Labor, Cornell Have Retirement Course

New York—A seven-week course designed to assist union members in making advance plans for retirement is being offered by the New York City AFL-CIO and the Cornell University School of Industrial and Labor Relations.

Desegregation Next Issue On Briefing

"Briefing Session" will move to the problems typified by Little Rock, Ark., in its next presentation. Titled "With All Deliberate Speed," the program will deal with school desegregation.

Both guest panelists will be Southerners, but of different viewpoints. Everett Tucker, Jr., is president of the Little Rock School Board and executive director of the city's Industrial Development Co. Harold Curtis Fleming is executive director of the liberal Southern Regional Council.

Tucker, son of a cotton plantation owner, helped to manage the property and supervise the tenant farmers prior to World War II. After the war and a long subsequent illness he managed the industrial department of the Little Rock Chamber of Commerce, from which the present development company evolved.

Fleming, a Georgian, commanded Negro troops on Okinawa during the war. He joined the regional council in 1947 and has been active in the race relations field ever since. He has contributed articles to many publications and is co-author of a book, "Integration North and South."

Hodges Gains Control Over Advisory Unit

The Business Advisory Council of the Commerce Dept., long a self-perpetuating group of top-level corporation leaders with an office in the department and a custom of hearing private briefings from Cabinet officials, has changed its structure under Kennedy Administration pressure.

The council elected Roger M. Blough, U.S. Steel board chairman, as its own chairman and under firm "suggestions" from Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges, agreed:

- To accept Hodges as "general chairman" with authority superseding that of Blough.
- To expand active membership to make room for more spokesmen of smaller business.
- To give Hodges authority to name new members from lists of nominees and to review total membership once a year.
- To open its meetings to the press when government officials address the group.
- To find a new office, outside the Commerce Dept., for its staff secretary.

The BAC has been sharply criticized in Congress for its closed-door policy in frequent meetings at vacation resorts and its self-perpetuating structure despite its status as an official advisory group to the Commerce Dept.

Hillman Group Gives $27,000 In 14 Awards

New York—The Sidney Hillman Foundation has announced grants, scholarships and lectureships totaling $27,000 to 14 education institutions in the United States, Puerto Rico and Israel. The 1961 awards were disclosed by Jacob S. Potofsky, head of the foundation and Hillman's successor as president of the Clothing Workers.

The biggest single grant—$5,000—will go towards establishment of a Puerto Rican Cultural Center in New York.

Scholarship awards will be made to American University's School of Intl. Service, Washington, D. C.; Roosevelt University, Chicago; Chicago Medical School; the Educational Foundation for the Apparel Industry, New York; New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations at Cornell University; University of Puerto Rico; and Amal School in Israel.

Lectureships were renewed or established at the University of Rochester; Howard University, Washington, D. C.; City College, New York; Temple University, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh University.

A grant was made to the New School, New York, for the Sidney Hillman Memorial Room and a library collection, and to the University of Wisconsin to assist in underwriting a biography of the late Prof. John R. Commons, pioneer labor historian.

U. S. Travel Agency Endorsed by UAW

The Auto Workers hope to send thousands of factory workers overseas on UAW tours in the near future, UAW Education Dir. Carroll Hutton told a House committee in supporting a bill to set up a U.S. travel agency.

Such an agency, Hutton said, should aim to attract wage-earners along with upper-income sightseers. He proposed federal encouragement of group tours by European and Latin American workers.

Unemployment Mounts to 6.9 Percent

Seasonal Pickup Fails To Reverse Trend

Wolfbein's warning came as the report showed an alltime high in employment side by side with continued widespread joblessness.

Chairman Walter W. Heller of the President's Council of Economic Advisers said in a speech that a cross-section of economists agree a "turnaround is close at hand and it won't get us out of the woods." Heller said the Administration would be "lucky" to get unemployment below 4 percent in 1962 and would like to see it at 3 percent in the long run.

The Labor Dept. report showed a drop of 210,000 instead of the seasonally expected 300,000 decline in unemployment.

The total of long-term unemployed—those jobless 15 weeks or longer—continued its sharp upward climb.

This group swelled by 238,000 to a total of 1.9 million in March. The long-term jobless had held steady at about 800,000 last June through September, moved up to 1 million for the last quarter of 1960, and now has jumped sharply each month this year. The March total was 24,000 shy of the postwar high reached in April 1958.

Of the long-term unemployed, the report noted that "about 800,000 were without jobs for more than half a year," a rise of 125,000 from February.

The seasonal pickup in construction, agriculture and other outdoor work brought an increase of 861,000 in employment, pushing the total to a March high of 65.5 million. A rise of about 600,000 had been expected.

The non-farm sector accounted for 592,000 of the increase, bringing that total to 60.5 million.

3 Million on Part-Time

"Among the employed in March," the report observed, "there were 3 million non-farm workers working part-time for economic reasons."

Heller said in his speech that the United States must speed up its rate of growth or else unemployment will get much worse. He said the gross national product must be increased by $17 billion a year just to stay even with a growing labor force and increasing productivity.

The Administration's chief economist said recommendations for a temporary tax cut and new housing and public works programs still are "possibilities" and await another look at the economy by President Kennedy.

States Sign Up For Extended Jobless Aid

gress, are en route to Washington.

This contrasts sharply with the situation in 1958, when a TUC program with optional state participation was enacted. At that time, only 15 states and the District of Columbia took part in the federal program, while six additional states enacted temporary programs of their own. This brought the added jobless pay to only 50 percent of the unemployed workers who had exhausted their regular benefits.

39-Week Maximum

The new law provides for payment of additional federal benefits to jobless workers who exhausted their rights to regular state payments after June 30, 1960. Under the emergency program, additional benefits—for a period half again as long as that provided by state programs, with a maximum of 39 weeks of combined federal and state aid—will be paid for weeks of unemployment beginning on or after Apr. 8, 1961. The program expires June 30, 1962.

State unemployment compensation offices have established the machinery for filing of claims under the TUC program. Some states—like Maryland, for example—scheduled special Saturday openings on Apr. 8 to handle the initial processing of claims.

Labor Dept. sources have estimated that benefit checks will be in the hands of a majority of claimants during the week of Apr. 17.

New Idaho Law Bars Bias in Hiring, Housing

Boise, Ida.—Idaho became the 18th state to enact an enforceable law banning racial discrimination in employment as Gov. Robert E. Smylie (R) signed a labor-backed bill passed shortly before adjournment of the legislature.

In addition to prohibiting job discrimination because of race, creed, color or national origin, it also prohibits discrimination in sale or rental of housing.

In Idaho, which has a small Negro population, the most numerous groups which have been victims of discrimination are Mexican-Americans and Indians. The AFL-CIO worked closely with a statewide Indian tribal council in steering the bill through the legislature.

The bill, which had bipartisan support, passed the House 44 to 10 and the Senate 29 to 14. It places enforcement powers under the State Labor Dept. and penalizes violations as misdemeanors.

In Indiana, which has had a fair employment law without enforcement provisions, some improvements were made in an amendment which fell short of labor's goals.

The revised law sets up a Civil Rights Commission authorized to initiate investigations of discriminatory practices and to hold public hearings and subpoena witnesses—improvements over the former law. However, no provision is made for enforcement through criminal penalties or by applications to the courts for cease and desist orders.

Other states with enforceable fair employment practices laws are Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Washington and Wisconsin.

Kansas, as well as Indiana, has a law without enforcement provisions.

Conservatives Victors In Texas Senate Ballot

Two conservatives, one Democrat and one Republican, will face each other in a Texas runoff election for the Senate seat vacated by Lyndon Johnson when he became Vice President.

The runoff became necessary when a record-breaking field of 63 candidates in the Apr. 4 balloting prevented any candidate from polling a flat majority of all votes.

The Republican, John G. Tower, opposed Johnson unsuccessfully in last November's Senate race but piled up the biggest GOP vote in the state's history.

The Democrat is interim Sen. William A. Blakley, appointed by Gov. Price Daniel after Johnson resigned. Sixty-one other Democrats including liberals and moderate liberals trailed Blakley in the polling.

On the basis of incomplete returns, Tower, lone Republican in the race, held a commanding lead of 323,162, to Blakley's 187,969. Rep. Jim Wright was third with 167,766; Atty. Gen. Will Wilson polled 120,436, former State Rep. Maury Maverick, backed by the Texas AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, polled 104,388; and State Sen. Henry B. Gonzalez received 96,134.

Elsewhere, Republicans lost their first big city election of the year despite a major effort to capture the Democratic stronghold of St. Louis. Mayor Raymond R. Tucker (D) defeated his GOP opponent, Ben Lindenbusch, by a nearly 2-1 margin to win his third term as St. Louis' chief executive.

In the nonpartisan mayoralty election in Los Angeles, Mayor Norris Poulson, seeking his third four-year term, failed to poll the necessary majority in the municipal primary. Poulson received 132,569 votes, to 90,687 for former Rep. Sam W. Yorty and 84,695 for City Councilman Patrick D. McGee. Poulson will face Yorty in the May 31 general election.

In Michigan, voters approved a referendum proposal for a constitutional convention to revise the state's archaic organic law and elected eight Democrats in nine statewide contests. In Wayne County (Detroit), the margin for the convention was 3 to 1, and Democrats carried the area heavily.

In Wisconsin's elections, labor-endorsed Circuit Judge Myron Gordon defeated Atty. Gen. Stewart Honeck for a 10-year term on the Supreme Court. Gordon had 363,170 votes to 339,280 for Honeck. Angus Ruthwell, superintendent of schools at Manitowoc, won a four-year term as state superintendent of public instruction, overwhelming William J. Fenelon.

GOP Picks Kansan For Rules Group

House Republican leaders have named conservative Rep. William H. Avery (Kan.) to the Rules Committee to succeed Rep. B. Carroll Reece (R-Tenn.), who died last month.

During the 86th Congress, Avery cast nine "wrong" votes, according to the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. He supported the Landrum-Griffin Act and opposed such measures as depressed areas, public housing, school aid and minimum wage.

His only "right" vote in the last Congress was on civil rights legislation.

NYC Health Dept. Doctors Unionize

New York—An unaffiliated union of doctors has been certified by the city Labor Dept. as exclusive bargaining agent for doctors in the New York City Dept. of Health. The Association of Doctors & Dentists, headed by a school physician, said it represents more than 700 of the 853 physicians employed by the department.

Congress Nears Showdown Votes On Kennedy's Minimum Wage Bill

line margins, beginning with the five-vote edge by which the Rules Committee enlargement was approved. They included a 49-45 vote by which the Senate beat back efforts to subject area redevelopment loans and grants to annual congressional review, and a 46-44 Senate victory over conservative efforts to put the burden for TUC benefits on states hardest hit by unemployment, instead of spreading the cost equally over all employers.

One Sharp Setback

The first three months included one sharp setback—when the House, by a one-vote margin, turned back the Administration-backed compromise minimum wage bill which would have provided a $1.25 minimum wage, in steps, and coverage for 3.8 million additional workers, and substituted a $1.15 minimum with coverage for only 1.3 million more employes.

In the Senate, where minimum wage votes in the past have generally been more liberal, efforts will be made to salvage the measure by enacting most of Kennedy's original proposals for $1.25, in steps, and coverage for 4.3 million.

At his Apr. 6 press conference, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg said the Administration supported the minimum wage bill introduced by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), declaring the measure "meets in substance" Kennedy's wage-hour proposals.

Goldberg said the Administration was opposed to a pending amendment, submitted by Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.), which would limit retail store coverage to those chains operating in two or more states. The Administration bill would cover retail chains doing more than $1 million worth of business annually.

The Secretary charged that Monroney's amendment would be "discriminatory," and that 1.1 million workers would be denied coverage.

He pointed out that many multi-million-dollar establishments would be exempt solely because they operated entirely within one state. He cited one chain in New York state, with 185 outlets and grossing $170 million annually, which would be freed of wage-hour requirements under the Monroney amendment.

Later, the Labor Dept. released a "partial" list of 37 chains, which together gross more than $2 billion annually, that would be exempted by the Monroney amendment. The list, which Goldberg said was based on information from congressional sources, was made up of one-state chains grossing between $6 million and $180 million a year.

Little opposition is expected in the House to the scaled-down version of social security improvements approved overwhelmingly by the Ways & Means Committee. The measure would provide for a 10 percent increase in cash benefits for widows, a boost in minimum benefits from $33 to $40, and optional retirement, with reduced benefits, for men at age 62.

House-Senate conferees also will take up the differing area redevelopment bills passed last month.

In the months ahead, the Administration can expect that such key measures as federal aid for school construction and teachers' salaries, medical care for the aged and sections of the housing bill will be subject to close votes because of the narrow division between liberals and the conservative coalition.

Senate in Fight to Salvage Administration Wage Bill

All Traces Of Job Bias Under Fire

Pres. John F. Kennedy, launching a broad attack on racial bias, has called on his newly created Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity to remove "every trace" of discrimination in employment by the government and its contractors.

Addressing the first meeting of the 28-member committee in the Cabinet Room at the White House, Kennedy declared there was "no more important domestic issue" than the drive to stamp out job discrimination.

The President noted that his executive order setting up the committee armed it with broad powers, which he said should be exercised "with fairness, with understanding, with an open mind, and a generous spirit of cooperation—and also with firmness."

Complaint Policy Set

The committee, headed by Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson as chairman and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg as vice chairman, includes Cabinet members, officials from independent agencies, and business, labor and religious leaders.

The labor members are AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, both of whom served on the President's Committee on Government Contracts during the Eisenhower Administration.

Following organizational actions, the top-level committee:

- Scheduled a late April meeting of major government contractors and an early May session with union leaders to explore "the steps that can be taken to eradicate job discrimination from government contracts." Regional meetings will be held after the initial national conferences.
- Approved an investigation policy for handling complaints under which contracting agencies will continue to have primary responsibility for investigations, aided by the committee's staff.
- Approved Johnson's appointments of subcommittees to study special problems involving apprenticeship and training, vocational education programs, promotions and upgrading, franchise industries and religious group cooperation.

Can Terminate Contracts

Under terms of the President's executive order, government contracts must include an agreement that contractors will not practice discrimination. The committee will have the power to recommend suits by the Justice Dept. to enforce these non-discrimination clauses, and can terminate any contract because of job bias.

In his opening statement to the committee, Johnson said "we cannot and we will not permit the government of the U.S. to be a partner or a participant in racial or religious discrimina-

Close Vote Seen on Coverage

By Gene Zack

The Senate opened a major battle to salvage the Administration's minimum wage bill with an early showdown seen on efforts to cut back sharply provisions on coverage of additional workers.

Pres. Kennedy's "priority" proposals for broadening the 23-year-old wage-hour law reached the floor after winning approval in the Senate Labor Committee by an overwhelming 13-2 vote.

The bill, sponsored by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) would raise the minimum, in steps, to $1.25 for those presently covered; would provide 4.3 million new workers, most of them in retail trade, with an immediate $1-an-hour wage, rising in steps to $1.25; and would gradually reduce the workweek for newly covered employes to 40 hours.

Although Senate sources expressed optimism that the final Senate version of minimum wage legislation will be close to the Administration's proposals, the bill will have to go to a House-Senate conference to iron out differences with the watered-down version passed by the House.

By a one-vote margin, the House rejected an Administration-backed compromise and substituted a bill providing a minimum of only $1.15 for presently covered employes, and protection of only 1.3 million more employes with a wage floor of only $1 and no ceiling on hours.

A major challenge to the McNamara bill lay in an amendment submitted by Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) to exempt from coverage more than 1.1 million employes in retail

CAB Probe To Open:

Strike Aid Pact Pays Airlines $12 Million

Payments to struck airlines under the industry's so-called mutual aid pact have mounted to more than $12.5 million, reports filed with the Civil Aeronautics Board reveal.

The agreement among 10 of the nation's largest airlines—actually a form of self-financed strike insurance—provides that companies which get extra business as the result of a strike against a competing line hand over to the struck line the profit from diverted traffic.

Meanwhile the CAB prepared to launch its previously announced full-scale inquiry into the operations of the pact, which labor has charged undermines collective bargaining in the airline industry. The CAB inquiry was ordered last June but disagreement over the scope of the investigation has delayed the start of the hearing.

The hearing will deal with whether the airline aid pact is in the public interest.

Label Show Fun, Frolic Prove Lure

Detroit—Hundreds of thousands of persons trooped through the aisles of the 1961 AFL-CIO Union Industries Show in this city's modern Cobo Hall, hoping to win prizes that included everything from a new kitchen to a fibre glass boat, from a union-made suit of clothes to a black Angus steer.

Others waited in line for free hair cuts and manicures by union barbers and beauticians. Kids queued up to take chances on winning a free Dalmatian puppy or to get some pink spun-sugar candy offered by the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

The Clothing Workers sewed on loose buttons for show visitors. Lovely ladies from the Ladies' Garment Workers modeled union label clothes in two fashion shows a day.

The crowds were fascinated by the exhibit of the Meat Cutters, where butchers skillfully turned huge sides of beef into the small package sizes found at the meat counters of supermarkets. Here a trio of lambs munched corn and waited for the wool shearing exhibit held several times a day. In a nearby pen, the soft-eyed black Angus steer nervously contemplated his future.

Bricklayers worked silently building their 3-foot by 100-foot display wall. Plasters constructed a mammoth exhibit. Offset presses rolled out a map of the central city of

Railroad Unions Give Commission New Proposal for Job Stabilization

Five railroad operating unions have proposed a guaranteed annual wage and a reduction of hours as the keystone of a program aimed at stabilizing employment in the industry.

The union proposals were made to the 15-member presidential commission investigating railroad work rules and composition of train crews. Earlier, management had asked the tripartite commission to recommend abolition of most firemen jobs and drastic revision of work schedules, job assignments and methods of determining pay.

Unions representing 210,000 operating employes—the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, Trainmen, Switchmen and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers and Railway Conductors—told the commission that widespread unemployment in the industry has been coupled with "extremely irregular use of those kept on the payroll."

Eli L. Oliver, economist for the brotherhoods, called for a guarantee by the railroads that any employe with eight months of service in the current year and at least five years of service during the preceding 10 years will receive regular pay in the succeeding 12 months.

Other union demands included financial protection for employes displaced as a result of mergers, abandonment of facilities or technological changes; night differential, holiday pay, reimbursement for

'R-T-W' Forces Take Licking In Legislatures

By David L. Perlman

Lobbyists for so-called "right-to-work" laws, who began the year with an optimistic report to big business clients describing "constantly expanding and intensifying activities in the states," have little to cheer about, an AFL-CIO survey reveals.

In no state has a bill outlawing the union shop been passed this year. In no state is a pending bill currently considered a serious threat.

"Work" bills have been killed in the legislatures of three states—New Mexico, Idaho and Kansas—in the latter of which an attempt was made to "put teeth into" an away-from-home expenses, and a jointly-administered engineer training program.

Reduction in hours, under the union proposals, would be accomplished through revision of the present time-mileage formula for computing a "basic day." The unions also proposed a straight time-and-one-half overtime rate after the basic day in place of the present complicated "speed formula."

In asking for a night differential and holiday pay for train crews, the unions pointed out that these are benefits which have long been standard practice in other industries.

Spelling out rail labor's conception of the role of the locomotive fireman as both an assistant to the engineer and as a trainee for the position, the operating unions proposed "a jointly administered training program that would supply U.S. railroads with adequately trained engineers."

They asked for a three-year program under which new employes would begin as trainees and progress in four stages to engineer.

Under the safeguards asked for workers displaced by mergers, abandonments or technological changes, employes who lose their jobs or are demoted would receive a "displacement allowance" for a five-year period equal to regular monthly earnings.

Other protection asked includes expenses during management-directed changes of residence, and reimbursement for loss in sale of homes or loss incurred by breaking a lease.

The presidential commission, made up of five members each representing labor, management and the public, is scheduled to submit its non-binding recommendations in December.

Hayes Raps Medical Bodies on Fee Hiking

Urbana, Ill.—Medical associations have attempted to "destroy the effectiveness" of union-negotiated medical care plans by "arbitrarily raising" their fees, Machinists Pres. Al J. Hayes has charged.

Addressing the annual educational conference of the Illinois State Council of Machinists here, Hayes said that the medical lobby is vigorously opposing health care for the aged through the social security system because doctors fear the government may begin "to analyze and question the sacred system of private fees."

The IAM president, an AFL-CIO vice president and Executive Council member, cited labor's "bitter experience" with feehiking by the doctors. He declared:

"Time after time we have been able to get specific insurance payments to cover specific kinds of illnesses and disabilities, only to have the medical association erase these benefits by arbitrarily raising the fee structure.

"What happens, for example, is that the standard fee for an appendectomy is $150. We negotiate with an employer to get insurance providing $100 for an appendectomy. The next day all the doctors in town raise the fee to $250."

Hayes said that if medical payments were provided for under social security instead of under private insurance, doctors "will be less able to engage in practices so directly at variance with the public good."

The IAM president called on union members to become "insurance salesmen" and help inform the American people of the need to provide health care for the aged under social security, as advocated by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

He warned that the "powerful and well-financed doctors' lobby" is trying to kill the health-care program, and declared that doctors have fought prepaid medical care "as though they fear the outbreak of an epidemic of good health."

Favorable Signs Appear, BUT:

Blue-Collar Breadwinners Still Lead Jobless Parade

By Robert B. Cooney

A few "favorable" signs appeared in the nation's job picture in March, the Labor Dept. has reported, even as the brunt of "very high" unemployment continued to be borne by members of the factory work force who are family breadwinners.

Meanwhile, Chairman Walter W. Heller of the President's Council of Economic Advisers told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that getting the unemployed back to work and idle factories into production "cannot be done overnight."

In other testimony, Leon Keyserling, who held Heller's post under the Truman Administration, told a Senate housing subcommittee that the Kennedy Administration's general economic program would leave the nation with as much unemployment and idle plant capacity at the end of next year as now.

Dr. Seymour Wolfbein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, listed a series of "plus" and "minus" signs to fill out an earlier summary which showed March unployment at a 20-year high of 5.5 million while employment rose more than seasonally to a March high of 65.5 million.

Wolfbein saw these favorable signs: a significant increase in employment; "a slight lift in the factory workweek," with a gain of 12 minutes to 39.1 hours; continuing though "slight" weekly decreases in those drawing jobless pay; "cessation" of the long downturn in steel and soft goods; and a drop in part-time workers.

He listed these unfavorable signs:

- Most important, in the face of high employment, "unemployment remained at relatively high levels of 5.5 million, with an unemployment rate of 6.9 percent, seasonally adjusted."

- Long-term unemployment—those jobless 15 weeks or longer—rose to 1.9 million, equaling the postwar high of April 1958.

- Factory employment, at 15.5 million in March, was a little more than 1 million below a year ago and continued to drop.

- Some 70 percent of the 1 million drop in factory jobs over the year was concentrated in the metalworking sector—autos, steel and machinery.

- Earnings of factory workers, a key indicator, rose by 85 cents to an average of $90.71 a week in March but still were 20 cents below a year ago.

- "The impact of unemployment on the married, family breadwinner" is pointed up by the fact he now numbers 2.2 million or 40 percent of the total jobless—an increase of 600,000 over the year.

- Unemployment is "still very pervasive," with 101 of the nation's 150 major labor market areas classified as depressed with unemployment of 6 percent or over.

Wolfbein called attention to an over-the-year trend in which women accounted for two-thirds of the increase in the labor force while family breadwinners were joining the ranks of the jobless.

Shift in Work Force

The changing character of the economy offered an explanation, with white-collar employment increasing by 1.5 million over the year to a total of 29.7 million while blue-collar jobs shrank by 1 million to 22.5 million.

The report gave this background:

"The occupational trends point up the problems of re-employment for men who lose blue-collar jobs.

"The only occupation groups where men registered employment gains over the year were the professional, technical and managerial. Even allowing for the considerable mobility in the American labor force, few unemployed semi-skilled or unskilled workers could qualify for such jobs without considerable retraining.

"Moreover, the largest employment gains have occurred among women in clerical and domestic service work. These are fields where women workers have predominated because of relatively low pay scales for men, greater aptitude of women and traditional employer preferences."

Heller told the Joint Economic Committee there will still exist "a tough problem of unemployment" even after a "substantial" boost in production.

He said the government's spending, tax and credit policies would be adequate but for international, political and other restraints on their "full use" at the present time.

European experts wondered, he said, whether the prospective budget deficits of $2 billion to $3 billion would be "too small" to stimulate recovery.

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) offered the view that large deficits "won't be acceptable to Congress," while Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.) asserted there would be inflation "unless we control some of this deficit spending."

Heller discussed the Administration's approach to general as well as specific types of unemployment and added:

"We certainly do not view 4 percent unemployment as a rock-bottom minimum. As policies to improve the ability and the skill composition of the labor force take effect, it will be possible in sustained prosperity to hold the rate of unemployment somewhere below that figure."

Injunction Holds Up Darlington Hearing

Greensboro, N. C.—A new hearing by the National Labor Relations Board on the four-year-old Darlington Mfg. Co. case has been temporarily blocked by a federal court injunction obtained here by the Deering, Milliken & Co. textile chain.

The NLRB, acting on new evidence indicating that the Deering, Milliken firm might be held to have controlled the operations of the Darlington, S. C., mill, ordered the point argued before a trial examiner.

Previously the NLRB had found the Darlington company guilty of unfair labor practices for closing its plant after its workers had voted for union representation. The decision, however, provided no relief for more than 500 Darlington workers who were left jobless.

The Textile Workers Union of America has consistently asked that Deering, Milliken—the parent chain—be held responsible for the unfair practices and be required to provide jobs and back pay for the Darlington workers. Roger Milliken at the time of Darlington's closing was president of both units.

A hearing on the request for a permanent injunction has been scheduled for April 20.

Strike Aid Pact Gives Airlines $12.5 Million

Two of the questions listed in the CAB statement of issues to be explored are:

"Will the pact bring about violations of the carriers' duty to bargain in good faith?

"Will it compel multi-employer or industry-wide bargaining?"

Northwest Chief Beneficiary

Northwest Airlines, which joined the pact only last year, has been the chief beneficiary of payments made thus far in 1961. The company's operations have been curtailed by a strike of its flight engineers, members of the Machinists. Five airlines, operating competing domestic and international routes, have paid over $2.27 million to Northwest under the mutual aid agreement.

United Air Lines paid a total of $1.05 million to Northwest; Pan American World Airways paid $600,000; Capital Airlines, $400,000; American Airlines, $176,500, and Trans World Airlines, $43,000. Basis of payments was increased revenue during the period of the strike, after deduction of additional operating costs.

The latest reports filed with the CAB also showed payments to Eastern Air Lines totaling more than $835,000 as an aftermath of a partial shutdown last June when pilots balked at an order permitting federal aviation inspectors to displace crew members from their regular duty positions during inspection flights.

Some of the companies had challenged Eastern's invocation of the mutual aid pact in this case and the payments were held up until an arbitrator upheld Eastern's claim.

Union hopes that the CAB would go beyond the surface operations of the agreement in exploring the impact on labor-management relations received a partial setback when the board upheld a trial examiner's action in limiting the scope of the inquiry.

The examiner, C. Thomas Simon, struck from the list of issues to be explored a question dealing with future plans and oral agreements among the airlines in the field of labor-management relations. The board rejected the appeal from the examiner's action by the CAB "bureau counsel," who has the role of presenting the facts in the case from the viewpoint of the public interest involved.

The bureau counsel's appeal was supported by a brief submitted by seven unions with members employed by airlines involved—the Pilots, Flight Engineers, Machinists, Air Line Dispatchers, Transport Workers, Railway Clerks and Auto Workers.

The mutual aid agreement was originally set up by six airlines in October 1958 at the time of an IAM strike against Capital Airlines. The CAB approved the agreement despite the strong protests of unions in the industry which charged it would damage collective bargaining and violate the spirit of the Railway Labor Act, under which the air transport industry operates.

The original agreement provided that mutual aid payments would be made only when the strike was called to enforce demands in excess of recommendations made by a presidential emergency board. It was amended last year to cover strikes in which no emergency board had been set up and to admit four additional airlines.

Seniority Being Protected:

IAM Working Out Merger Job Rights

Proposals for safeguarding the seniority rights of 12,000 members of the Machinists, under the approaching consolidation of Capital Airlines and United Airlines, are being hammered out by IAM officials at a series of conferences in the nation's capital.

The merger of the two carriers into the largest airline in the U.S. won approval from the Civil Aeronautics Board, which spelled out detailed labor protective provisions applicable for a three-year period.

Officers of IAM District 141, which represents 9,000 members employed by United, and District 144, representing 3,000 members employed by Capital, were working on proposals to dovetail seniority rights of members employed by the two airlines.

The seniority proposals will be submitted to United, according to IAM Airline Coordinator Frank Heisler, as a basis for carrying out the CAB's provisions for protecting workers' rights when combined operations begin June 1.

The CAB order, providing protection for employes who have been on the payrolls of both airlines since July 19, 1960, the date the merger was first announced, stipulated that:

- No employe may be "placed in worse position" on wages as a result of the merger.
- United must pay moving expenses and protect employes against loss of investment in their homes in case of transfers due to merger.
- Any employe laid off in the next three years as a result of merger is entitled to choose between monthly dismissal pay or a lump-sum termination payment.

The monthly dismissal pay, computed at 60 percent of regular wages, will continue while the employe is out of work. It is subject to reduction by the amount of any earnings. Under the formula, an employe with one year's service would receive dismissal pay for six months; two years' service, 12 months; three years' service, 18 months; five years' service, 36 months; 10 years' service, 48 months; and 15 years' service, 60 months.

If the employe elects termination pay, he would receive three months' wages for one year of service; six months' pay for two years of service; nine months' pay for three years' service; and 12 months' pay for five years or more service.

Spokesmen for United at the CAB hearings indicated the merger will have no immediate effect on employment.

ZOOLOGICAL EMPLOYES want a written contract with management of the Bronx Zoo and the Coney Island Aquarium, these pickets are telling the public in signs at the Fordham entrance of the New York Zoological Park. Local 1501 of the State, County & Municipal Employes walked out after three years of unsuccessful attempts to get union recognition and a contract for 305 employes.

Indiana Firm Flees Despite 'Work' Law

Muncie, Ind.—Indiana's "right-to-work" law has not saved the state from losing runaway industries that flee to the South, State Labor Commissioner Hobart Butler said here at a final meeting of union members stranded by the moving of the Acme-Lees Division of the Serrick Corp.

The 43-year-old plant closed Mar. 31 and operations will be reopened in Cullman, Ala. Auto Workers Local 459 took wage cuts to keep the plant here, but declined to cut further to the $1.10-$1.35 an hour level to compete with the Alabama location.

Next round in the union's battle for its 135 members will come May 5 when an arbiter hears company arguments that it should not be compelled to pay insurance benefits to 35 former workers.

At the final get-together for Acme-Lees workers in the Eastern Indiana Labor Center, the state labor commissioner asked why industry continues to move out of Indiana "if the 'right-to-work' law is so good?"

Saying that the state does not want to compete with states where industry offers 75 cents to $1.15 an hour, Butler declared: "We want industry in Indiana that will pay decent wages."

Butler represented Gov. Matthew Welsh (D) at the farewell. He said runaway plants are a serious problem in states like Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin. Butler urged more worker-retraining programs and state development committees seeking to keep good industries while working also to attract new ones.

The closing of the Acme-Lees plant will mean hardship for many workers, particularly those over 45, Butler said.

During 1958 contract negotiations, union members agreed to heavy wage cuts and speeded-up production standards to keep the company in a "competitive position." The decision to move, the union said, was brought about by the lure of still lower wages in Alabama.

Rail Lighter Captains Win Pay Increase

New York—Captains of railroad lighters moving freight in New York harbor have approved a contract giving them wage increases of 16.5 cents an hour and referring a dispute over job assignments to the Presidential Railroad Commission already studying railroad work rules.

The agreement gives the 800 members of Longshoremen's Local 996, Lighter Captains, new rates ranging from $20.01 to $21.49 a day; improved health and welfare benefits; and a pay differential of about $1.20 a day for captains of lighters with cargo-hoisting equipment.

The new scales bring the captains to wage parity with other railroad groups.

In negotiations with seven railroads over a 17-month period, Local 996 had been asking a daily wage of $25 and maintenance of the status quo in assigning captains to lighters. The settlement came during a final 30-day cooling off period under the Railway Labor Act, and shortly before a strike deadline.

The agreement to turn the job-assignment dispute over to the Presidential Railroad Commission calls for a study group with members nominated by labor, by management, and by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Animals Join Zoo Strike Picket Line

New York—Zoological employes staged a pet show on the picket line and kept enough members on duty to care for the animals when they walked out on strike at the Bronx Zoo and the Coney Island Aquarium here.

"We're striking against the management, not the kids or the animals," said an officer of Local 1501, State, County & Municipal Employes.

Photographers and children made a beeline for the zoo's Boston Post Road entrance when they spotted the strikers marching with boa constrictors, rock pythons and rat snakes perched on the shoulders of snake handlers and monkeys, sheep and goats squirming in the picket line.

A Times reporter noted that the monkeys, and some of the pickets, gave the snakes a wide berth. But the youngsters enjoyed the show—the only one there was to see, since management shut the zoo and the aquarium when the walkout started Easter Sunday.

AFSCME Local 1501 has represented menagerie keepers, maintenance workers, office, restaurant and clerical employes for about five years. Local officers say members got tired of working without a contract or union recognition.

Three years ago they struck for recognition, returned when management said it would negotiate. The result was what the union called broken promises and what the Zoological Society said was "virtual" recognition.

The Zoological Society is supported by private and public funds, with much of the money coming from the city. The union said wages are not an issue at this time.

Chrysler Locals Elect Negotiators

Detroit—Nine Chrysler subcouncils of the Auto Workers have finished the job of preparing recommendations for collective bargaining proposals and have elected one member each to the UAW committee which will negotiate a new contract with the Chrysler Corp.

The sub-councils met for two or three days each in March or April. After the UAW collective bargaining convention meets here Apr. 26 through Apr. 29, the UAW's National Chrysler Council will adapt the program to the needs of Chrysler workers, UAW Vice Pres. Norman Matthews said.

Rival Bakery Unions Sign No-Raiding Pact

A no-raiding agreement, to be followed by "negotiations looking to a merger," has been signed by the AFL-CIO-affiliated American Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the 75-year-old Bakery & Confectionery Workers, which was expelled from the federation in December 1957 on findings of corrupt domination.

The agreement was announced jointly by ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway and Max Kralstein, B&C acting secretary-treasurer.

The B&C's two top officers, Pres. James G. Cross and Sec.-Treas. Peter H. Olson, are scheduled to be tried May 1 by the expelled union's executive board on charges of misappropriating $35,000 in union funds. Both have been suspended from office pending the trial.

The agreement pledges that each union will discontinue efforts to win bargaining rights at plants under contract with the other union.

It states that "the parties will in due course initiate meetings and discussions exploring the possibility of merging into a single international union representing all bakery and confectionery workers."

The truce became effective on signature and continues unless canceled on 30 days' notice by either party.

Leading up to the agreement were these major developments:

- The ABC, formed by a group of local unions opposed to the Cross leadership and determined to remain a part of the mainstream of the labor movement, chalked up an almost unbroken string of organizing victories and soon surpassed the older union in membership.
- Internal dissension split the B&C into warring camps. In a federal court suit, Cross was charged with misusing union funds for personal gain, and an independent audit of the B&C's finances was sought.

Ouster Blocked by Court

Efforts by Cross to oust his opponents, including Kralstein, whom he attempted to fire as an international representative and remove from the B&C executive board, were blocked by court order.

Early this year a proposed settlement of the court suit, involving payment of $250,000 to Cross in lieu of a pension in return for his resignation, threatened to torpedo progress towards reunification.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sharply denounced the proposed deal as "unconscionable." Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg ordered an investigation into the union's financial dealings.

The suspension of Cross and Olson followed and the court hearing on whether the proposed settlement should be approved was postponed until after the B&C executive board's trial of the two officers.

The no-raiding agreement was approved by the executive boards of both unions and statements by Conway and Kralstein accompanied the text of the pact.

Conway, expressing gratitude "for the statesmanlike attitude of the present spokesmen for the B&C," said the agreement provides a "splendid opportunity for all workers in our industry to resume their familiar roles as brothers and sisters in one union under the banner of the AFL-CIO."

Kralstein pledged that the B&C "will do everything within its power to make such a merger come into being," and added:

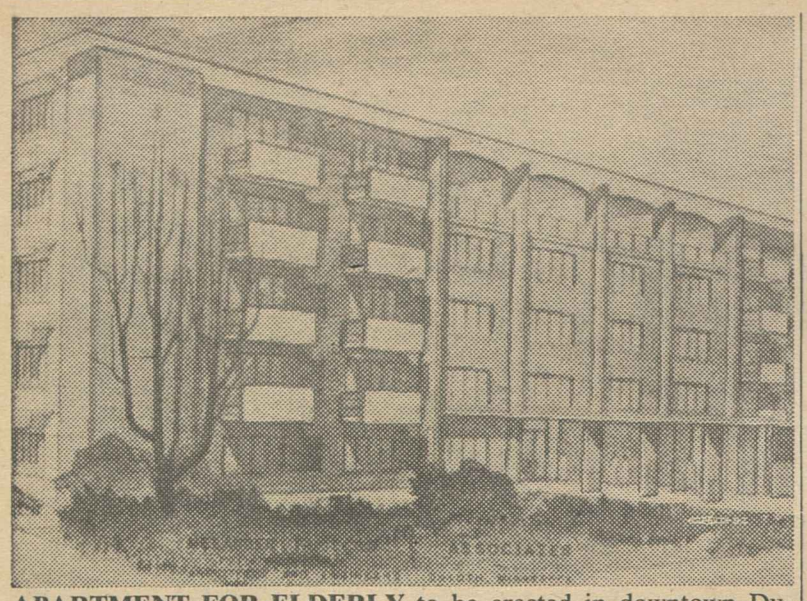
"To the primary job of organizing unorganized workers within our jurisdiction, we can now devote all of our efforts, energies and combined strength."

UAW, 'Big Three' Extend SUB

Detroit—The Auto Workers have reached agreement with the industry's "Big Three" to assure additional supplemental unemployment benefits for laid-off workers during the period of the new federal temporary unemployment compensation law.

The union announced the signing of memorandums of understanding with Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp., similar to agreements entered into earlier with General Motors Corp., under which UAW members will receive a maximum of 39 weeks of SUB benefits. This new ceiling, the same as the one established under TUC, replaces the previous limit of 26 weeks.

The UAW also negotiated similar pacts for extended SUB benefits with American Motors Corp. and Eaton Manufacturing Co. to provide added financial aid to long-term jobless auto workers.



APARTMENT FOR ELDERLY to be erected in downtown Duluth, Minn., under auspices of vacation fund of Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 31 and union employers, is shown in an architect's drawing. An $864,000 loan for the 65-suite project has been approved by the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Union-Backed Homes For Elderly Approved

Duluth, Minn.—The Housing & Home Finance Agency has approved a loan of $864,000 in federal funds to build the first union-sponsored housing project of its kind, a 65-suite apartment for elderly persons in downtown Duluth.

The private building venture was sponsored by union and employer trustees of the Duluth Electrical Workers Vacation Fund after a survey showed that elderly workers would prefer to stay in Duluth instead of moving to a faraway location after they retire.

Agency Dir. Robert C. Weaver approved the application under a program of direct loans for homes for the elderly, for which Congress last year appropriated $20 million.

In Washington, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has commended IBEW Local 31 and Vacation Fund trustees for their work in planning the five-story apartment.

Pointing out that the project is unusual among housing projects for the elderly in that it will be built in the city's downtown section, Freeman said the sponsors decided to ask prospective tenants where they would like such an apartment to be built.

"They found," said the IBEW president, "that workers wanted to stay where they could continue their active participation in community activities, without the need to set up new friendships and new relationships." He added: "So the fund selected a site served by transit lines, and in the heart of an area with stores and community facilities."

Freeman said he hoped the project would set a pattern for other unions with funds to invest in major urban areas.

Officers of the Vacation Fund have set up a non-profit organization to build and operate the apartment. Planned for occupancy by July 1, 1962, the building will have 46 efficiency suites, 16 with one bedroom and three with two bedrooms.

It will have a lounge, meeting room, snack bar, craft and hobby rooms, and a sun deck protected by glass shields from the high winds of the upper Great Lakes. Units will be open to all eligible persons over 62 at rents ranging from $51 a month for an efficiency unit, $67 to $80 for one-bedroom units, to $110 or $115 for the two-bedroom suite.

Trustees of the IBEW-employer fund are Business Mgr. Clyde Giles and Merle Chapin of Local 31, Wesley Harkonen and Abe Solon of the National Electrical Contractors Association.

First Handbill In Japanese Aids ACWA

Honolulu—The Clothing Workers' first organizing handbill in the Japanese language is winning attention—and results—in an ACWA membership campaign in Hawaii, the nation's newest state.

Leaflets in English and Japanese have been used to carry two principal messages to unorganized workers—"You are the union" and "The Amalgamated way is the American way."

The union has won National Labor Relations Board elections at two plants and expects to petition for elections at others soon.

Asking prospective members "Who runs the union?" the Amalgamated answers "You do," and lists some of the ways in which ACWA members govern themselves democratically. Its latest handbill says, in Japanese:

"You elect your own officers;

"You run your own local union affairs;

"You set the amount of dues you pay;

"You cannot have a strike unless you vote to strike by secret ballot;

"You elect your own negotiating committee;

"You choose your own shop stewards;

"You decide important policies and actions by majority vote."

Despite Lack of Transfer Clause:

Court Rules 'Runaway' Victims Have Job Rights in New Plant

New York—Employes of a company who lost their jobs in a "runaway" plant situation are entitled to damages in spite of the fact that their expired contract did not have any transfer clause, the U.S. Second Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled.

By a 2-1 vote, the court reversed a lower federal court and sent the case back for further proceedings. The majority was made up of Judge Sterry R. Waterman and Judge J. Warren Madden, who wrote the opinion.

The decision, the first of its kind from a U.S. appeals court, involved the action of the Glidden Co. on Nov. 30, 1957, in closing its Durkee Famous Foods plant at Elmhurst, N. Y., and opening a new plant in Bethlehem, Pa.

Suit Filed by Employes

A suit for damages was filed against the company by five members of Local 852 of the unaffiliated Teamsters. Contending that as beneficiaries of the expired contract they were entitled to jobs created by the opening of the new plant, they asked damages on the ground that their rights under the former contract entitled them to job proffers in Bethlehem with the seniority acquired at Elmhurst.

Reviewing the arguments, the court majority referred to the company's "bold position" that the collective bargaining agreement conferred upon the employes no rights that survived the contract after it expired Nov. 30, 1957.

The majority cited several New York court decisions supporting the argument that "rights embodied in a collective bargaining contract enure to the direct benefit of employes and may be the subject of" a lawsuit.

It pointed out that the Glidden Co. still is living up to provisions of the expired Elmhurst contract by continuing to give retirement pay to those 65 and over; by giving pay also to early retirees and disabled employes; and by promising vested rights at 65 to those who had reached 45 when the plant was closed.

The company argued that it had offered "fair consideration" to job applications from Elmhurst employes if they would go to Bethlehem and apply there on the same basis as new employes.

"We can see no expense or embarrassment" which would have resulted if the company had adopted a "more rational, not to say humane, construction of its contract," the court said, and the company should have offered jobs with accrued seniority to the Elmhurst workers.

Chief Judge J. Edward Lumbard of the Appeals Court, dissenting, said the issue was not whether the employer "acted ungenerously, as indeed it has" but whether it followed the contract. The court must interpret the contract on which the parties agreed and not "substitute for it one with more humane or less destructive terms."

The issue was whether the agreement gave the employes the right to "follow the work" to the new location, he said, and he said it did not.

"Surely unions are now fully of age," he said, "and are able to protect themselves and their members at the bargaining table."

Son of Steward Wins Scholarship

New York—The Maritime Union has awarded its annual $10,000 college scholarship to Donald R. Carlson of Lansing, Ill., whose father is chief steward on a Great Lakes oil tanker.

The scholarship winner, who is eligible for up to $2,500 a year for tuition and expenses for four years at college, is chosen in an annual competition open to children of NMU members. Harvard University Prof. John T. Dunlop headed the board of judges.

Chester Workers Sign Ford Rehiring Pact

Chester, Pa.—The Auto Workers have ratified an agreement with the Ford Motor Co. under which many of the 1,250 former employes of the closed Chester assembly plant will have job rights at three other Ford plants.

Dir. Ken Bannon of the UAW's Ford Dept. said the company accepted a plan including two of three major union proposals for softening the impact of the shutdown.

Bannon said union and management agreed that these steps shall be taken for members of UAW Local 918:

- Members whose work is being transferred either to Mahwah, N. J., or Norfolk, Va., plants will have job rights at those locations with full seniority.
- Members who desire to be transferred to the Falcon-Comet plant at Matuchen, N. J., will be placed in that plant when additional workers are required, with seniority dating from time of entry at Metuchen.
- Early retirement provisions will be applied to all Chester employes aged 60 to 65, and to other workers at the time they reach 60, providing they have not accepted other employment with the company or severed their relationship.

The agreement also provides that ex-employes who would have been eligible for vacation on June 1 will get their vacation pay.

Bannon said the agreement was approved unanimously by the Local 918 membership, and that the Ford department received full cooperation from locals at other plants where Chester workers would be placed.

The Chester plant closed Mar. 10 despite pleas for reconsideration by members of Local 918, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Gov. David L. Lawrence (D-Pa.) and others. The UAW carried its campaign to Ford Pres. Henry Ford II.

Final agreement was reached not long after Bannon appealed to Ford. Since the settlement, about 150 workers have agreed to move to Mahwah at once and another 150 within 30 days. Moving to Norfolk are an additional 25. Others have until Dec. 31 to apply for preferential hiring at the Metuchen plant.

Green Fund Gives $50,000 To Institute

Champaign, Ill.—The Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations at the University of Illinois here has received a $50,000 contribution for its building fund from the William Green Memorial Fund.

The gift in memory of the late president of the former AFL will be used for the construction of a new building at the institute. The Illinois General Assembly recently voted $350,000 for this purpose.

In a letter to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, University Pres. David D. Henry expressed gratitude for labor's gift, "both for its importance to the fulfillment of our building plans and as evidence of the confidence of your organization in the teaching and research activities of the institute and the university."

Martin Wagner, director of the Labor and Industrial Relations Institute, also wrote Schnitzler "to convey . . . the gratitude of the entire institute staff for your support of our undertaking."

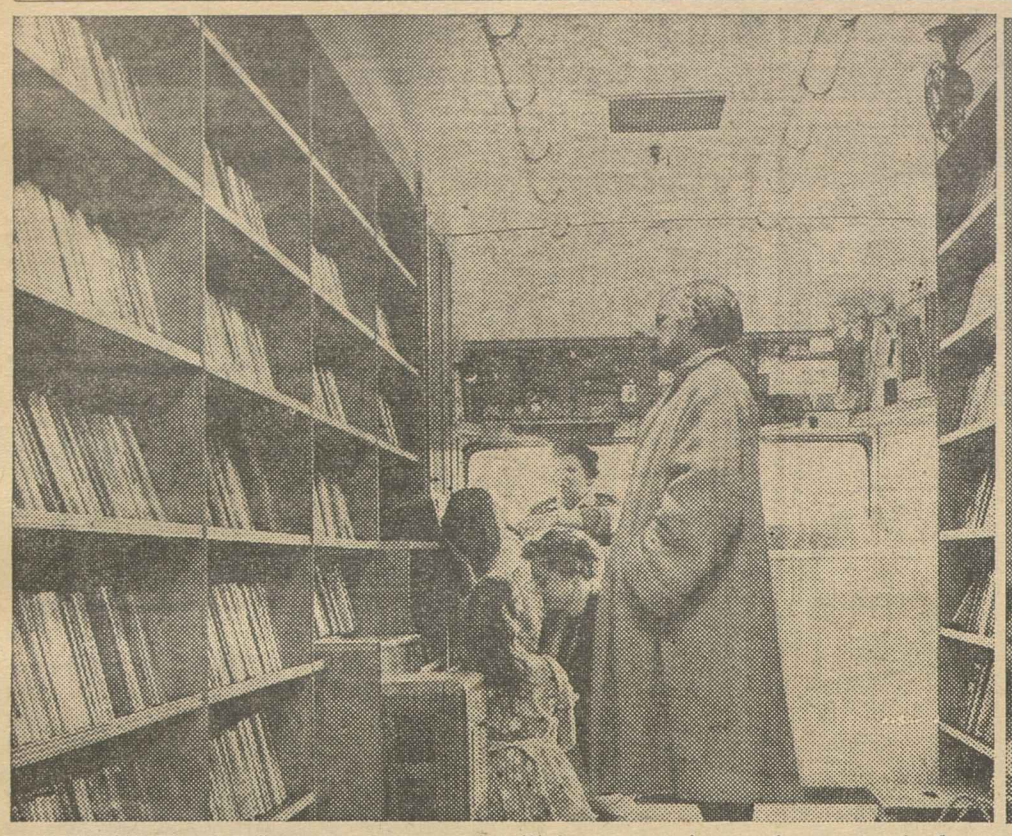
AMALGAMATED CLOTHING WORKERS OF AMERICA, AFL-CIO
212 McCandless Building
Honolulu 13, Hawaii

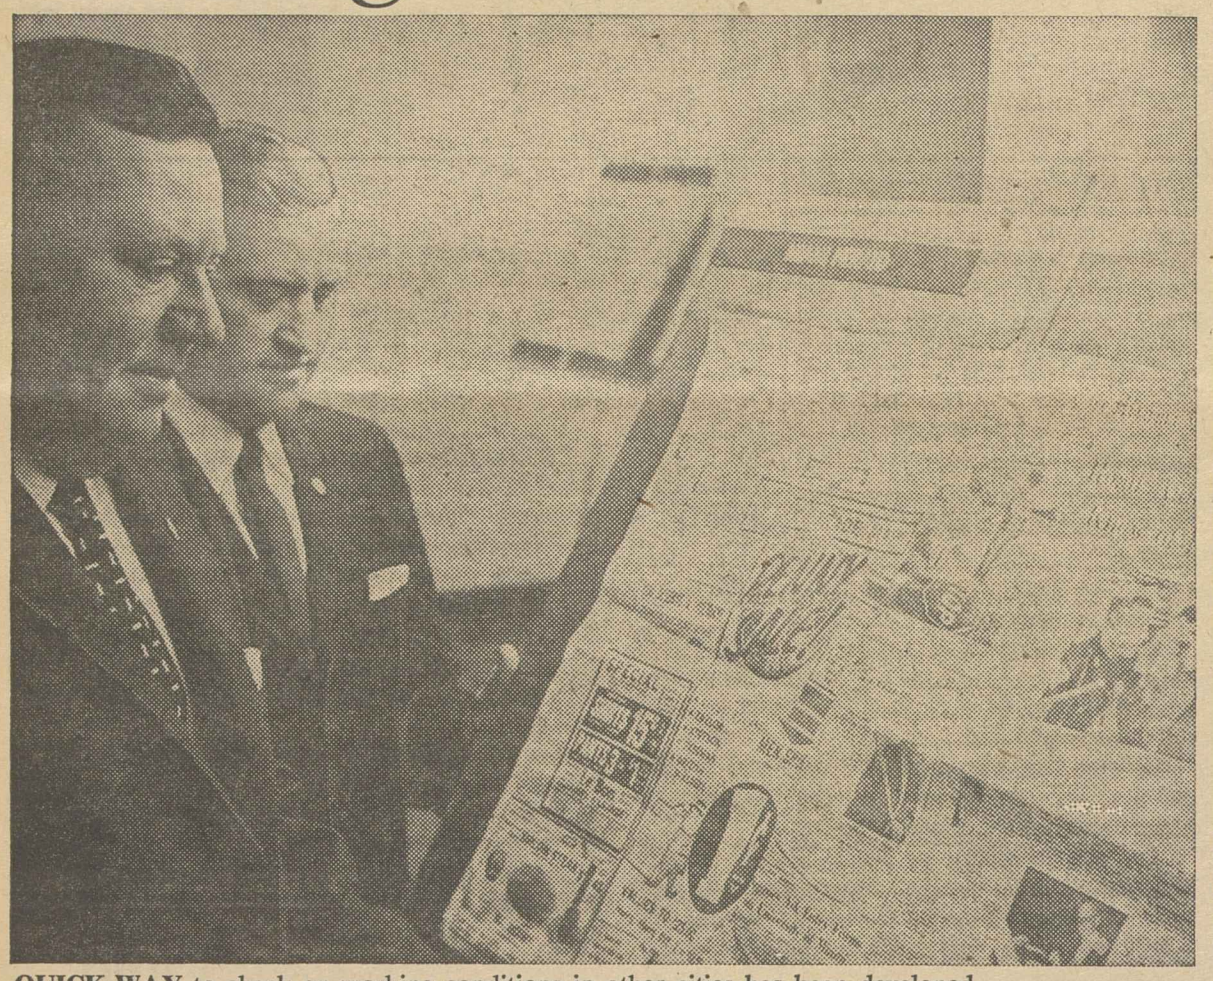
YOU ARE THE UNION, this handbill tells prospective members of the Clothing Workers in Japanese. Circulated in an ACWA organizing drive in Hawaii, the message also assures readers that "The Amalgamated way is the American way," and lists 13 reasons why members can be served by a democratically-run union.



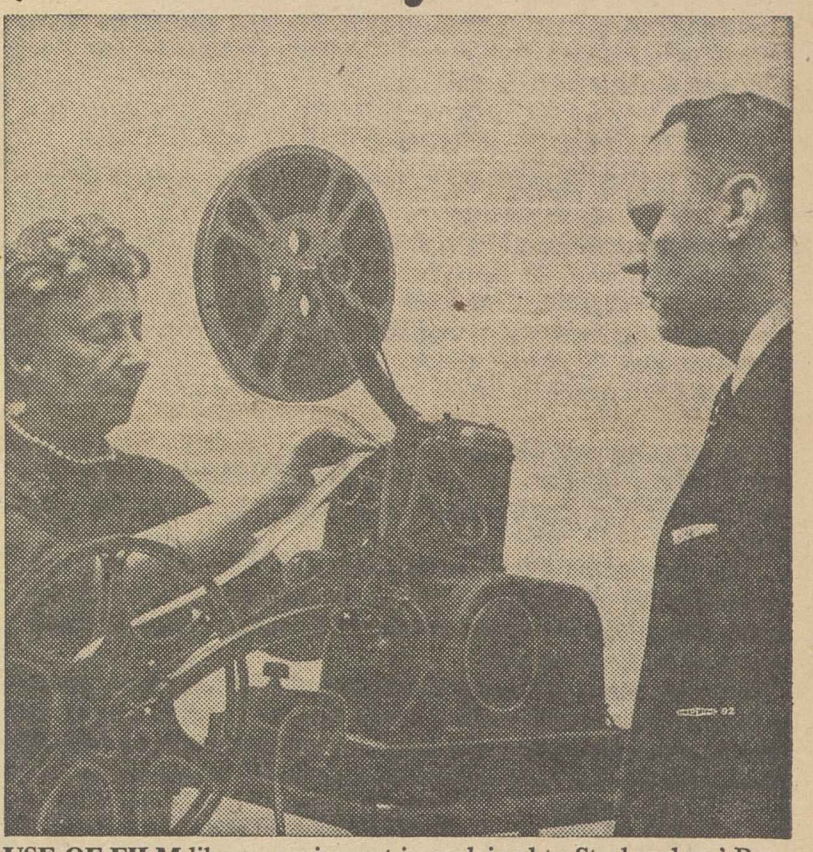
UNION MEMBERS across the country will focus attention on how to make best use of public libraries during Apr. 17-22 observance of National Library Week. One method of utilizing facilities is scheduling of bookmobile, like one used by Cincinnati Public Library, for plant-gate visits during noon hour.

SPEAKERS' BUREAUS operated by libraries can provide a two-way street for labor, helping to supply speakers for union meetings and using unionists to tell labor's story to other groups. Here William L. Kircher, AFL-CIO assistant director of Region IX, confers with Cincinnati Librarian Margaret Sanger on subject.

Making the Best Use of Library Week

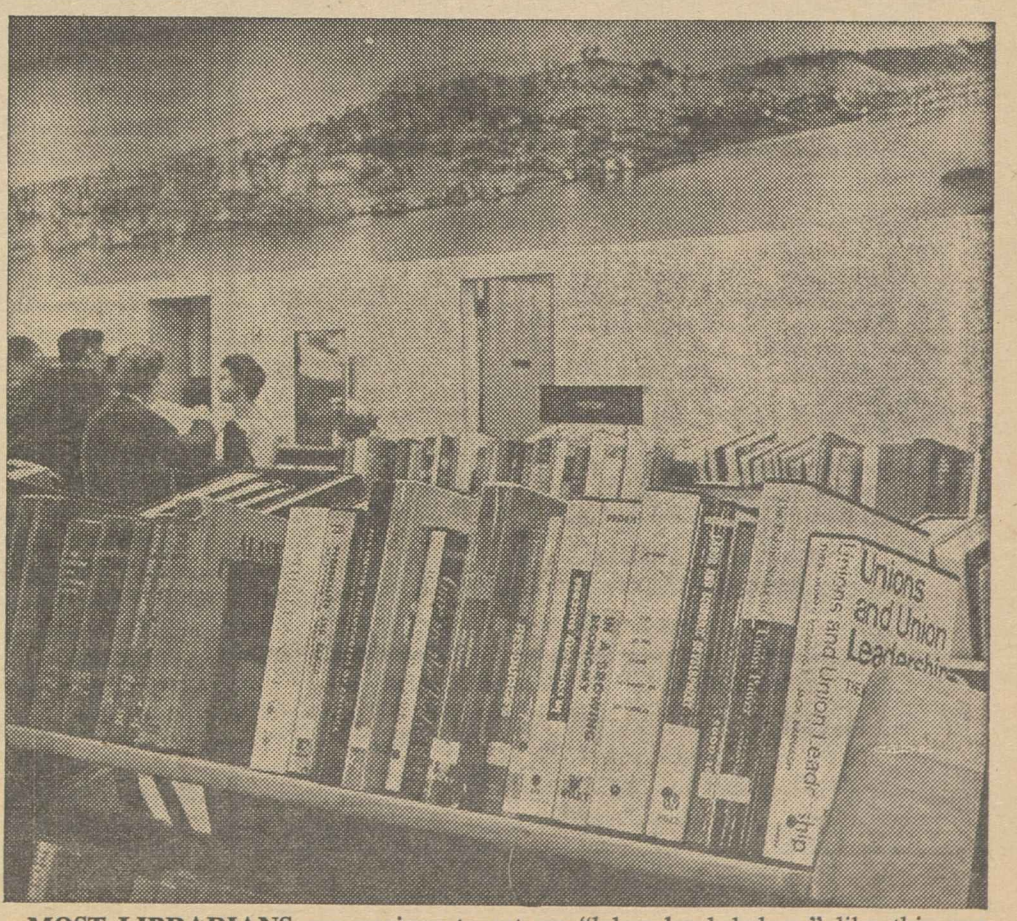


QUICK WAY to check on working conditions in other cities has been developed by Sec.-Treas. Freeman Bryant (left) and Pres. Oscar G. Lee of Cincinnati Cooks' Local 177, who study Miami Herald issue at library for business trends. Labor participation in Library Week has been urged on all local unions and central bodies by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.



USE OF FILM library equipment is explained to Steelworkers' Rep. Robert Bollard by Miss Karline Brown of Cincinnati Library. Free public libraries have been hailed by labor as "an essential part" of the nation's educational opportunities.

LABOR AND INDUSTRY often join forces in setting up special exhibits in libraries. Shown at Cincinnati beer exhibit are Business Agent William Sheehan (left) of Brewery Workers Local 199, and the union's education and research director, James Wolfe.



MOST LIBRARIANS are anxious to set up "labor bookshelves," like this one in Cincinnati, to help tell the union story. The AFL-CIO has urged affiliates to establish similar programs during National Library Week and to encourage trade union use of library facilities to help unionists "become better citizens."

Political Doctors

THE AMERICAN Medical Association's allergic reaction to "political medicine" apparently does not extend to doctors. Or maybe they have a peculiar sort of immunity, because they're up to their stethoscopes in politics at the moment and going in deeper.

Some time this month the AMA is scheduled to step up its political campaign to kill proposals to incorporate health care for the aged under the social security system. It plans a series of expensive newspaper ads carrying the message already distributed to thousands of doctors in the form of office and waiting room posters, leaflets and handbills: that helping the aged meet the cost of medical care under social security is "socialized medicine."

The AMA's right to lobby for its position is not in question. But using the prestige of the physician to sell a political position on legislation through the distribution of political literature in his office is not in keeping with the image that most Americans have of their physicians—the men and women to whom they turn for health care and advice, not a political pitch.

The intensity of the AMA campaign and its lavish expenditures are all the more questionable in light of the issue.

Pres. Kennedy has proposed, and the AFL-CIO strongly supports, legislation to help meet the costs of health care for 14 million people now 65 and older through the tried and tested social insurance mechanism.

The Anderson-King bill, containing the President's proposals, includes standard safeguards for the freedom of patients to choose their own doctors, hospitals, etc. Physicians will continue to have full responsibility for decisions on patients' care, including the need for hospitalization.

The proposed legislation does not permit any federal agency to interfere with hospital administration or to supervise or control the practice of medicine. Patient-doctor relationships would not be affected, and good quality hospital and nursing home services would be encouraged.

It is extremely difficult to understand, in terms of the legislation, what the AMA is fussing about, why it must ask doctors to plaster their office walls with posters and distribute political leaflets along with prescriptions to their patients.

Putting Money to Work

A DRAMATIC DEMONSTRATION of how to put union-negotiated welfare funds to work for the good of the community and to meet pressing social needs has taken place in Duluth, Minn.

Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 31 had in past years negotiated a vacation fund with employers. As with many such funds, the money was deposited in banks or in government securities. The union and management trustees decided to put the money to a more socially useful purpose and sponsored a downtown apartment development for elderly persons.

The Housing and Home Finance Agency quickly approved a loan for the project under legislation passed last year and a nonprofit organization has been set up to build and operate the apartment.

The vacation fund trustees demonstrated also a sympathy and understanding of the needs of elderly persons by carefully investigating where the apartment should be located to be of greatest value to the occupants.

There are many such opportunities available to union-operated or jointly-administered welfare funds across the nation, opportunities to use union-negotiated monies for the community welfare.

Tradition Reversed:

Transfusion of European Blood Revitalizes Old-Line U.S. Firm

The following is reprinted from the April 6 issue of The Machinist, weekly publication of the Machinists.

A NEW LINE OF Underwood typewriters went to market last week. The event, heralded in full-page advertisements in 98 daily newspapers, marked the beginning of a new era in the industrial development of the U.S.A.

For the first time, a doddering, old-line U.S. company has been refinanced, revitalized and refurbished with foreign capital, foreign engineering and foreign initiative.

The new blood comes from Italy and its Olivetti Co., manufacturers of quality business machines for more than half a century.

For the members of IAM District 26 at Hartford, Conn., the transfusion came in the nick of time. Underwood was dying and its 2,500 employes were suffering from recurring layoffs. Prior to the summer of 1960, when Olivetti bought control of Underwood and its sprawling typewriter plant at Hartford, there had been a five-month layoff.

Since Olivetti took over, there have been no layoffs. The work force has grown to 3,300 employes. Old equipment has been moved out and new machine tools installed. The typewriters have been redesigned and production re-engineered. They're now painting the factory and installing improved lighting.

Production of all but one adding machine and the portable typewriter were discontinued. Italian-made Olivettis will be sold instead. But Underwood standard typewriters and Underwood electric typewriters are coming off the lines at Hartford at the rate of 6,000 a month, more than twice the old production.

Last week, The Machinist sat down in Underwood's old, oak-paneled executive offices at One Park Place, New York City, with Ugo Galassi, lately of Ivrea, Italy. He is past president of the Olivetti Corp. of America and now president of Underwood with a payroll of 9,000 U.S. personnel.

HOW CAN AN ITALIAN management expect to make money in the United States at a time when so many American manufacturers are shifting production to new plants in Europe and Asia?

Galassi, a man who has so far mobilized $51 million in cash and credits in revitalizing Underwood, laughed at the question.

"We have found tremendous cooperation with the people in the factory," he declared. "Our people perform with spirit; they want to give the maximum and we want to take care of them."

But what about higher wage rates in Hartford?

"Production costs per unit are comparable with those in Italy and in our other factories," Galassi declared. "Americans work faster than the average European worker. Of course, in Europe there is less turnover. You know, in Europe we don't lay off a man because inventories are too high. We take care of our people first. After all, the biggest asset of any corporation is its people. We like to talk about people-value, instead of book value."

Since the Olivetti management moved in, IAM District 26 has negotiated two 5 percent package increases to make up for the period of no raises under the old management.

Notwithstanding, Galassi said production costs have been cut 30 percent by modernizing equipment and improving engineering.

"No," Galassi was positive, "it is not true that higher wages in the United States are pricing American products out of the world market."

Galassi's explanation was so simple it was startling. He said: "Mass production." He said: "We're going to compete with typewriters made in Italy. No, we won't make big profits. We will make a little on each typewriter and we'll sell a lot. No, we won't price our typewriters to make a profit when we only operate at 50 percent of capacity."

Did Olivetti receive any financial inducements to invest in the U.S.A., inducements such as European governments are offering to attract American industries? On the contrary, Galassi said he had met nothing but obstacles, including an investigation by the Justice Dept.'s Anti-Trust Div. The investigation stopped after the government discovered what sad shape Underwood was in.

Joe Cronin, manager of IAM District 26, told The Machinist:

"If it hadn't been for the purchase of the old Underwood firm by the new management, many of our union members would now be on the breadlines and Hartford would have become a depressed area.

"INSTEAD, OLIVETTI management has increased employment approximately 30 percent at a time when most companies were laying off. We have negotiated two raises with the new management, one for 3.5 percent and one for 3 percent, plus improvements in our pension plan, our hospitalization and other insurance."

Morgan Says:

Economic Health of U. S. Makes Weak Spots Hard to Pick Out

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

THE HEADLINES SAY auto sales were brisk in March and Chrysler plans a 40 percent production boost. Detroit's hotel lobbies are teeming with lusty types of all ages in blazers and business suits—spectators and participants in that marathon of sporting events, the American Bowling Congress tournament, a six-week affair that makes a six-day bicycle race seem like a trifle. The store windows are twinkling with spring fashions and the tender green of April is driving winter from the surroundings of this unhandsome but vital city, the mecca of the motor car. Where, then, is this ugly thing called the recession?

Morgan

Detroiters themselves, as a matter of fact, sometimes dodge its impact, even though they are living in the very midst of one of the most critical economic areas in the country. After a recent snowstorm, a man asked a local housewife if she wanted her sidewalk cleared. "No," she said, "my son can do it when he gets home from school." The man muttered and started to turn away but something about his dejection touched the woman and she told him to go to work. When he'd finished and she was paying him she asked if things were really bad. "Worse than in the Thirties," he said. "Then at least everybody knew there was a depression." The man was 58, had not had a steady job for more than two years.

The country is far, far healthier than it was 30 years ago, which makes its weak spots hard to see, like an incipient fire in a coal mine or the first cancer cells. But the story is there, in the faces and in the figures. Advance statistics show unemployment in Michigan in mid-March totaled 417,000 or 14 percent of the labor force—twice the national average. This is up 10,000 from February and 219,000 from a year ago. One out of every six persons in Detroit's working population is without a job.

There was nothing phony in the story about quickened car sales despite the fact that Chrysler had just announced the closing of three assembly plants next week, Ford two. The trend is up. But what the headlines don't reflect is the fact that despite the upturn, it was the lowest sales performance for March since 1958.

PERHAPS THE MOST malignant matter in the whole picture is what the experts refer to as the hard core of unemployment. In the city of Detroit alone, according to Public Welfare Dept. figures, there were 10,853 families on relief on Mar. 17, with 2,500 cases pending. That is more than double the load three years ago. Even if industrial activity were to pick up 100 percent—which is simply not in the cards—the jobless rolls would not be cut back to their former levels. In the country at large nearly 2 million people have been out of work 15 weeks or more. As the recession recedes, as it were, the more temporarily idle may be re-employed but a distressing number will remain permanently unemployed. And after each recession that total gets larger, partly because of the new millions pouring into the labor force. It is estimated that 25,000 new jobs a week will have to be found in the '60s for young people entering the labor market.

How to convert this treadmill into an escalator? The aid-to-depressed-areas legislation, now in conference committee in Congress, is a start but it's hardly a toe in the door. The truth is that until very recently neither government, management, labor or the public has given this problem of adjustment to automation and other technological changes affecting employment the attention it deserved. We are going through another industrial revolution of sorts but we have lacked the revolutionary thinking needed to adapt to the radical changes which inventions, new processes and new policies have wrought in our economy.

Retraining displaced workers for new skills is part of the answer but this is a huge task for which we have not prepared. When some Auto Workers' official suggested such a program to the aircraft industry the answer was, in effect, why should we spend our money training people for careers in chemicals or services? The UAW itself got about a 3 percent response from the rank and file to one of its efforts to offer courses in new trades.

There is reportedly some fear around the Labor Dept. that even if we continue to climb out of the recession, the Sixties may be cursed with an unemployment figure persisting around 5 million. Some trade union economists think a federally-sponsored technological clearing house might help, protecting industry's needs confidentially and then training accordingly. Before this is shot down as creeping socialism we'd best face the fact that along some avenues our capitalism has been reduced to a crawl and this in itself is creepy.

Washington Reports:

Union Members To Be Needed In Peace Corps, Senators Say

MAJOR EMPHASIS has been on young students in the projected Peace Corps, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.) asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 460 radio stations, but it will also include skilled trade unionists, farmers, teachers and doctors.

Humphrey said he expected that his bill to authorize the corps will be passed at this session of Congress with the corps in operation in the late fall. Pilot projects, he predicted, will be under way before that.

Sen. Alexander Wiley (R-Wis.), ranking Republican member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, of which Humphrey is also a member, said the objectives of the corps are good, but he urged that the U.S. "go slow."

"Fundamentally, the Peace Corps, or any program of that nature, depends upon the quality, the capability, the dedication of the individuals involved in its activities," he said.

"These factors must be considered: careful screening, proper training in the language of the host country, obtaining the necessary skills to be of real help to the people in the visited land, proper education to avoid actions that might violate the culture, customs and sense of good conduct of the local people, and the ability of some persons to adapt from our relatively high standard of living to standards that are sometimes almost at a primitive level. For the volunteers, even though dedicated and idealistic, this will be no joy ride."

BOTH SAID THAT trade unionists would be needed. Humphrey said he was hopeful that "we would draw also from our farm cooperatives, our rural life groups, from many of the voluntary groups where a person may not have any college training at all. What we want is not a college diploma; what we want is skill."

Both also spoke of the importance of making certain that the corps is free of infiltrators.

"I can well imagine that some of the Communist groups would like nothing better than to infiltrate," Humphrey said. "There will be preventive precautionary measures to see that doesn't happen."

He urged staging areas near the area of service to help members of the corps become acclimated.

Wiley felt that the project should be restricted to a few hundred persons at first.

"Eventually the program will expand," he declared, "but I believe it would be a serious mistake to shot-gun ill-trained, ill-equipped students, no matter how well-meaning and dedicated they may be, around the globe."

Humphrey was most hopeful about the results of the Peace Corps operation which, he said, had been planned a year ago.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

PRES. KENNEDY'S special message to Congress on the government's regulatory agencies—the Federal Power Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the National Labor Relations Board and others—was not nearly so drastic in reform proposals as was recommended last year by James M. Landis, his adviser on the agencies. Approval of its basic requests would still go a long way toward improving the work of the agencies.

A common observation in the capital is that when an agency is set up to regulate an industry—such as the radio and television industry, the natural gas business—the industry sooner or later manages to capture it.

One of the reasons is simple delay in processing cases, which in the case of the FPC has produced what Kennedy called an "incredible backlog" of 4,000 natural gas rate and pipeline construction cases.

Another is the fact that when the political complexion of the country changes—as it did in both the White House and Congress in the Eisenhower years—the agencies tend to reflect the change.

A specific example is the FPC itself. In the Truman years, the Senate refused to confirm for continued service two members who had led the way in insisting on strict regulation of natural gas prices. After Mr. Eisenhower had named all the FPC members, the commission's activity deteriorated to such an extent that the Supreme Court ruled the agency was declining to enforce the law under which it was created.

IN THE SENATE at the present moment two FPC nominations submitted by Kennedy are pending. Howard Morgan, a former public utilities commissioner from Oregon, and Joseph C. Swidler, formerly of the Tennessee Valley Authority, are being meticulously examined so that senators who favor private utilities over public power can assure themselves that Swidler and Morgan will not lean toward public power unduly.

Swidler told the Senate Commerce Committee frankly that he thought the FPC had a responsibility to force down gas rates on its own initiative, even in the absence of complaints from consumers, if the commission thinks the rates are too high.

It has been a long time since the FPC has had a member with this philosophy of his job. Yet it can be read into the statute under which Congress created the agency. It may properly be claimed that if Congress wants the system changed it should do so by revising the law, not by allowing or insisting on a stacking of the commission with people who have no intention of enforcing the statute as it exists.

An increase in the size of the agencies, a revision of their operations so as to free the board members of small administrative duties, would help greatly. Most important of all, however, is philosophy—a belief that the agencies should fulfill the protective and public-interest functions for which they were created.

SEN. JAMES O. EASTLAND (D-Miss.) is not one of the timid souls who dreams small dreams. Right-wingers generally, disliking the Supreme Court's decisions in segregation and so-called subversion cases, say they think Chief Justice Earl Warren should be impeached. This is said to be a major objective of the John Birch groups, among whom are gathered sundry racists, "right-to-workers," former presidents of the National Association of Manufacturers and lunatic-fringers.

Eastland has a more sweeping program. He's in favor of impeaching the whole Supreme Court, from Justice Hugo Lafayette Black, senior legatee of the Roosevelt era, to Justice Potter Stewart, last of the five Eisenhower appointees.

Probably Eastland would have wanted to impeach old Chief Justice John Marshall in his day. Marshall was the great jurist who laid the foundation for the doctrines of the supremacy of federal law and liberal construction of the Constitution that the present court applied in the segregation and subversion cases.

BECAUSE OF THEIR SKILLS, trade unionists will be important members of the projected Peace Corps, Sen. Hubert Humphrey (D-Minn.), majority whip, on left, and Sen. Alexander Wiley (R-Wis.), ranking Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, agreed in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational radio program.

How to Buy:

Consumers Getting a Chance To Squeeze Water Out of Ham

By Sidney Margolius

PROTESTS OVER the recent federal ruling that packers may inject 10 percent water into smoked hams, shoulders and butts, may force its repeal. The U.S. Agriculture Dept. will hold meetings in various areas, beginning late in April, to reopen the question.

The ruling permitting the additional water, or "pickle solution" as the Agriculture Dept. prefers to call it, was one of the last official acts of former Agriculture Sec. Benson's administration. Consumer organizations have been especially angry because they feel the action resembled getaway night at a traveling carnival, when anything goes.

The Benson administration put through the ruling without the customary public hearing, although meat inspection officials insist that consumer organizations were asked for their opinions. Only the labor unions, doubling as consumer representatives, offered much response to the first call for comment on the proposed addition of water to smoked pork products, a government official told this writer. There was a little response from women's clubs but none from most other consumer organizations, he says.

At the forthcoming hearings reopening the question, any consumer, either as an organization representative or as an individual, can speak up or file a statement of his views on the question of adding water to smoked ham, according to C. H. Pals, director of the U.S. Meat Inspection Div. Time and place of hearings will be announced in local papers, or can be learned from the Meat Inspection Div., U.S. Agriculture Dept., Washington 25, D. C.

Actually, the situation in non-federally inspected hams is even worse. In most states there is little or no regulation of hams and other products cured locally. Thus while the public is protesting the addition of up to 10 percent water to cured pork products sold in interstate commerce, those sold within the borders of most states sometimes have as much as 30 percent water.

You actually can see the water or "pickling solution" run off some hams. This writer purchased several smoked hams in recent weeks. In every instance you could see the moisture inside the transparent wrapping and even squeeze water out of the ham. Veda Mueller, of the Cooperative League, also reports this experience.

The government's publicly-stated reason for permitting water to be pumped into federally-inspected smoked hams, was that the public nowadays prefers a "juicier" ham.

Curiously, this column which receives many comments from consumers on all sorts of questions, never got one demanding juicier hams.

THE REAL REASON is not that consumers asked for more water, but rather interstate meat packers were unhappy because local packers have been adding water right along. Pals says that even in states where there is some regulation of the water content, enforcement is weak.

In at least three key states—Illinois, Iowa and New York—proposed laws would bring state rules into line with federal regulations. In Illinois, for example, a proposed law would require that smoked hams carry a label stating that they don't have more than 110 percent of their uncured weight.

This is somewhat better than the present lack of any regulation, but it still, of course, does permit that controversial 10 percent of water as in the federal rules.

WHAT'S REALLY PAINING consumer and farm organizations is not only the addition of water, which they unanimously say is unnecessary, but that there is little or no price reduction to make up for the water. There is little change in the differential between smoked and ready-to-eat hams this year and last year, that this writer can find in the market reports from several cities.

If you and your organization plan to urge repeal of watered ham, one useful request would be to ask that all meats be labeled plainly with the percentage of added water.

You get even more water when you buy processed cheeses, in fact, a fantastic amount in some brands. Here the amount of water is stated on the label. But the way it's stated apparently fools many people. It's called "moisture."

Some of the cheeses sold in jars, like "smokey" cheese and "cheese and bacon" are actually more water than cheese. One widely sold brand of cheese in jars actually contains 60 percent "moisture." Another contains 46 percent, a third, 52 percent.

CITY OF HOPE AWARD to AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. is accepted by IUD Pres. Walter P. Reuther, right. The plaque, expressing "grateful appreciation" for a $10,000 grant to establish a medical research fellowship, is presented by Louis Solomon, labor director of the City of Hope. The labor-backed medical center, at Duarte, Calif., was established to pioneer new concepts in medical research and treatment and provide free care for patients.

Meany Lauds USO On 20th Anniversary

THE "WHOLEHEARTED PARTICIPATION" of organized labor in the 20th anniversary observance of the United Service Organizations has been pledged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

In a letter to USO Chairman Harvey Firestone, Jr., he also expressed confidence that "the 13.5 million members of the AFL-CIO will continue their efforts in behalf of USO."

Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and an AFL-CIO vice president, pledged the continued cooperation of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, of which he is chairman. He noted that the USO program "finds a quick and easy response in the hearts of trade unionists and their families throughout the country."

In his letter to Firestone, Meany recalled that in an age of atomic power, "it is all too easy to forget the millions of Americans who must, in any conflict, stand in the forefront of our defensive effort."

"APART FROM ITS MANY vital services to the men and women in our armed forces," he wrote, "USO performs an important function in helping America to remember. USO reminds all of us of our responsibility to those who must live and work in the shadow of world tension and cold war conflict."

Organized labor has shared "a deep awareness" of this obligation with the USO since its inception, he pointed out.

"Members of the AFL-CIO have given firm financial support and have participated directly in the planning and program of USO," he said.

"Over the years, we have been especially proud of the members of our entertainment unions who have given so freely and so nobly of their talents in virtually every spot on the globe where American troops have been stationed."

A nationwide effort to "stimulate labor participation in community observances" of the anniversary is receiving the cooperation of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, according to CSA Dir. Leo Perlis.

From Soup to Nonsense:

The Bard Said They're 'Begot Of Nothing but Vain Fantasy'

By Jane Goodsell

THE FOLLOWING STATEMENTS bear no resemblance to anything anybody has ever said to me, but I can dream, can't I?

"I hope you won't mind my asking, but did you buy your suit in Paris?"

"Congratulations, lady! That was the most beautiful job of parking I ever saw. You didn't have an inch to spare. I've been standing here watching you, and I bet myself you'd never make it."

"Why no, Mother, I don't need a new dress for the dance. My old one is perfectly good, and I've only worn it a few times."

"You wear a size 10, don't you?"

"Honey, tell them the joke about the two psychiatrists. You tell stories much better than I do."

"I understand perfectly why you don't want to be on the Ways and Means Committee. It's a nasty job and I wouldn't accept it if I were you."

"Your house is always in such perfect order. Do you have full-time help?"

"In checking over our past accounts, we have discovered a clerical error in your favor. We are therefore enclosing our check in the amount of. . . ."

"Would you consider an offer of $35,000 for your house?"

"OOPS, I'M SORRY! For a minute I could have sworn you were Jacqueline Kennedy!"

"Would you mind telling me who does your hair? It always looks so lovely."

"Would you like to have breakfast in bed?"

"I'm sorry, but the dentist will have to cancel his appointment with you for this morning. I'm afraid it will be at least a month before he can take you."

"Honey, I want to apologize. You were right, and I was wrong."

"D'you mean to tell me you graduated from high school with Joe Barnaby? Why, I'd have taken you for a good 10 years younger than he is."

"Gee, I'm sorry, but we won't be able to show you our vacation pictures of Yellowstone Park. I know how disappointed you must be, but something has gone wrong with the projection."

Pamphlet Asks Campaign For Health Care Letters

The AFL-CIO has published a new pamphlet designed to mobilize a letter-writing campaign urging Congress to enact the Anderson-King bill, supported by the Kennedy Administration, to provide health care for the aged through social security.

The pamphlet, entitled "How Can You Pay Health Bills After 65?" points out that 14 million people now 65 and older would benefit immediately under the program. In addition, those currently working would contribute between 2 and 3 cents a day during their productive years to cover the cost of health benefits after they retire.

"The bill includes standard safeguards for the freedom of patients to choose their own doctors, hospitals, etc.," the publication emphasizes. "Doctors will continue to have full responsibility for decisions on patient care, including the need for hospitalization . . . The bill does not permit the federal agency to interfere with hospital administration or control the practice of medicine."

Copies of "How Can You Pay Health Bills After 65?" are free in single copies; up to 100 copies, they are priced at 1 cent each; 75 cents per hundred, and $6 per thousand. They are available through the Pamphlet Division of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815-16th St., N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

15 GE Executives Go

Kefauver Committee Opens Price Probe

The echoes from the nation's biggest anti-trust conspiracy, involving rigged bids and price-fixing by 29 electrical equipment manufacturers, continued to reverberate through Capitol Hill, federal courts and stockholders' meetings with these new developments:

● Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) opened a major investigation into the details of the conspiracy by summoning 11 present or former officials of the price-rigging companies before his Senate anti-trust subcommittee.

● The Justice Dept. filed a second round of civil damage suits asking multi-million dollar penalties on behalf of the Tennessee Valley Authority and 12 government agencies, all of which paid what the government charges were "high and artificial" prices for electrical equipment.

● Federal Judge J. Cullen Ganey, who sentenced the 29 companies and 44 individual defendants to pay $2 million in fines and handed out seven jail terms, was asked to release the transcript of the secret grand jury investigation to aid states, municipalities and private utility companies prepare claims for overcharges against the companies. Following oral arguments, he reserved judgment.

● Westinghouse management had the votes to crush a stockholders' revolt at its annual meeting. The company defended its policy of retaining officials who were implicated in the anti-trust conspiracy on the grounds that they had the best interests of the company at heart and had been punished enough by the fines, jail sentences and publicity.

Westinghouse Pres. Mark W. Cresap, Jr., said he has written the National Electrical Manufacturers' Association suggesting that the trade group prepare a "code of ethics" for the industry. Ironically, it was while attending trade association meetings that most of the key figures in the anti-trust conspiracy got together to divide up business and set prices.

● General Electric, which faces a stockholders' meeting on Apr. 26, announced that all 15 of its executives who were sentenced in the anti-trust case have "left the company." A sixteenth GE official, whose sentencing was deferred because of ill health, told The Wall Street Journal that GE had sent him a typed resignation to sign. The official, William H. Schiek, added: "I asked if there was any alternative to resigning, and they said no."

GE has retained Clark Clifford, White House aide under former Pres. Truman and now a Washington attorney, to represent it in legal problems arising out of the anti-trust cases and subsequent civil damage claims against the company.

● Cleveland city officials opened an inquiry into recent identical bids of $68,691 for electric meters from five manufacturers, including GE and Westinghouse.

Cleveland Lighting Commissioner Vincent M. De Melto said it is "inconceivable . . . that companies making a product with varying features, such as is the case with these meters, should come up with identical costs on which to base their prices."

Kefauver said the purpose of the Senate hearings is "to find out how these violations by some of our wealthiest and most respected corporations could occur and how the consumer can be protected from their recurrence." He added:

"We want to know what pressures were put on executives of these companies to violate the anti-trust laws.

"We want to know if there have been additional violations of these laws.

"We want to know if the conspiracies went higher up in the corporate hierarchy than the individuals indicted by the grand jury.

"We want to know, finally, whether these cases involve serious deficiencies in the laws or inadequacy of enforcement."

The Justice Dept., which earlier sued to recover more than $12 million in damages from five manufacturers of oil and air circuit breakers, named 11 companies in its latest series of suits.

Defendants Listed

The suits listed purchases of power switchgear assemblies, transformers, turbine generators and other equipment by agencies including the Atomic Energy Commission, Air Force, Navy, Army, the Interior, Commerce, Defense and Agriculture Depts., Veterans Administration and others. General Electric and Westinghouse were named as defendants in each case.

Other companies sued—for double damages under the False Claims Act — were Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., I-T-E Circuit Breaker Co., Federal Pacific Electric Co., McGraw-Edison Co., Moloney Electric Co., Cutler-Hammer Co., Square-D Co., Wagner Electric Corp. and the Kuhlman Electric Co.

Drug Firm's Profit Dips After Kefauver Hearings

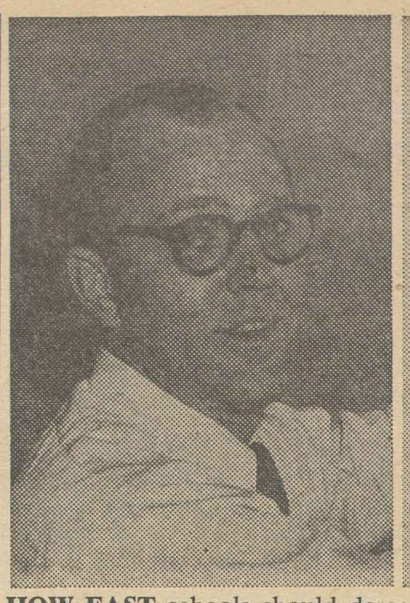
Bloomfield, N.J.—A drop in profits of the Schering Corp. last year has been blamed by the company's president on the Kefauver Senate subcommittee hearings which challenged the high prices and high profits of leading drug manufacturers.

Francis C. Brown, president of the firm, told a stockholders' meeting that since the Senate anti-trust investigation, "invitational bidding for supplies to governmental agencies has become more highly competitive, with consequent price deterioration."

He also deplored what he called the increasing practice of prescribing drugs by generic name rather than brand name, which permits druggists to fill prescriptions with the lowest-price standard drug rather than the heavily-promoted products of big manufacturers.

Declaring that the investigation has triggered "a whole series of related adverse developments," Brown cited price investigations in Great Britain and Canada and by several state agencies in the United States.

The company's net income for 1960 dropped to less than $9.9 million, he said, $2 million under the 1959 level.



HOW FAST schools should desegregate to achieve "all deliberate speed" was the issue on "Briefing Session," with Harold C. Fleming, left, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, and Everett Tucker, Jr., president of the Little Rock, Ark., school board, as guest panelists.

Desegregation Sure, 'Briefing' Panel Says

White southerners may know in their hearts that school desegregation is inevitable but "inevitability" is still a fighting word in many localities, "Briefing Session" panelists noted this week.

Harold C. Fleming, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, and Everett Tucker, Jr., president of the Little Rock, Ark., school board, exchanged views on the ninth production of the public affairs television series presented by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Fleming predicted more rapid progress toward desegregation in the near future because "it has been pretty well driven home in the South that to defy court orders in this field is to risk a community's whole well-being—economic, social, cultural." He cited a Gallup poll showing that 76 percent of southerners acknowledge that desegregated schools are inevitable.

"I think maybe they respond one way to a Gallup poll interrogator and a different way when they are talking to people locally," Tucker observed. "I think you can approach the problem . . . more effectively without waving that red flag of inevitability."

However, he went on, there probably will be fewer attempts at outright defiance or evasion of court orders.

"I think it has been pretty graphically demonstrated that private schools cannot do the job," he said. "Certainly that is true in cities the size of Little Rock, and even smaller cities."

Leadership a Factor

Both panelists agreed, under questioning by Edward P. Morgan, host and moderator of the series, that the quality of political leadership and of news media were important factors in community reaction to school integration.

Fleming, who works out of Atlanta, noted "encouraging developments" suggesting that desegregation would be peacefully achieved there, in contrast to New Orleans, and cited a better press and more responsible political leaders as reasons.

Tucker said the press and radio had done "a splendid job in some instances" but deplored what he called "over-coverage" in others.

"I have enough to do looking out for the school system without getting out on any political limbs," he quipped, "but unquestionably the political overtones have had effects on the problem."

Fleming stressed that school integration is only part of a "total problem, the problem of a whole group of people and their opportunities in every field, in which housing and employment have a very large effect on education."

Both men felt there should be more communication, more sharing of experiences, among communities and school boards in the North and South, and within the South.

A preliminary analysis by John MacVane, "Briefing Session" news analyst, pointed out that school desegregation has caused difficulties above as well as below the Mason-Dixon line. MacVane also reported that out of 3 million Negro school children in the 17 states most affected by the Supreme Court decision, only 200,000 are attending school with whites.

BLS Reports Small Strike Idleness Rise

Idleness due to strikes increased from 700,000 man-days in January 1961 to 850,000 in February, or from eight-one hundredths to one-tenth of 1 percent of estimated working time, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported. This was about a third less than in the two previous Februarys, and below the February 1947-1949 average of .14 percent.

70 Afro-Asian Unionists End Israeli Course

The Afro-Asian Institute set up by Histadrut, the Israeli federation of labor, recently graduated its first class of 70 students from 24 countries.

The AFL-CIO helps support the institute, which is in North Tel Aviv, by providing 60 scholarships for students from the new countries in Africa and Asia. The second class will get under way in May and will consist of 60 students, the limit of facilities until the construction of permanent quarters is completed in July.

The first class, selected from 135 applicants, spent five months attending more than 300 lectures dealing mainly with the labor and cooperative movements and studying the routine operations of trade unions and various types of cooperatives.

Graduating ceremonies were attended by diplomatic representatives from African and Asian nations. Speakers were Foreign Minister Golda Meir and Sec.-Gen. Aharon Beker of Histadrut.

Satisfying Use Of Leisure Worker Need

New York—Effective use of leisure time may help workers offset on-the-job boredom, Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, told a session of the 25th anniversary conference of the Public Affairs Committee here.

The average worker, Perlis said, finds "no real satisfactions on the modern assembly-line, pushbutton job." He added that this situation poses a challenge to public and private institutions to help workers use their leisure time for public and community service.

The CSA director urged the committee to develop community legislative discussion groups, to broaden citizen participation on governmental advisory committees and commissions, and to enlist more citizen participation on the boards and committees of the nation's more than 200,000 voluntary health and welfare agencies.

General Motors Indicted On Anti-Trust Charge

New York—A federal grand jury has returned a criminal indictment charging General Motors Corp. with using its "vast economic power" illegally to secure monopoly control of the diesel locomotive manufacturing business.

The jury, which for 18 months heard evidence laid before it by the Antitrust Division of the U. S. Dept. of Justice, charged the nation's largest business firm with applying pressure on various railroads to buy its diesel locomotives, with these results:

● GM has acquired control of 84 percent of the locomotive business, and since 1946 has sold locomotives with a total value of $2.681 billion.

● GM competitors have been virtually excluded from the business of making diesel locomotives.

● GM controls almost all of the rebuilding, re-manufacturing and upgrading of locomotives in the U. S., and has a dominant position in the business of supplying parts.

General Motors was scheduled to plead to the criminal charges Apr. 17. If convicted, it could be fined $50,000, and conviction could serve as the basis for triple damage suits by parties claiming injury by GM's business practices and damage suits by the federal government.

GM Board Chairman Frederic G. Donner said in Detroit: "General Motors is not guilty of the monopolistic practices charged in the indictment. This will be clearly established at the trial."

The indictment charged, among other things, that GM in some cases sold locomotives at a loss as competitors could not do. Because of its size and economic power, GM was able to vary its price and rate of return, making investments in plants, and establish production capacity in a "manner which no competitor could meet," it alleged.

The grand jury asserted that GM made an average profit before taxes of 20.2 percent on locomotives from 1946 to 1959 while its leading competitor, Alco Products, Inc., averaged only 1.9 percent before taxes. Two other competitors have dropped out of the field—Fairbanks Whitney Corp. and Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton Co., the indictment asserted.

DRIVE TO END BIAS in hiring by government and contractors was officially launched by Pres. John F. Kennedy at first meeting of his newly-created Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity at White House. Shown at center are Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg; Kennedy; Mrs. Mary Lasker, philanthropist and founder of the Albert and Mary Lasker Foundation; and Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, committee chairman. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, one of committee members, is shown fourth from left. The other labor official on the committee, Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, was present but is not shown in above picture.

tion," adding that "arbitrary and artificial restrictions upon individuals can no longer be tolerated, either morally or materially."

The Vice President declared:

"It is a basic proposition in our form of government that each person is entitled to full and equal opportunities for achievement, limited only by his abilities and qualifications.

"We are living in an age where our government cannot afford the loss of the talents of any of its citizens. We need the maximum achievements of all Americans—not just those who belong to a particular race or creed or whose skin is of a particular pigment."

Administration Determined

Goldberg told the first session that the committee "has the necessary powers to end discrimination in an important segment of American employment," and pointed out that "the nature and extent of those powers indicates this Administration's determination to get this job done."

The secretary said he was "confident" that the committee would "exert every necessary effort to see that equality of employment in the U.S. is a guaranteed reality."

Assistant Labor Sec. Jerry R. Holleman, executive vice chairman of the committee, reported that 72 complaints of violations, in both government and contracting, have been filed since Kennedy issued the order Mar. 7 creating the committee. These complaints, he said, along with some previously filed with the former Eisenhower group, will be processed and investigated "as fast as possible."

Shortly before the White House meeting, Herbert Hill, labor secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, met at the Labor Dept. with Holleman to file a complaint against Lockheed Aircraft Corp., Marietta, Ga. The company is scheduled to receive a 10-year, $1-billion contract to construct jet transports.

Hill charged that Negroes were held to unskilled and semi-skilled jobs, were denied entry into apprenticeship programs, and worked in a plant where even the time clocks were segregated. He charged that Machinists District 33, which represents 10,000 production and maintenance workers at the plant, kept the Negroes in a segregated local.

IAM Vice Pres. Jesse C. McGlon said the Negroes had asked for their own lodge in 1951, and that their petition was granted. In 1957, he said, the union directed the Negro group to merge with three other lodges but the order was rescinded after the Negroes voted unanimously to request that they be allowed to retain their separate charter.

McCully Given Information Post

John McCully, recently public relations director of the Texas State AFL-CIO, is the information director for Pres. John F. Kennedy's newly created Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

McCully, who has headed the public relations operations of the state labor body since its merger in 1957, has been connected with the Texas labor movement since 1951, when he became public relations director of the former Texas State Federation of Labor.

Prior to joining the labor movement McCully had been a newspaperman in Austin and San Antonio. He was information director for one of the Texas offices of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration from 1939 until 1943.

Highway Bill Action Urged On Congress

The AFL-CIO has urged speedy congressional action to continue the nation's highway construction program and complete the interstate road network needed to meet the nation's growing needs.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. George D. Riley, in a statement to a Senate Public Works subcommittee, asked continued authorization for the program under which funds from federal gasoline and diesel fuel taxes are earmarked for highway construction grants. The trust fund, he said, should be used exclusively for highway construction and should not be diverted to other purposes.

At the same time, the AFL-CIO spokesman said, Congress should authorize direct appropriations from the federal treasury to provide relocation allowances for families, businesses and industrial plants displaced by new highway construction.

Riley said the relocation payment system provided for urban renewal housing programs could serve as a model for a similar highway dislocation program.

The current program will expire on June 30 unless extended by Congress.

PHS Pamphlet Lists Medical Research Facts

"The Costly Time Lag," a publication containing facts about the unnecessary loss of life, health and money that results from failure to use new research findings, has been published by the U.S. Public Health Service.

From estimates based on the National Health Survey and other data collected by the service, the publication states that:

- 40,000 cancer deaths which could have been prevented occur every year.
- 40 million children are growing up without the protection from tooth decay afforded by fluoridated water.
- 20,000 persons die each year from preventable attacks of rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease.
- 60,000 new cases of tuberculosis occur every year although ways of preventing its spread are well known.
- 17 million persons have some type of chronic disability and a high proportion fail to receive care that could reduce handicapping effects.

The publication is designed to encourage wider use of the health-saving knowledge that has resulted from the findings of medical research during the past two decades.

Single copies of the publication are available free from the Public Health Service, Washington 25, D. C.

AFL-CIO Backs Engle Bill:

Federal Leadership In Resources Asked

The AFL-CIO has pledged its "heartfelt support" to bipartisan legislation which would spell out the federal government's responsibility for coordinating programs for conservation, development and utilization of natural resources.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate Interior Committee that the measure would achieve, in the conservation field, the same principle achieved by the Employment Act of 1946, which "firmly established the responsibility of the federal government to promote a healthy economy."

The measure, introduced by Sen. Clair Engle (D-Calif.) and co-sponsored by 31 Democratic and Republican senators, would establish the federal government's primary role in this field, would require the President to submit an annual resources and conservation report to Congress, and would create a three-member Resources and Conservation Council to devise and interpret natural resource policy and programs.

The AFL-CIO, Biemiller said, has had a "traditional concern" for the conservation of natural resources and has repeatedly called for a coordinated federal program to insure their development and utilization not only for economic and defense needs but also for recreational and wildlife purposes.

More than half a century ago, he recalled, Pres. Theodore Roosevelt "first aroused the nation to the need for conservation." These pioneering efforts were continued during the administrations of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman.

"But then the tide turned again," Biemiller said, and in recent years "the issue somehow became entangled where it didn't belong—as part of the continuing debate over the relative responsibilities of government and private enterprise in our national life."

Declaring this stemmed from "ideological confusion," the federation spokesman said that "the preservation, the prudent use and the wise development of our natural resources is an absolute responsibility of the federal government."

Trustees for People

"Charges of 'encroachment' on the preserves of private enterprise are irrelevant," he continued. "The private owners of natural resources must recognize that they are trustees for all the people; and the federal government must see to it that they so conduct themselves."

Biemiller said that the population explosion in recent years poses a major challenge in the conservation field. "Simply meeting the needs of this larger population, in terms of energy, water supply, food and fibers, fuel and timber, will tax our resources," he said. "And at the same time we must continue to maintain adequate reserves to insure our military security and to fulfill our obligations to other free nations, less richly endowed."

He praised the attention the measure pays to the preservation of open spaces for recreational and wildlife purposes.

"We do not believe in an America paved with asphalt or concrete from coast to coast, with subdivisions on every rock and rill, broken only at intervals for airports or launching pads," he declared. "We believe there are times when the best nesting-place for ducks is more important than the best site for a factory. We believe that saving a rain-forest may take precedence over digging out the minerals beneath it."

Coopers Hail Growth In New Job Potentials

New York—Strengthened domestic and foreign markets for American distilleries was noted here as one of the few changes for the better for the Coopers Intl. Union whose members have known automation for 60 years.

The union, with some 4,000 members, is centered mainly in the eastern portion of the United States.

Delegates attending the 35th general convention heard their president, James J. O'Doyle, predict that continued growth of the cooperage industry, with possible restoration of some of the many jobs lost through automation.

In his report and keynote address to representatives of some 40 locals, Doyle noted that the improved competitive position of American bourbon reached a postwar high in 1960. He expressed the hope that expanded world markets would do something to make up for jobs now being performed by machines in a majority of distilleries.

Originally barrels were fashioned by hand. Since 1901, they have been largely machine made. Were it not for the fact the members make barrels for beer and flour, as well as for distilled beverages, the union's roster would have decreased much more rapidly than it has.

As it is, in plants similar to one of the largest in Memphis, Tenn., it is possible for machines to turn out 2,500 barrels a day.

Over the years, wages of CIU members have multiplied nearly six times over to the point where skilled workers earn as much as $2.75 an hour.

Delegates amended their union's constitution to make it conform with requirements of the Landrum-Griffin Act. On recommendation by Doyle they also approved investment of union funds in government-guaranteed mortgages and construction loans through the newly-established AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment.

The convention re-elected Doyle to another two-year term as president and secretary-treasurer. Elected vice presidents were Joseph Kunz, Baltimore; Wilson Morrison, Louisville, Ky.; John Holmes, Cleveland; and William C. Davenport, Memphis.

Alcoholism War Backed by Labor

Organized labor, aware of its responsibilities for the welfare of its members and to the community at large, is wholeheartedly behind the program of the National Council on Alcoholism, Robert Rosekrans, assistant director of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities, told the council's annual meeting in Washington.

Mrs. Josephine Piccolo of the Washington, D. C., AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, served on a panel which discussed the alcoholic in relation to his job.

AFL-CIO Makes Plea:

American Way of Life Urged For Migrant Farm Workers

Half a million domestic migratory agricultural workers—the "voiceless people" of America—look to Congress for establishment of minimal employment, educational and health standards to safeguard them and their families, the AFL-CIO has declared.

Testifying before a Senate Labor subcommittee headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), Legislative Rep. Walter J. Mason declared that moral principles rather than practical politics call for passage of six measures introduced by Williams to ease the plight of migrant farm families.

The federation spokesman described the migratory workers as "farmers without farms; workers without assured working conditions; . . . Americans without access to an American way of life." He added:

"As a political realist, I must say that there are very few votes to be gained by any member of Congress for doing the right thing for migratory workers; and in some areas, there are votes to be lost. But . . . I put this question: If the Congress cannot bring succor to these unfortunate people, who will?"

The leadoff witness at the hearing, Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, voiced the Kennedy Administration's strong support for the Williams measures and declared that "the need for effective action is imperative" to lift the migratory worker from the bottom of the economic ladder.

"The plight of the migrant worker is foreign to our American institutions, traditions and ideals," Goldberg said. "This long-festering sore in our society and in our economy provides a propaganda weapon for those who oppose our traditions and ideals. Failure to take prompt remedial action may be viewed as a repudiation of our moral responsibility to our own people, thereby abetting our adversaries in the struggle for the minds of men."

Administration Support Given

Goldberg's appearance marked the first time since 1952 that a single Cabinet officer spoke for the incumbent Administration in hearings on migrant labor. During the Eisenhower years, then Labor. Sec. James P. Mitchell testified on behalf of some migratory labor legislation and became embroiled in public controversy with then Agriculture Sec. Ezra Taft Benson, who vigorously opposed action.

The bills introduced by Williams would:

- Forbid the farm employment of children under 15 except by their own parents or guardians. The present child labor laws permit children to work on farms when school is not in session.
- Provide for the registration and uniform federal-state regulation of farm labor contractors or so-called "crew leaders" to guard against misrepresentation of wages and employment and to insure decent housing, food and transportation at reasonable prices.
- Create a National Citizens Council on Migratory Labor composed of representatives of migratory workers, agriculture, labor, health, welfare and education.
- Provide federal grants to school districts to help offset the added costs of educating migrant workers' children.
- Authorize expenditure of $1 million over a four-year period to help underwrite adult educational programs for migrants.
- Provide $3 million in grants to public and other non-profit agencies to help meet some health needs, including emergency medical and hospital care, limited public health nursing services, and education of migrant families on the maintenance of healthful and sanitary conditions.

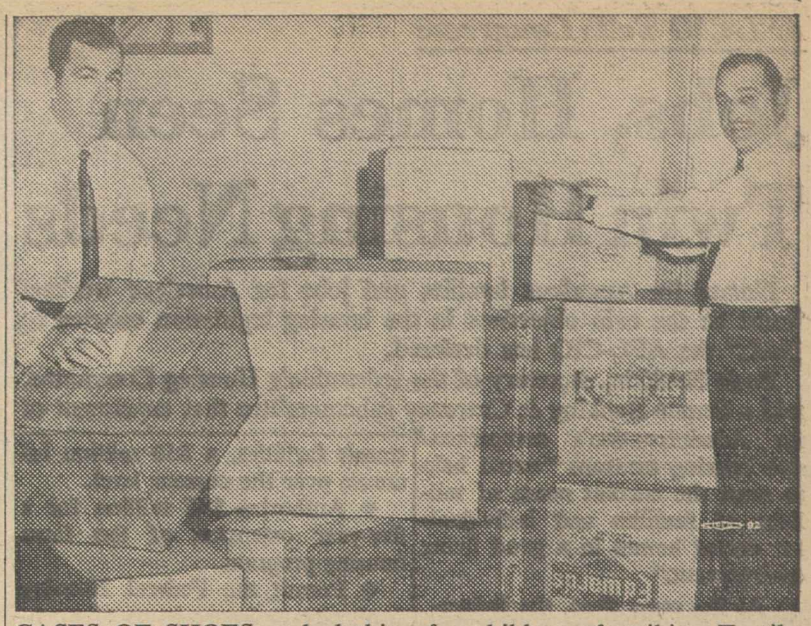
Emphasizing the need for action, Mason told the subcommittee that the "most sweeping technological progress" in the U. S. since the end of World War II has taken place in agriculture, and added that mechanization has "worsened the plight" of migratory agricultural workers.

"These people work hard," the AFL-CIO spokesman said, "at jobs that no machine can yet perform. Their labor is indispensable; without them, our crops could not be harvested . . . They are miserably paid . . . they are denied the protection of the wage-hour law; most of them are denied coverage under workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance and the safety and sanitary codes of the respective states. Their right to organize is not protected by law."

Goldberg expressed the Administration's belief that the American people will not "tolerate a horn of plenty bursting with the good things of life which are harvested by human beings who work and live under such marginal conditions that they have no access to the bountiful product of their labors." He added:

"Americans have long since learned not to tolerate the production of goods for their homes and offices under such substandard conditions that the workers' lives are filled with privation and insecurity.

"Nor do I believe they will knowingly accept the continuation of farm production by men, women and children who travel great distances in ramshackle vehicles to find arduous low-paying employment, live in unsanitary substandard housing, sometimes worse than that provided farm animals, are not protected against ill health and accidents, and find themselves at the mercy of unscrupulous labor contractors."



CASES OF SHOES and clothing for children of striking Textile Workers Union of America members in Henderson, N. C., are readied for shipment by Pulp-Sulphite Union at Port Edward, N. Y., as part of continuing support for unionists in struggle against Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills. Examining shipment are Treas. Henry Segal (left) and Intl. Rep. Joseph Simone.

'Right-To-Work' Group Blocked in Legislatures

existing constitutional ban on the union shop.

In Oklahoma, one of the chief targets of the National Right-to-Work Committee, bills have been introduced in both House and Senate but have been referred to multiple committees, each of which must act before the bill can be brought to the floor.

While a bill proposing a constitutional amendment referendum on "right-to-work" has been favorably reported by the Constitution Committee of the Oklahoma House, it must still go through the House Labor Committee, which thus far has taken a dim view of the proposal. In the Senate, it has been triple-referred.

Oklahoma Labor Ready

Oklahoma labor, however, is girding for an expected effort by business groups to force the issue on the state ballot through an initiative petition.

In Vermont, a scene of close "right-to-work" battles in past years, the immediate threat appears to have been passed as the deadline for new legislation expired without a bill having been introduced. A "work" proposal may still be offered as a sleeper amendment on an unrelated bill.

Such a "sleeper" attempt appears to have been made in California, where "right-to-work" forces took a memorable drubbing in a 1958 referendum. The State AFL-CIO has sounded the alarm at a proposed amendment to the state labor code which, under the guise of protecting individual workers against "coercion" by labor organizations, might be interpreted as banning the union shop.

In Texas, where a "right-to-work" law is already on the statute books, a business-backed attempt to get it written into the constitution was launched—and then hastily dropped.

A newsletter issued by a leading business lobbyist gave this explanation for the change of heart:

"Its passage by the Senate and the House would bring on an all-out campaign for the defeat of the amendment by labor unions which would spare no expense or effort to nullify the 'right-to-work' principle in Texas labor relations laws.

"This effort would have to be countered by comparable expenditures on the part of those Texans who believe in the 'right-to-work' principle. There is no cause for the state to be so disturbed and for such expenditures of money and of effort to be made. . . . As of this time, this resolution should be permitted to die in committee."

Still in Committee

Bills introduced in Maine and Connecticut are still in committee. In the latter state, defeat is considered assured if the measure should get past the committee stage.

In Delaware, where "right-to-work" forces have made strong efforts in previous years, no bill has been introduced this year.

Neither have "work" bills been introduced in Montana or Wyoming, where the "Right-to-Work" Committee said earlier that "forces determined to establish a law protecting voluntary unionism are hard at work." The phrase "voluntary unionism" is used by "work" forces in areas where the term "right-to-work" has fallen into disrepute.

Sworn in as commissioner of the Urban Renewal Administration in the Housing & Home Finance Agency, Slayton brings to his new job a background of 15 years' experience in housing, planning and urban redevelopment.

Henderson Witness Arrested in Shooting

Raleigh, N. C.—Renewed pleas that Gov. Terry Sanford (D) reopen the case of eight unionists jailed for a dynamiting conspiracy have been voiced here in the wake of the arrest in Virginia of the state's star witness in the union trial.

The Raleigh News and Observer declared editorially that the arrest of Harold E. Aaron, whose testimony sent the eight officers and members of the Textile Workers Union of America to prison, "cannot increase the state's confidence in the righteousness of the convictions."

The new incident—in which Aaron is charged with malicious wounding of a man in a Martinsville, Va., motel—"provides added reason why the conscience of North Carolina should be troubled in this case," the editorial said.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock declared that the latest development should cause North Carolinians "to ask whether eight union men without any previous criminal records belong behind prison bars solely upon the testimony of Aaron."

Pollock, noting that the workers have already served more than five months of their sentences, which ranged from two to 10 years, declared "the situation demands that law-abiding, decent people call for this grave injustice to be reviewed."

The governor's office indicated that the volume of mail and telegrams urging a review or executive clemency for the TWUA members had increased markedly in recent weeks. A spokesman at the capitol said Sanford is giving the case "serious consideration."

At the time of his arrest in connection with the Martinsville shooting, Aaron allegedly identified himself to police in that community as an "undercover agent" for the North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation.

Atty.-Gen. Wade Bruton, under whose office the SBI operates, denied Aaron's claim and declared that his only connection with the SBI was as an informer in the trial of the TWUA members involved in a strike and lockout at the Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills.

The statement from Bruton came after Pres. W. M. Barbee and Executive Sec. J. W. Holder of the North Carolina State AFL-CIO had wired Bruton and urged him to confirm or deny Aaron's contention. They noted that a few years earlier Aaron had been convicted "on charges of impersonating an officer."

The TWUA strikers—including Vice Pres. Boyd Payton, the union's Carolinas director—were convicted primarily on the basis of Aaron's testimony that the unionists had plotted to dynamite buildings at the struck plant.

The News and Observer, in its editorial, took specific note that "no dynamiting took place," and described the case as one in which Aaron, "with state funds, helped prepare the alleged plot in order to betray those whom he involved in it."

The editorial added that "any verdict of guilt based upon the testimony of a paid informer, who was given money to arrange entrapment, deserves special scrutiny."

The newspaper pointed out that Aaron's part in the alleged conspiracy at Henderson "was never pretty," and declared that the Martinsville shooting "reflects further on Aaron's character."

Illinois Raises Compensation For Jobless

Springfield, Ill.—Gov. Otto Kerner (D) has signed into law a liberalized state unemployment compensation program, providing the largest single benefit increase in the state's history.

The Kerner program was recommended to the Illinois General Assembly Mar. 28 in a joint session of both houses spelling out his whole legislative program.

The unemployment compensation program, which moved through the legislature in record time, was agreed to in advance by a tripartite advisory board composed of three representatives each of labor, employers and the public.

It provides for an increase in maximum weekly benefits as follows—from $50 to $59 for idle workers with four or more dependent children; $47 to $55 for those with three dependent children; $44 to $51, those with two dependent children; $40 to $47, those with one dependent child; $37 to $43, for persons with a non-working spouse; $32 to $38 for a worker with no dependents.

The new benefit schedule will become operative July 1.

More than 400,000 Illinois workers will benefit from the increased compensation rates during the coming biennium, according to the state Labor Dept. An estimated $24.6 million will be added to unemployment compensation benefits.

AFL-CIO Tells Congress:

Jobs, Homes Seen Twin Housing Needs

Homes for American families and jobs for American workers "must be the twin objectives in the housing legislation enacted in 1961," the AFL-CIO has declared.

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the federation's Housing Committee, told a Senate Banking & Currency subcommittee that enactment of the Administration's comprehensive housing measure "would help to meet the current needs of millions of families and individuals for decent homes in a good living environment."

At the same time, the federation spokesman said, the Administration proposals introduced by Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.), the subcommittee chairman, "would help to put America back on the road to economic prosperity and full employment."

Also testifying before the Sparkman subcommittee were Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, and John Edleman, legislative representative for the Textile Workers Union of America.

The $3.2 billion housing and urban redevelopment measure introduced by Sparkman would:

- Authorize $2.5 billion over the next four years in grants for slum clearance and urban renewal, plus $80 million for urban planning assistance over the same period.
- Authorize the Public Housing Administrator to contract for approximately 100,000 additional low-cost dwelling units originally contemplated in the Housing Act of 1949.
- Boost from $50 million to $100 million the authorization for direct loans to sponsors of housing projects for the elderly and broaden existing law to include public bodies or agencies as well as non-profit corporations.
- Raise to $200 million the authority for loans to communities for local water, sewer, highway and transit facilities, a $50 million increase over the current level.
- Authorize $45 million for a five-year extension of the farm housing program.
- Permit the Federal Housing Authority to insure loans of up to $10,000 for improvements on houses becoming dilapidated or obsolete.

The 1960 census, Shishkin told the subcommittee, showed that the nation had 15.6 million substandard dwellings—27 percent of the total housing supply.

"Merely to provide decent homes for these families represents a tremendous challenge," he said. "But much more must be done if we are to provide decent homes for today's ill-housed and provide for the tremendous growth of population that lies ahead."

In the face of this need, he said, housing construction has continued to decline, with starts in the first two months of this year 17 percent below the same period in 1960 and 25 percent below 1959. As a result, he said, nearly one out of every four construction workers was jobless in February.

"The slowdown in housing activity is particularly serious," the AFL-CIO spokesman said, "because in other postwar recessions, an upsurge in housing activity before the end of the general recession helped to pull the economy into recovery. Now just the opposite is true. Housing is a minus factor in the economic balance sheet and contributes to blocking an economic upturn."

Senate Opens Debate On Minimum Wage Bill

enterprises which do not have units in at least two states. This contrasts sharply with Administration proposals to cover all retail establishments doing more than $1 million worth of business annually.

The Senate committee accepted an amendment by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R-Vt.) which would add to the sales formula a provision that, to be covered, firms must purchase a minimum of $250,000 worth of goods which have moved in interstate commerce.

The vote on the Monroney amendment was expected to be close. Last year, during the minimum wage fight in the post-convention session of the 86th Congress, a similar amendment submitted by the Oklahoma Democrat was defeated by a 50-48 vote.

As the Senate opened its minimum wage debate, the House put off until the week of Apr. 17 consideration of social security amendments. The House Ways & Means Committee, scaling down Administration requests, reported a measure to provide for a 10 percent hike in cash benefits for widows, a boost in minimum benefits from $33 to $40, and optional retirement, with reduced benefits, for men at age 62.

House Republicans, preparing for a major assault on the measure which the committee approved by a vote of 22 to 2, began lining up support for a social security substitute sponsored by Rep. John W. Byrnes (R-Wis.). The GOP measure would raise the minimum from $33 to $40 and extend minimum aid to all persons 72 or over who are not now eligible. It would not, however, increase widows' benefits or permit earlier retirement for men.

Meanwhile, Senate and House conferees were attempting to resolve differences between their two versions of area redevelopment legislation. Both measures call for $394 million in loans and grants to areas of chronic unemployment. The Senate version, however, calls for long-range financing while the House provides for annual congressional review of loans and grants.

Minimum wage, social security and area redevelopment were among the five proposals on Kennedy's anti-recession "priority list." The others were temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits, already enacted into law; and emergency extension of aid to dependent children to cover children of jobless workers, which has passed the House.

At his Apr. 12 press conference, in reply to a query on whether "more far-reaching" proposals were anticipated to cure the serious unemployment question, Kennedy said that "in the first place, I would like to see the measures that we have suggested be passed."

At the same time, Kennedy said, the Administration is "also considering what longer-range steps could be taken" to reduce the "hard core of unemployment which may continue after we have had a recovery."

Fun, Sportsmanship and Frolic Of Label Show Lure Thousands

Detroit, which was distributed by representatives of the Printers.

Under the strong kleig lights, spun sugar roses shimmered on the magnificent cakes constructed by specialty chefs in Cooks Local 234. A jellied lake trout, gilded lobsters, mouth-watering hors d'oeuvres were part of the spectacular show masterminded by the highest paid union hotel chefs in the Detroit area.

Sugared Flakes

A mountain of sugar-frosted flakes attracted attention to the display of the Grain Millers, while the Railway Clerks displayed one of the fanciest model railways ever shown. Standing before a huge ash can at the Tobacco Workers booth, union representatives urged visitors to toss away non-union cigarettes and replaced them with free union-made brands.

Crowds three and four deep stood around a steel fence that separated them from veteran craftsmen who demonstrated the ancient art of the Glass Bottle Blowers. The blowers, such as 64-year-old Val Hamer of Baltimore, showed how glass objects were made more than 300 years ago when Capt. John Smith and his party started a glass factory in Jamestown, Va.

Hamer, who has practiced his craft for 50 years, said that nearly all of the union's 55,000 members now produce bottles and jars at big machines, although the blower's skill is still needed for such items as perfume bottles, salt shakers and ornaments.

At the booth run by the Detroit Teachers Union and manned by retired Detroit school teachers, not a day passed that showgoers didn't greet some of their old school teachers, perhaps not seen for many years.

Grown-ups and children alike marveled at shows put on by the Chemical Workers' magician. Throngs stood in line to take free chances on the $4,000 worth of portable radios distributed by Detroit Retail Clerks Local 876. Almost everyone dropped their gifts into shopping bags distributed by the RCIA.

There were other displays—those sponsored by the Intl. Labor Organization, by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, by the U.S. Office of Civil Defense, and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Fun, Sportsmanship, Frolic

It was an atmosphere of good fun, good sportsmanship and frolic. The only thing for sale at the six-day display, showing $22 million worth of exhibits, were some 25-cent hot dogs and 10-cent coffee at the snack bar run by Cobo Hall. You needed some refreshment—after visiting the 350 displays and writing out your name and address on free chances for the $80,000 worth of gifts.

An estimated 100,000 persons jammed the hall for colorful opening day ceremonies and heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg call for a greater degree of unity between management and labor.

The show reflected what Meany called the "teamwork America needs between management and labor to show the world what makes our nation great." He pointed out that these shows are excellent examples of union-management cooperation by employers who have found that it is "good business to do business with unions."

Both Meany and Goldberg stressed unemployment as a major American problem. The federation president called unemployment the greatest challenge facing the United States and one that has direct relationship to the one faced from abroad.

"It is up to management, labor and government to work together to meet this challenge," he stated, "to find out how we are going to provide 1.35 million jobs a year just to break even. We want to find the solution in the American way of life, in a tradition in keeping with free men and free women."

Goldberg called for 7.3 million new jobs this year to take care of new entrants into the work force and some of those currently idled, and thus cut joblessness 4 percent.

Pres. John F. Kennedy through Goldberg sent greetings and his regrets that he could not attend.

"The Union Industries Show focuses clearly on a vital aspect of our national life—the wide spectrum of progress which can result from productive industrial relationships," Kennedy said in his message.

'Common Purpose' Marked

"There exists a need to extend the fruit of this partnership in progress to other areas of our economic structure. The challenge of responsible collective bargaining, the need for industrial peace and for sound wage and price policies, the quest for higher standards of living and increased productivity, the question of the American competitive position abroad and the effects of technological advance, all of these require the invoking of that sense of common purpose which has strengthened our nation in time of emergency."

Members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the board of the Union Label Dept., Detroit Mayor Louis C. Miriani and other state, city and county officials attended the opening ceremonies and witnessed the cutting of the blue satin ribbon leading to the mammoth arena.

Michigan's Gov. John B. Swainson was a late evening visitor, receiving a free portable radio at the glittering Retail Clerks' booth. Joseph Lewis, show manager and head of the label department, announced that over 1 million tickets had been distributed.

High Court Kills Brown-Olds Doctrine

Senate Passes Wage Bill, House Ups Social Security

Court Kills 'Punitive' NLRB Rule

By Saul Miller

The U.S. Supreme Court has knocked out a series of National Labor Relations Board decisions on hiring halls and union security, declaring that the board rulings were "punitive" and in part an attempt to rewrite the Taft-Hartley Act.

The high tribunal declared in decisions covering five cases that:

- Union-run hiring halls that provide for hiring of both union and non-union workers are legal. The decision said that T-H does not ban such hiring halls and illegality arises only when discrimination against non-union workers can be shown.
- The NLRB's Brown-Olds formula providing for refunding to employes of all union dues if an agreement between the union and employer contained an illegal security clause that is outside the board's power and is a "punitive" remedy.
- Contracts in the publishing industry providing for foremen in the mechanical crafts to be union members are legal and a union's "general laws" can be included in a contract unless they are in conflict with state or federal laws. An equally divided court, however, left in effect a lower court decision that the Typographical Union cannot strike for the clause that a foreman must be a union member.

The NLRB developed its positions in these areas on the grounds that certain contract clauses or understandings with employers are in effect designed to compel the employment of

NEED FOR RAISING minimum wage to $1.25, to help low-paid workers afford plain but adequate diet, is emphasized by Sen. Paul H. Coalition Beaten In Senate Battle

By Gene Zack

The 87th Congress moved forward in two major legislative areas as the Senate approved a minimum wage bill tailored closely to White House specifications and the House passed a pared-down version of Pres. John F. Kennedy's recommendations for social security improvements.

The twin actions, on bills to which Kennedy had assigned top priority as part of a concerted drive to stem the recession, came three months after the new Administration took office.

At the same time activity intensified on several other fronts—including housing, aid to education, aid for dependent children, and area redevelopment—all of which were high on Kennedy's list of legislative proposals.

Social Security

The House has passed and sent to the Senate a bill providing social security improvements short of the recommendations made by Pres. John F. Kennedy.

The vote on final passage was an overwhelming 399 to 14. Before enactment, Administration forces defeated a more meager Republican substitute on a voice vote.

As passed by the House, the measure provides a 10 percent hike in cash benefits for widows and a boost in minimum benefits from $33 to $40 a month and gives men the option of retiring, with reduced benefits, at age 62.

The Administration had asked, in addition to the early retirement provision, a 13.3 percent increase in widow's benefits and a boost in the minimum to $43.

Meanwhile there were these other developments:

- Senate and House Education subcommittees, meeting in closed sessions, began work on the Administration's $2.3 billion public elementary and secondary school aid

Wage-Hour

The Senate, by a vote of 65 to 28, has put its stamp of approval on Administration proposals to raise the minimum wage, in steps, to $1.25 and to bring an estimated 4.1 million additional workers under wage-hour protection.

The vote came after liberal forces, by a 56-39 margin turned back a proposal which would have exempted from coverage 1.1 million retail workers. Before the vote on this crucial amendment, the Senate defeated by substantial votes other efforts to water down the bill's coverage.

The closest test of strength for Administration forces came on an amendment by Sen. George A. Smathers (D-Fla.) that would have extended coverage to only 3,000 laundry workers, instead of to the 140,000 to be covered by the Administration bill. The Smathers amendment lost by a margin of 52 to 45.

Prior to the voting, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had called on the Senate to reject amend-

In Grass Roots Campaign:

Labor Spotlights Votes in Congress

Organized labor is turning the spotlight of public opinion directly on members of Congress who have voted against liberal legislation designed to stem the recession and stimulate economic growth.

In an intensification of labor's "grass roots" legislative campaign, local and international unions are pinpointing anti-liberal votes by congressmen in their home districts—and are employing labor's traditional techniques of the picket line, placards and sound trucks to do the job.

In particular, unions are focusing attention on minimum wage legislation and the recently enacted temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits — key measures in the Administration anti-recession program backed by the AFL-CIO.

The aim of these activities is two-fold:

- To stimulate mail urging passage of important measures before Congress.
- To fix firmly in voters' minds, well in advance of the 1962 elec-

Meany, Goldberg Open Situs Picketing Drive

The Kennedy Administration and organized labor have launched a drive for enactment of situs picketing legislation that would restore to construction unions the right to picket multi-employer job sites.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, stating the federation's position in a letter to Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), chairman of a House Labor subcommittee, called on Congress to take "long overdue" action on a measure sponsored by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.).

Meany submitted May 1960 and January 1961 statements by the Executive Council assailing the "unjust and inequitable restriction" on peaceful picketing by building trades unions and declaring that "simple justice demands early action" to correct it.

In the letter read into the record by Legislative Dir. Andrew J.

2 Postal Clerks Unions Form United Federation

By David L. Perlman

Two postal unions, ending 55 years of rivalry, have merged to form the United Federation of Postal Clerks.

A special convention of the 92,000-member AFL-CIO National Federation of Post Office Clerks unanimously ratified a merger pact with the unaffiliated 25,000-member United National Association of Post Office Craftsmen. Delegates from the latter group, which had already approved the merger, were welcomed with cheers as they entered to take part in the first convention of the new union.

The new union kept the door open for a third group, the 22,-000-member National Postal Tranpsort Association, whose officers were signatories to an original three-way merger agreement.

The NPTA, which had recon-

A Postal Transport convention, called to act on joining in the merger, referred the issue to a membership referendum after immediate amalgamation narrowly failed to get the required two-thirds convention vote.

vened its national convention to act on the merger agreement, referred the issue of ratification to a membership referendum this summer. The referendum was agreed to after a motion for immediate merger narrowly failed to get the needed two-thirds vote of the convention. Approval by referendum will require a simple majority of those voting.

Top officers of the former Post Office Clerks, including Pres. E. C. Hallbeck, retain the same positions in the merged organization. UNAPOC Pres. Joseph F. Thomas is director of organization for the new union and other officers have been assigned to staff positions in the United Postal Clerks.

Postmaster Gen. J. Edward Day and Civil Service Commission Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., welcomed the formation of the new union and pledged a policy of consultation with union representatives. A telegram from Pres. Kennedy said the merger convention was an "historic meeting" which held the promise of "more and better services to the members of the new organization."

In a major address spelling out the employe relations policies of the new Administration, Deputy Postmaster Gen. H. W. Brawley told the delegates:

"No policy of any consequence affecting our employes will go into effect unless and until the groups affected have had full opportunity to express their opinion.

"The experience of all who have been closely associated with the postal service makes it clear that any cooperation or joint action by employe groups cannot help but be both hopeful and helpful."

Rejecting what he called the "who-you-know" basis for promotion, Brawley pledged:

"From now on, promotions will be made on merit. This we mean, and we are holding postmasters personally responsible for any violations of this policy."

First action of the new postal union was to meet with departmental officials to register "total opposition" to the so-called work measurement system instituted two years ago by former Postmaster Gen. Arthur E. Summerfield. The union described the program as "a speed-up geared to impossible production standards."

Most of the 500 delegates also joined in a legislative conference and met with congressmen and senators from their home districts. The convention reaffirmed its support of union recognition legislation for government employes and heard a report from its officers on conferences relating to a possible executive order by Pres. Kennedy on the government's relations with unions.

In an address, Pres. Paul A. Nagle of the Postal Transport Association predicted that his union will "overwhelmingly ratify" the merger agreement.

The key vote at the NPTA convention on immediate merger was 62-to-36, shy of the two-thirds needed. A number of delegates opposing the motion said they personally favored merger but believed the final decision should be made by the membership.

Last spring, a proposal for amalgamation with the Letter Carriers was rejected in a referendum vote. Merger negotiations were begun with the Post Office Clerks after the NPTA convention last summer endorsed a goal of unity of all postal unions.

Locals of the former Post Office Clerks and the Craftsmen are scheduled to merge within 60 days. In New York City, the merger took place before the formality of convention approval.

Oregon Labor Routs Compensation Attack

Salem, Ore.—A direct assault on Oregon's highly progressive workmen's compensation insurance program has been killed in the legislature.

By a 6-to-3 vote, the House Labor & Industries Committee postponed indefinitely consideration of a labor-opposed bill which would have opened the way for private insurance companies to take over the state-operated workmen's compensation program. The so-called "three-way bill," which would permit employers to use either private insurance firms or self-insurance in preference to the non-profit state fund, had passed the Senate 16-to-14.

It was described by the Oregon Labor Press as "probably the most controversial, important and heavily lobbied issue before the 1961 legislature."

The Oregon State AFL-CIO, which led the battle for defeat of the proposal, distributed thousands of copies of a pamphlet opposing abandonment of the exclusive state fund.

Labor pointed out that 93 cents of every dollar in premiums paid by Oregon employers is now used to pay benefits and the cost of medical care for injured workers, as against a national average under private insurance of only 62 cents.

The State AFL-CIO also cited the state's extensive rehabilitation program, which it called a key part of the workmen's compensation system, and warned that some private insurance carriers are likely to be more concerned with fighting claims than promptly compensating injured workers.

In another legislative development, Oregon labor hailed enactment of a bill liberalizing the unemployment compensation program by allowing a worker to qualify if he earned an average of $20 a week for 20 successive weeks. Previously he would have had to have earned a minimum of $20 during each of the 20 weeks.

Seasonal and construction workers are among those expected to benefit from the change.

Riger Appointed To Ohio PAC Post

Columbus, O. — The Ohio AFL-CIO has named Morris Riger of Cleveland to the newly created post of state AFL-CIO political education director.

Riger will resign as regional director of the Textile Workers Union of America for Ohio and Michigan and assume full-time duties about May 15 at state AFL-CIO headquarters here.

Riger is 47. Born in Philadelphia, he is a graduate of Temple University and has worked for unions since the 1930s. The TWUA appointed him a staff representative in 1946 and Ohio-Michigan regional director in 1953. He is a member of the Cleveland Community Relations Board and secretary of the Ohio Advisory Committee of the U. S. Civil Rights Commission.

Clark Introduces Bill:

Urban Department Asked by Kennedy

Pres. John F. Kennedy, calling for a major national assault on urban blight, has urged the 87th Congress to create a new Cabinet-level Dept. of Urban Affairs & Housing.

In letters to Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, president of the Senate, and House Speaker Sam Rayburn (D-Tex.), the President said the new department would be charged with preventing the "appalling deterioration" of the nation's cities and with insuring "adequate housing for all segments of our population."

Eleventh Department

The proposed new department would be the first addition to the Cabinet ranks since 1953 when Congress, shortly after the inauguration of former Pres. Eisenhower, established the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare. It would add an eleventh full department to the 10 now established with Cabinet rank.

Kennedy said the department would carry out the duties and responsibilities currently handled by the Housing & Home Finance Agency, Federal Housing Administration and Public Housing Administration. The HHFA is now headed by Dr. Robert C. Weaver, the highest-ranking Negro in the Kennedy Administration.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its midwinter session in Bal Harbour, Fla., called for creation of such a Cabinet-level department "without delay," in order to assure "high priority and effective coordination of the housing and urban-focused activities" of the federal government.

In his letter, Kennedy noted that 70 percent of the American people live in the nation's urban areas and pointed out that the federal government's activities in the twin fields of housing and urban blight have "increased steadily" since establishment of the National Housing Agency in 1942.

The Administration bill, introduced by Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), would spell out a national policy in this field that "the general welfare and security of the nation and the health and living standards of our people require, as a matter of national purpose, sound development and redevelopment of our urban communities in which the vast majority of our people live and work."

Agencies' Status Elevated

Clark, former mayor of Philadelphia and an early advocate of an Urban Affairs Dept., emphasized that the bill "adds no new programs or operations" but "simply elevates the status" of existing agencies.

The measure, he said, "recognizes that the greatest social change in America in modern times—and especially in the years since World War II—has been the explosive growth of our major metropolitan areas, bringing in its train a host of problems new in magnitude and complexity."

The bill would establish the federal government's responsibility to "encourage and facilitate" the efforts of urban communities in the preparation of community development plans, the elimination of slums, the provision of "decent homes in a suitable living environment," the promotion of effective mass transportation, the provision of parks and other recreational facilities, and the fostering of facilities for educational and cultural pursuits.

Accompanying the President's message was a letter to Kennedy from Budget Dir. David E. Bell declaring that a Cabinet-rank department was needed to help achieve "consistent and flexible administration" of community development and housing programs and to give "more effective leadership" to these programs within the Executive Dept.

Editorial Sees Crisis in 'Hard Core' Joblessness

The following editorial, dealing with the nature of the unemployment problem, is reprinted from the New York Times:

The time has come for the nation to face up to the fact that economic recovery may not be able to wipe out—or even substantially reduce—"hard-core" unemployment. The recent series of articles in this newspaper on unemployment by A. H. Raskin, and the National Planning Association's "Joint Statement on the Rise of Chronic Unemployment" have shown that the loss of work due to the elimination of jobs by machines is steadily increasing even in times of general business "prosperity."

The leading question now posed is this: Can business expansion create enough new jobs in the discernible future to make up for those that will be wiped out by automation? And what about the millions of young workers seeking jobs who will be coming into the labor market in the next few years—far more than will leave it due to retirement or death?

Pres. Kennedy did well to stress at his latest press conference the need for passage of legislation, still waiting action, which he has proposed to ease the strains of unemployment and to stimulate recovery. But the need is growing fast for a sharp distinction between the unemployment that can be largely eliminated by an expanding economy and that which cannot be—and so will require special treatment both in prevention and in cure. The President did not make this as clear as he might have, or as urgent, nor did he suggest the kind of concentrated attention and attack on the hardcore problem which is now so badly needed.

True, he has assigned the subject of joblessness caused by automation for discussion by the newly appointed Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy. But that is only one item on a crowded agenda. The situation calls for a major and sharply focused effort, adequately staffed and financed to get all the relevant facts and to suggest policies for the guidance of government and also of private management and organized labor.

SUB Improved:

URW and Firestone Agree on Wage Hike

By Eugene A. Kelly

Akron, O.—Wage increases of 7.5 to 14.5 cents an hour have been agreed to by negotiators for the Rubber Workers and the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., along with improvements in supplemental unemployment benefits and working conditions.

The agreement, covering 18,000 workers in eight plants, followed by three days a contract settlement between Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. and a URW committee representing 20,000 members of 11 local unions in Goodyear plants.

The Firestone settlement provides two levels of wage increases—one for workers in tire-building plants, another for non-tire plants. A union spokesman said Goodyear, whose earlier negotiations did not include wages, will be asked to negotiate immediately on wages, either voluntarily or through formal reopening notice.

Both Firestone and Goodyear agreements will be submitted to URW members for votes. Both provide for improved SUB provisions and working conditions.

The Firestone workers will vote on this wage offer: an increase of 7.5 cents an hour as of June 5, and another of 7 cents an hour as of June 11, 1962, for tire plant workers in Akron, Des Moines, Los Angeles, Memphis, Tenn., and Pottstown, Pa.; increases of 3.5 cents an hour on June 5, and an additional 4 cents an hour on June 11, 1962, for workers in Firestone industrial products plants at Fall River, Mass., Noblesville, Ind., and New Castle, Ind.

Terms of the new Firestone agreement add one holiday a year, to be decided at the local plant level, to the previous seven.

The Goodyear agreement, the union said, involved the first recognition by one of the major tire companies of the SUB rights of employes laid off for more than two years and no longer paying union dues.

Goodyear plants involved are in Akron, North Chicago, Ill.; Topeka, Kan.; New Bedford, Mass.; Windsor, Vt.; Lincoln, Neb.; Muncie, Ind.; St. Marys, O.; Jackson, Miss.; Gadsden, Ala., and Los Angeles.

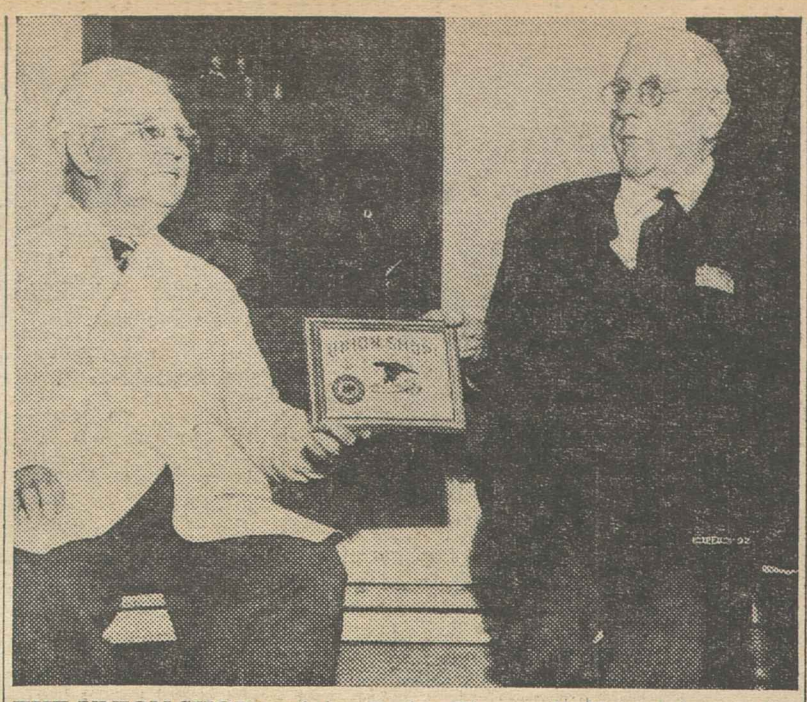
After ratification of master agreements, local union and company representatives in each Goodyear and Firestone plant still will negotiate local supplemental working agreements.

The two master contracts also provide:

- An extension of supplemental unemployment benefits to a maximum of 39 weeks, in line with new federal legislation.
- An increase of $5 a week in maximum SUB payments.
- A provision that employes with five years of seniority, on layoff more than two years, may take separation pay in a lump sum instead of continuing on layoff status with seniority rights.

The contracts also provide improvements in vacation pay and funeral leave pay; contract revisions to speed up grievance procedure; certification of journeyman status for skilled trades workers; and negotiation of apprenticeship standards.

URW Pres. George Burdon said the agreements include special provisions related to automation problems and worker displacement. These represent a start in the direction of meeting such problems, said Burdon, who asserted that "much more must and will be done."



THE UNION SHOP card that Barber Thomas F. Hunt, left, has displayed for most of his 76 years of labor got into the picture when Hunt closed his shop in Sacramento, Calif. The 90-year-old Hunt is shown with Walter Rickett, former financial secretary of Carpenters' Local 2170 and a customer since 1906.

Barber Closes Shop After 76 Years on Job

Sacramento, Calif. — Thomas F. Hunt, dean of barbers, has closed up his shop and retired after 76 years of active work at his trade.

Hunt will be 91 on July 17, and his eyesight is not what it used to be. Otherwise he is ready to enjoy retirement, sitting in his rocking chair or cutting his lawn once a week.

The barbering veteran began his career in 1885 and joined the Barbers in 1894. He says of the union:

"The Barbers' Union took me out of slavery and put me in a class where I had the money to buy an automobile and the time to enjoy it."

One of Hunt's last customers was Walter Rickett, former financial secretary of Carpenters Local 2170, who has been a patron since 1906.

Born in Pennsylvania, Hunt took his first job in a shop in Philadelphia when he was 15. The workday was 7 a. m. to 9 p. m. week days; 7 a. m. to midnight on Saturdays, 8 a. m. to noon on Sundays. Hair cuts were 15 cents, shaves 10 cents, the pay was $7 a week—7.7 cents an hour for a 91-hour week.

After several years of barbering in Pennyslvania and in Marshalton, Del., Hunt moved to Sacramento in 1893. He built a house in 1895 in what was then Oak Park, and later an addition served as his shop. He now lives in the same house with his wife, Essie, who drives the family car. She's in what friends call "the young 70s."

Furniture Unions Near Peace Pact

Two AFL-CIO affiliates are working out the details of a pact designed to end a series of disputes in line with an agreement reached with the federation's Executive Council.

The Upholsterers Intl. Union and the United Furniture Workers announced that a tentative understanding has been reached and that negotiations are continuing for an agreement that would provide for settlement of disputes without resort to raiding or litigation.

Leaders of both unions said they hoped the agreement would lay the foundation for a mutual assistance pact so that the thousands of organized workers in furniture and allied fields could be brought into the union fold.

The negotiations between the UIU and the UFWA stem from the Executive Council meeting in August 1960 when after a discussion of the various disputes involving the unions, the council won agreement from both sides to work out a plan for reaching settlements without resort to conflict.

Wagner Asked To Halt Funds In Zoo Strike

New York—The AFL-CIO Central Labor Council has urged Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D) to withhold city funds from the publicly supported Zoological Society until management consents to reach an agreement with striking zoological workers.

Meanwhile 60 workers, provided by the union to care for the animals and fish, have put their first two weeks of pay—almost $10,000—into the strike fund to be divided among more than 300 strikers.

Labor Council officers told the mayor they "unreservedly endorse" the workers' demands for recognition and a contract.

The Board of Estimate has asked the mayor for approval of a $963,000 budget allocation for the society, which runs the Bronx Zoo and the Coney Island Aquarium.

Local 1501, State, County and Municipal employes, went on strike Apr. 2 after three years of trying to get recognition and a contract.

Reuther Asks Salary Security For Workers in Automotive Industry

Detroit—Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther has called on the major automotive companies to "face up to" the need for job security in the auto industry and served notice that in contract negotiations this year the companies must "explore with us" replacement of the "morally indefensible" hourly wage system with a salary system.

The union will "listen with open minds" if management argues that some of the workers' job problems should be dealt with by the government, Reuther said, but will "insist" that the corporations then be willing to join with the UAW in seeking governmental solutions.

Reuther made these points in a message to 1.2 million UAW members in advance of the union's special collective bargaining convention here Apr. 27-29.

Asserting that the welfare of the workers is the central issue of our times, the UAW head said the union will challenge the auto industry in negotiations to accept this approach:

"The principle that human beings are not expendable, that those who share in the gains should share in the costs, leads inescapably to the conclusion that taking care of the worker's trouble ought to be the first charge on the benefits resulting from the change."

Reuther said the union is "completely flexible" on the nature of solutions, and whether the needs of workers shall come from management or government or both. But it is "inflexibly determined" to find solutions and will not permit management to escape its responsibility.

Listing a large number of job security improvements the union will seek, Reuther also emphasized the case for transfer of shop workers to a salary system.

The "intolerable" wage system, he charged, is responsible for "much of our members' insecurity." It was born in the "social jungle" of the first industrial revolution and "has no place in the last half of the Twentieth Century," he added.

He quoted J. L. Robertson, member of the Federal Reserve System's board of governors, as telling a meeting of bankers that he saw no "justification for a 'class' distinction between salary workers and wage workers."

"Why shouldn't blue collar workers have tenure, income security, status, and protection from recessions" like white collar workers, Robertson asked.

Reuther urged the motor firms to follow the lead of the Intl. Business Machines Corp., which "for years has had its factory workers on salaries."

"We shall insist that steps be taken in 1961 toward putting an end to [the] morally indefensible discrimination against those who work with their hands," Reuther said.

Reuther said the UAW special convention would study how labor and management can square industrial practice in the United States and Canada with the "democratic faith we seek to advance" in the world.

"We shall come out of that convention, I am confident," he said, "with a program that is economically sound, morally right and socially responsible."

ILGWU Staffers' Union Is Upheld

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that organizers and business agents have the right to form their own union and to bargain for a contract with the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The board by a unanimous vote ruled in favor of the Federation of Union Representatives and directed an election within 30 days to determine whether organizers and business agents want the union to represent them.

The NLRB rejected the ILGWU contention that business agents held "managerial" positions and thus were not entitled to bargain under the labor laws. The ILGWU had agreed to recognize a union of organizers only. The AFL-CIO filed a brief in support of the ILGWU's position.

IAM Officers In Warning on Moonlighting

The Machinists have urged members to avoid the practice of "moonlighting"—working at two jobs—in the interest of protecting the job conditions and opportunities of other workers.

In a statement sent to the union's 2,163 lodges, IAM Pres. Al J. Hayes and Sec.-Treas. Elmer E. Walker warned that moonlighting has become a serious threat to working conditions and is contributing to unemployment.

It is ironic, the officers said, that labor's achievement of the 40-hour week, designed to spread the work and give all workers an opportunity to relax, has made it possible for some to take extra jobs at the expense of others.

"Many of these moonlighters," they said, "earn a fair week's pay at union scale on their regular jobs."

The problem is serious now—and will become more serious when labor reaches its goal of a 35-hour week, Hayes and Walker warned.

Saying that rising automation, plus an increased work force, will result in more leisure time, the two officers asserted it is imperative that both leisure and work opportunities be spread equitably among all members of the work force. The alternative, they said, will be "fewer and fewer jobs for more and more workers."

Hosiery Convention Set for Philadelphia

Philadelphia — The Hosiery Workers will open their 46th convention here May 1 in the Sylvania Hotel. The union had previously announced the date but not the convention city.

John G. Feild To Direct Bias Fight

John G. Feild, legislative assistant to Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and a recognized authority on intergroup relations, has been named executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

Feild's appointment was announced by Assistant Labor Sec. Jerry Holleman, executive vice chairman of the committee set up by Pres. John F. Kennedy to eliminate employment bias by the government and its contractors.

Holleman also announced the appointment of Hobart Taylor, Jr., chief of the civil division in the office of the Wayne County, Mich., prosecuting attorney, as special counsel to the President's committee.

Feild, who will be the committee's full-time operating director, formerly served as president of the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials and as executive director of the Michigan Fair Employment Practices Commission.

UNION PICKETS in Atlanta, Ga., intensifying labor's campaign to focus "grass roots" attention on anti-recession measures, parade in front of downtown hotel to protest vote by Rep. James C. Davis (D-Ga.) against minimum wage measure. Picket line was set up by members of 15 unions and representatives of Georgia State AFL-CIO and Atlanta Central Labor Council.

Labor Spotlight Turned on Foes Of Recession Laws in Congress

tions, the opposition of individual congressmen to these bills.

Here are typical examples of how labor has gone about this task.

Atlanta, Ga.

Several hundred union members, representing locals of 15 internationals and the state and local central bodies, picketed here to protest the vote of Rep. James C. Davis (D-Ga.) against the President's $1.25 minimum wage measure.

Pickets marched in front of the Dinkler Plaza Hotel where the 5th District congressman was addressing a Chamber of Commerce luncheon.

Placards carried by the union members labeled the congressman "Minimum Jim" and "Low Wage Davis" and one picket, clad in costume, carried a sign reading "Don't Monkey with the $1.25."

A union spokesman said the costume was a pointed reference to the fact that in the recent election several hundred write-in votes were cast for a monkey named "Willie B"—Davis' only "opponent."

Davis walked through the picket line to enter the hotel, where he defended his vote against any minimum wage increase by telling the 1,000 CofC luncheon guests that a higher wage floor would lead to "spiraling inflation" and more unemployment.

Taking part in the demonstration—which received coverage by Atlanta newspapers and radio and television stations — were representatives of the Georgia State AFL-CIO and the Atlanta Labor Council.

Unions represented included the Ladies' Garment Workers, Laundry & Dry Cleaning Intl. Union, Communications Workers, Auto Workers, Retail Clerks, Textile Workers Union of America, Steelworkers, Machinists, Hat Workers, United Textile Workers, Bus Drivers, Operating Engineers, Clothing Workers, Painters and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Hudson, N. Y.

A station wagon—equipped with boldly painted signs and a loudspeaker — is touring Columbia County to inform the voters that local Rep. J. Ernest Wharton (R-N. Y.) had voted against temporary extension of jobless pay for the long-term unemployed.

The project, launched by the AFL-CIO Upper Hudson Area Central Labor Council, is aimed at putting the sound truck into every community in the 29th Congressional District which Wharton represents. In particular, the sound truck will be put outside of unemployment compensation offices throughout the district to acquaint the jobless with his vote.

The signs on the truck declare pointedly that of New York State's 43 Republicans and Democrats in Congress, only four representatives—including Wharton—opposed the extension.

Newspapers in the district published pictures of the sound truck, stories of the central labor body's criticism of Wharton's vote, and a statement from the congressman himself that he opposed the bill because he feared "federal encroachment" on state's rights.

Sy Cohen, secretary-treasurer of the central body, accused Wharton of "complete disregard" of the plight of unemployed workers in his district, and called the GOP congressman's "wrong" vote an example of "callous indifference to misery."

Akron, O.

The Rubber Workers — with its international headquarters here and with a heavy concentration of members in the 14th Congressional District — has launched a frontal attack on Rep. William H. Ayres (R-O.) for his stand on minimum wage legislation.

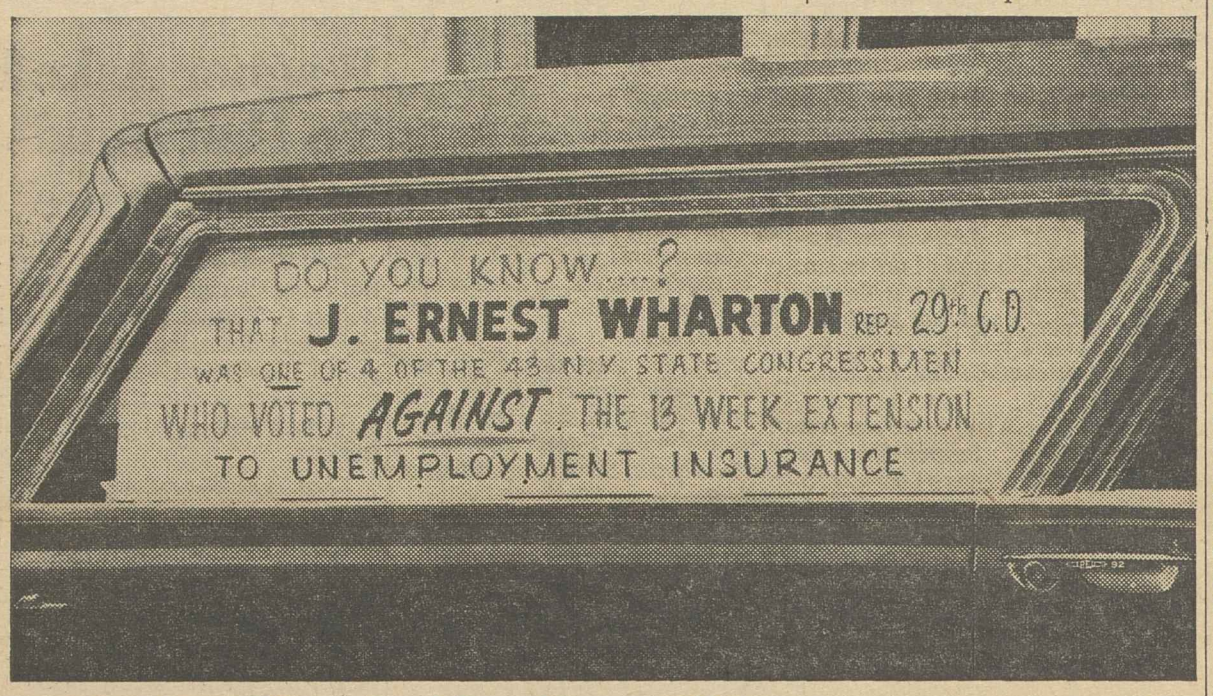
Ayres, one of the leaders of the conservative Republican - southern Democratic coalition in the House, was co-author with Rep. A. Paul Kitchin (D-N.C.) of a weak wage-hour substitute which the House voted after rejecting, by a one-vote margin, an Administration-backed compromise. In 1960, the coalition teamed up to force a similar Ayres-Kitchin substitute through the House.

In a sharply worded statement, URW Pres. George Burdon has accused the Ohio Republican of a "lack of concern" for underpaid workers. Ayres, he said, "preferred to line up on the side of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Retail Federation instead of on the side of the people who were looking to Congress for much-needed help."

The URW blast against Ayres pointed out that an adequate minimum wage is one of the most important protections northern industries and communities have against sweatshop competition from industrial groups in the South. "Yet," the union said, "we find Ayres working side by side with these Dixiecrats to weaken the position of northern employers who are paying fair wages."

To the voters in the 14th District, the URW posed this question:

"What does Ayres have against low-wage workers?"



"WRONG" VOTE CAST by Rep. J. Ernest Wharton (R-N.Y.) against temporary extension of unemployment compensation benefits is publicized by Upper Hudson Area Central Labor Council, Hudson, N. Y., with sound truck bearing this sign. Truck is touring 29th congressional district, with stops at unemployment compensation offices, to focus attention on representative's vote.

Meany, Goldberg Open Situs Picketing Drive

Biemiller, Meany declared that he associated the AFL-CIO with the testimony of the leadoff witness, C. J. Haggerty, president of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Haggerty called Thompson's bill a measure which would "restore the basic economic rights of the workers in the building and construction trades industry"—rights, he said, which were taken away by the National Labor Relations Board's interpretation of the Taft-Hartley Act in the now-famous Denver Building Trades case.

In the Denver case—upheld by a 6-3 Supreme Court decision—the labor board ruled that the picketing of a non-union contractor by one union at the site of a construction project constituted an illegal secondary boycott if it induced other crafts, employed by other contractors at the site, to walk off the job.

Supported by Goldberg

Administration support for the Thompson bill was voiced by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, who urged passage of the measure as a matter of "equity." The legislation, Goldberg said, would "restore building trades employes to comparatively equal status with their industrial brothers."

As the Taft-Hartley Act now stands, the Cabinet officer declared, industrial employes have picketing rights which far outweigh those of workers in the building and construction industry. Goldberg called this situation "indefensible."

The Denver decision, he said, has seriously hampered the ability of construction employes "to protect their hard-won standards." The Secretary cited, as an example, the fact that in Baltimore, Md., as a result of the Denver ruling, the number of union general contractors dropped from 58 in 1951 to 5 in 1959, and non-union wage rates—ranging from 25 to 70 percent below union scale—"still persist in that city today."

The failure to reverse the Denver ruling, Goldberg said, "invites such efforts to undermine union standards . . . in every community in the country."

Haggerty reminded the subcommittee that legislation comparable to the Thompson bill, to legalize common-site picketing, had been before Congress since 1954, and that three times —in 1954, 1959 and 1960—the full House Labor Committee had approved the proposal.

The only difference between the current Thompson measure and previous bills, he said, is that the present bill would impose 10-day notice requirements before strikes at missile sites or other defense facilities.

Haggerty pointed out that on Feb. 16 the BCTD issued a missile-base policy statement, designed to meet defense needs, that had been hailed by Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, Air Force Sec. Eugene M. Zuckert and Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg. This policy, requiring local unions to "exhaust all available procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes" and directing locals to secure strike authorization from international unions, would dovetail with the 10-day notice provision "to accomplish a desirable purpose," he declared.

Bipartisan Backing Noted

Haggerty also stressed the "solid record of bipartisan support" of the measure, recalling that former Pres. Eisenhower recommended such Taft-Hartley amendments in his State of the Union Messages in 1954, 1958 and 1959.

He read to the subcommittee a letter sent by Pres. Kennedy to the department's seventh annual legislative conference in March, in which the President declared:

"It is still my opinion that secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act regarding picketing activity at sites where several employers pursue a mutual enterprise have unrealistically curtailed the right to strike.

"You can be certain that this Administration will make every effort to amend the law to correct this situation."

As the hearings opened, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, long opposed to situs picketing amendments, issued a statement charging that labor unions "averaged one work stoppage every two days at 21 Atlas, Titan and Minuteman intercontinental missile bases during the eight-month period July through February."

In formal testimony, the chamber charged that the bill would "provide unions with dictatorial power."

Past Support Cited

In calling for picketing rights comparable to those he said were enjoyed by workers in other industries, Haggerty recalled that last year, in its report to the 86th Congress, the majority of the House Labor Committee pointedly compared the standards applied by the labor board.

"In a single employer factory operation," the majority said in 1960, "if a labor organization is engaged in a labor dispute with the factory operator in respect to a matter involving one of the departments of the factory, it can strike and picket the entire factory operation and cause a shutdown of all departments of the factory without becoming subject to the restrictions . . . against secondary boycott activity.

"However . . . where a union engaged in a dispute with an employer on a construction project engages in a strike, an objective of which is to shut down all operations on the jobsite, such strike, to the extent that it is intended to bring about cessation of the operations of other employers on the same jobsite, constitutes unlawful secondary boycott activity."

Gray Best Apprentice Bricklayer

Detroit — King of the nation's Bricklayers' apprentices is 21-year-old Arthur Gray from Hackensack, N. J., who was crowned in an appropriate ceremony during the 1961 Union Industries Show at Cobo Hall here.

Gray, who is serving his second year of apprenticeship, was declared winner of the annual contest that has been held every year since 1947 at the show by the Bricklayers Union.

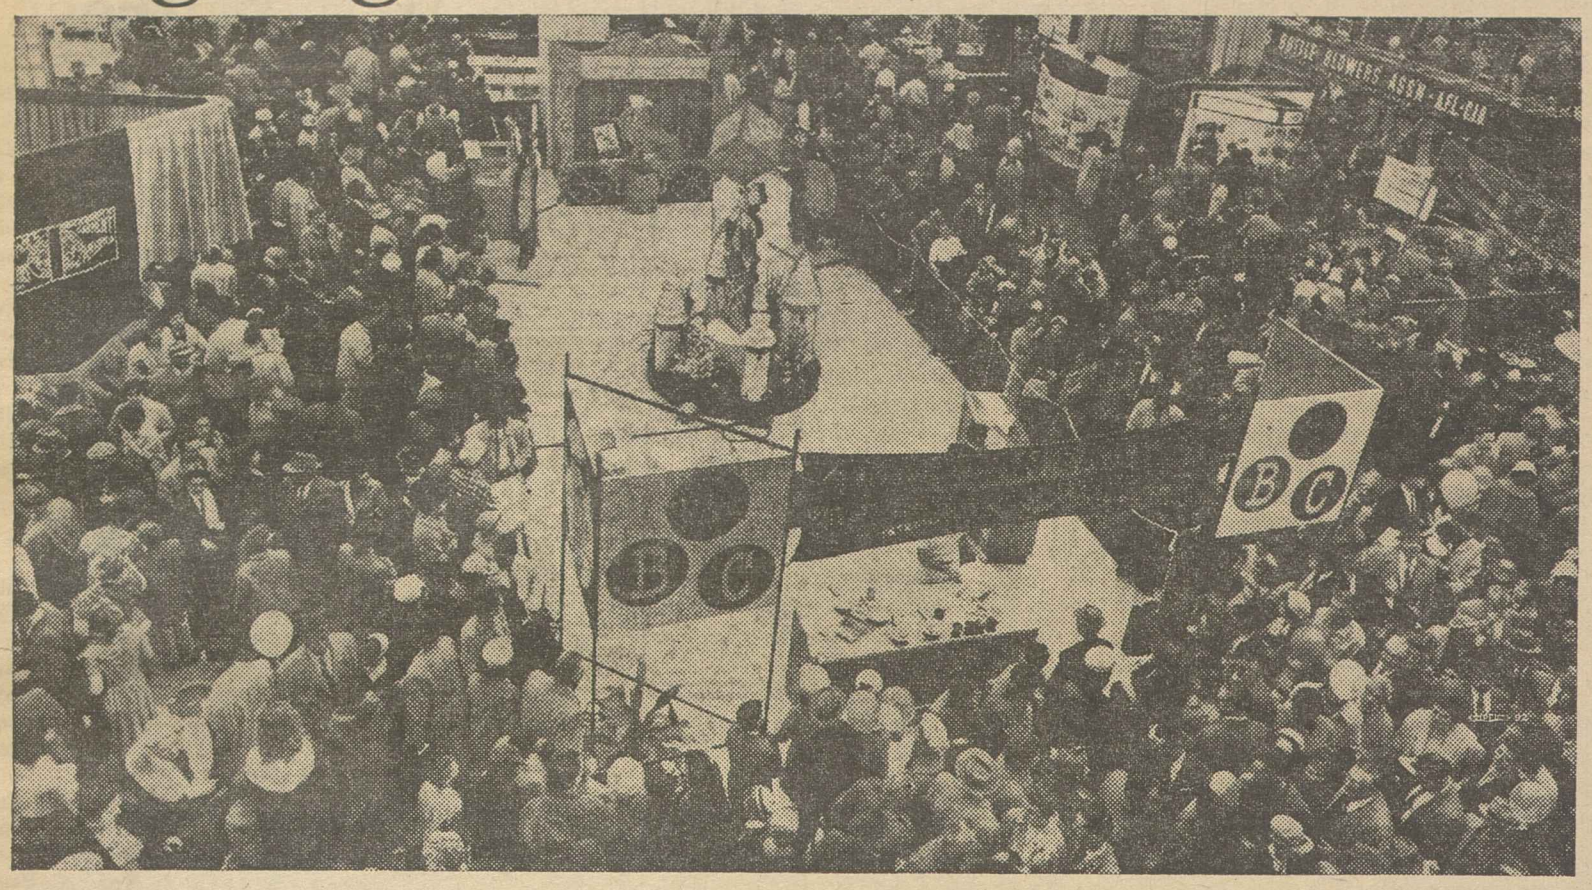
See picture on page 5.

A cash award of $500 was given to Gray by Pres. John J. Murphy.

Finishing second was David Connor of Columbus, whose prize was awarded by Union Treas. Thomas Murphy. Third place went to Cecil Padgett of Dallas, Tex.

The finalists had worked four hours in the extensive exhibit prepared for the show by Bricklayers Local 2 and the Detroit Mason Contractors Association. Added to Gray's winnings were a $100 check and the Belden trophy which were presented by the Structural Clay Products Institute.

Highlights of Union-Industries Show



RECORD-BREAKING CROWD of more than half a million persons turned out in Detroit for six-day AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show. Part of huge attendance at show sponsored by AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. is shown jamming aisles around display of American Bakery & Confectionery Workers.

In all, show featured more than $22 million worth of exhibits, and gave away gifts and prizes totaling more than $120,000. Stressing craftsmanship and cooperation, the exhibits also increase demands for products and services identified by the union label, shop card or service button.

The Supreme Court Rules

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT has restored a sense of reality to the complex area of labor-management relations in its series of decisions involving National Labor Relations Board doctrines.

It struck down the jerry-built decisions put together over the past few years by an NLRB dominated by conservatives appointed by former Pres. Eisenhower. These decisions, affecting union security provisions and hiring procedures, were apparently based on the conservative cliche that unions by their very existence are coercive and that compulsion is the major weapon of bringing workers into unions.

This is the unreality the court struck down. The law requires evidence of coercion, compulsion or discrimination—not merely a finely-woven argument that a certain contract clause or practice could at some time possibly be misused.

Some of the NLRB decisions were categorized in the majority opinions of the Supreme Court as "punitive" and as legislating beyond the scope of the Taft-Hartley Act itself. These are charges that were leveled against the board by the trade union movement in case after case in the past few years.

The Supreme Court decisions clear the air for the time being and give the present board an opportunity to restore reality and balance to the area of labor-management relations as they impinge on national labor law.

But what of all the years during which unions were hampered and harassed in their work by the threat of the imposition of the punitive Brown-Olds dues refund formula which the court has voided? And of the uncertainty that hobbled management and labor in the casual employment area where the legality of the hiring hall was questioned?

The NLRB decisions damaged the cause of industrial peace, and the years that intervened before the Supreme Court could correct the situation compounded that damage.

The new board, with the Supreme Court decisions as guides, should dedicate itself to evenhanded administration that will prevent this sort of situation from arising in the future.

Postal Merger

A NEW AND STRONGER postal union has been formed by the merger of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks and the unaffiliated United National Association of Post Office Craftsmen.

The merger ends more than a half-century of rivalry, of talent, money and energy dissipated in organizational competition.

As in so many such cases, the differences which orginally divided the ranks of postal clerks had been largely dissolved by the passage of time and all but forgotten by the present generation of union members. It is a tribute to leaders of both groups that they recognized this and did something about it.

Through this merger members of both organizations have gained a stronger voice which will carry more weight on Capitol Hill and in the Post Office Dept. The new United Federation of Postal Clerks is renewed evidence that the common interests of union members create a bond which heals organizational differences of past years.

Action May Be Near:

Government Held Duty-Bound To Recognize Employe Unions

By Monsignor George G. Higgins

THE WASHINGTON STAR reported recently, under the by-line of Joseph Young, a competent staff writer who covers the civil service beat full time, that Pres. Kennedy is preparing to issue an executive order giving federal and postal employe unions official bargaining rights with government departments and agencies. Such an order is not expected to be issued immediately, but, according to Mr. Young, Administration insiders say the chances are good that it will be issued before too many months elapse.

During the election campaign Pres. Kennedy came out in favor of legislation which would require departments and agencies of the federal government to deal officially with employe groups on personnel policy, grievances, and other matters. At the present time, however, there seems to be a feeling within the Administration that such a goal can best be achieved by means of an executive order.

Leaders of federal and postal employe unions have advocated legislation on this subject for many years. Mr. Young reports, however, that if a strong executive order is issued by the President and if there is reason to believe that such an order will have enough "teeth" in it to assure compliance, employe leaders will welcome it.

Such a directive from the Executive Dept. of the government is long overdue. Approximately 50 years ago Congress enacted a law (the Lloyd-LaFollette Act) permitting government employes to join unions of their own choosing. Since that time a number of unions have been formed in the government service. But while many agencies deal with these unions unofficially, they have never been formally recognized by the Executive Dept.

The government has a duty to recognize the right of its own employes to organize, not only in theory but in practice. The right to organize is a natural right of every human being. It does not depend upon the nature of the work in which a person is engaged.

CLEARLY ASIDE from the question of rights, however, the various agencies of the federal government have a responsibility to set an example for private industry in the field of labor relations. It would probably be fair to say that up to the present time they have failed to carry out this responsibility. Private industry, in many respects, has been more intelligent and more enlightened in its personnel policies.

The very least that the federal government can do to make up for lost time is to encourage its employes to exercise their right to organize, and to insist that responsible administrators of government agencies take the initiative in developing a system of labor relations under which unions of government employes would not only be permitted, but would be encouraged to speak for and to represent their constituents more effectively.

But what about the right of government employes to strike? The theoretical answer to this question is relatively easy, but the practical answer is another matter altogether. Government employe unions ought to surrender the right to strike voluntarily. On the other hand, if they do voluntarily adopt a no-strike pledge, it then becomes the duty of their public employers to provide an adequate alternative or substitute for the weapon of the strike.

Methods will have to be developed by which government workers can effectively appeal their economic grievances without the necessity of resorting to the strike. In other words, if the public has some rights, it also has come duties. And if government workers have some duties to the public, they also have some rights. It is to be hoped that Pres. Kennedy's proposed executive order will enable them to implement these rights more effectively than they have been able to do.

Morgan Says:

Greater U.S. Efforts Answer To Red Attempt at Domination

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

AFTER THE NEWS about the Russian man in space had brought her down to earth, so to speak, a Washington housewife I know switched off her radio and said, "Well, this is their era now."

That remark bears closer examination. It may have been more profoundly and painfully penetrating than she knew. Is this indeed the Communist Era? They have us on the defensive from outer space to inner Cuba. We are skidding lushly along with a gross national product worth half a trillion dollars and yet we can't seem to afford the educational plant which our most thoughtful authorities say is essential for our purposeful progress as a nation. We have hoisted civilization to an undreamed-of plateau of materialistic comfort but we are faltering below the peaks of confidence, uneasy about the quality of our achievements. We are mastering the fantastic mechanics of automation without a solution, pushbutton or otherwise, for hardcore unemployment. We give lip service to the virtues of our free society while ravaging ourselves with inner doubts about it—as witness the savage and continuing assault on the American system by frightened and frightening members of the John Birch Society.

Morgan

One hundred years before, the shot was fired at Fort Sumter which cleaved the nation with the bloody gash of the Civil War. One month before that, in March 1861, Czar Alexander II, afterwards called the Liberator, freed the serfs in Mother Russia.

Now, a century later, a strange, relatively new dynamism called the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has flexed its muscles again and flipped a man nearly 200 miles up toward the stars, hurled him around the world and retrieved him, seemingly with the ease of tossing a boy in a blanket. If one observed on this momentous day in history that we Americans are still fighting the Civil War, one would also have to observe, for balance, that serfdom has by no means been fully replaced by freedom in the Communist kingdom of all the Russias.

Still, that might not turn out to be the central point. We are locked in a test of strength. Wars aside, is there a danger that the Communist system is going to prove more durable than ours? Responding to that question put by this reporter at his news conference, Pres. Kennedy said it will be a long drawn-out test of durability.

"I do not regard the first man in space as a sign of the weakening of the free world," he added, "but I do regard the total mobilization of men and things for the service of the Communist bloc over the last years as a source of great danger to us, and I would say we are going to have to live with that danger through much of the rest of this century.

"MY FEELING IS that we are more durable in the long run. These dictatorships enjoy many short range advantages . . . But in the long run, I think our system suits (better) the qualities and aspirations of people . . . to be their own masters. Our job is to maintain our strength until our great qualities can be brought more effectively to bear. But during the meantime it is going to require a united effort."

Sputniks and space ships are more spectacular, he conceded, but if we can get fresh water from salt water cheaply the long-range benefits to humanity would dwarf other scientific accomplishments. Actually the U.S. is already extracting fresh water from sea water experimentally. He also mused on the vast progress that would stem from applying all the devices of science and other techniques to bring enlightenment to uneducated sections of the world. Actually we have the wherewithal in minds and materials to achieve these and other marvelous things now but we are not united in our purpose nor do we Americans seem to be seized with any over-riding sense of urgency about them.

After the Soviets put a man into space, an enterprising reporter called Langley Air Force Base in Virginia to try to get the reaction of our own astronauts. He got their press officer, Lt. Col. John Powers. "It's 3 a. m. in the morning, you jerk," Powers shouted. ". . . If you want something from us, the answer is we are all asleep."

Neither the country nor the astronauts are unretrievably asleep but it may be later than we think, just the same.

Washington Reports:

Goldberg Predicts Useful Role For Labor-Management Group

THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT Advisory Committee named by Pres. Kennedy will succeed where previous such groups have failed because of the way it was named and functions, Sec. of Labor Arthur J. Goldberg asserted in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service educational program heard on 460 radio stations.

"This is a presidential panel," Goldberg said. "This means that the President appointed the panel and is closely following its work. He appeared at the (first) meeting. He made a statement there. And he participated."

"A "mistake" of the past in handling labor-management groups was "to invite a few people and then put them on their own," Goldberg said.

He explained that everyone on the panel "was selected in his own right as a distinguished American."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was selected "not as someone nominated by the AFL-CIO . . . (but) because he is a great American interested in his country, devoted to our institutions, determined to do all he can to support our country," Goldberg said.

"The same applies to Mr. (Thomas) Watson, the head of Intl. Business Machines, as an example. He was not named by any group any more than Mr. Meany was.

"And there was a consensus at the first meeting that everyone there represented the public (and not the group from which he came)."

ANOTHER REASON the committee will be successful, Goldberg declared, is the method of operation.

"We don't think in terms of having resolutions introduced by one party, discussed and voted on," he said. "We do not think in terms of votes, but rather in terms of enlightened discussion, of educating each other, educating the public, and advising the President about broad questions of public policy."

Unemployment caused by automation and other technological factors, the means of increasing economic growth, and maintaining a favorable competitive position in foreign trade will be among the problems discussed by the committee, the Secretary said.

Retraining programs for workers through labor-management cooperation and step-ups in apprentice and vocational programs are necessary, Goldberg said.

"More important, we must upgrade the quality of our education—we need more scientists, more professionals," he said.

Goldberg urged "understanding" of the export-import situation. "Last year, we exported $5 billion more than we imported," he said. "I know it's difficult for a worker displaced by an import to look at the whole picture, but we must realize that many more Americans are employed because of our exports than are displaced by imports. We must realize we cannot retreat into protectionism."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE NEW JERSEY election for governor, pitting former Labor Sec. James P. Mitchell for the Republicans against Richard J. Hughes for the Democrats, promises one of the hottest political contests of 1961—and a part of the Republican Party's future may ride on the results.

In the in-gathering of clans that follows a hard-fought primary, Mitchell said that his first task was to heal the intra-party wounds inflicted during his victorious race for the nomination.

Mitchell won by beating down the opposition of most GOP county leaders, who supported State Sen. Walter H. Jones. One of his jobs was to soothe the bitterness of Jones himself, who was charged by Mitchell supporters and in the press with mixing his law practice and his legislative service.

The broader issue involves national issues and personalities.

A KEY FIGURE in the contest was Sen. Clifford P. Case, a highly articulate moderately liberal Republican, who was the target last year of an extraordinary attempt by right-wing GOP and business elements to drive him from public life.

Robert Morris, a former counsel for the Senate Internal Security subcommittee, ran against Case after the business and party groups had formed their alliance to defeat the senator in the Republican primary. Case won overwhelmingly, and went on to roll up a huge election victory in November despite the fact that Pres. Kennedy carried New Jersey by a narrow margin. The doctrine that Case was "too liberal" for Jersey voters was convincingly smashed.

Case himself says the Mitchell-Jones battle was decided largely on the basis of "general competence and political appeal," rather than as a straight-out test of liberal and conservative power. This is probably correct, since Jones himself supported Case last year, although New York's Republican Sen. Jacob K. Javits interpreted the Mitchell victory as a liberal one and Arizona's conservative Sen. Barry Goldwater said it proved nothing except that Mitchell could win in a New Jersey GOP primary.

The fact remains that after the Eisenhower Administration, control of the Republican Party remained largely in the hands of conservatives in Congress symbolized by the House and Senate GOP leaders, Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) and Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.).

Since the failure of former Interior Sec. Douglas McKay to beat Sen. Wayne Morse for the Senate in Oregon in 1956—even in a year when Morse had switched parties—Mitchell is the only Eisenhower Cabinet official to seek a political career on his own.

He may have a strong strain of fiscal conservatism—he doesn't think New Jersey needs new revenues to improve social services—but he is closer to Case than to Goldwater, or for that matter to Halleck or Dirksen.

THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE of the Republicans in Congress, a new device by which the GOP is seeking to lead party policy and impress the country now that the Democrats have the White House, has until recently done nothing observable to change the party image as one in alliance with southern Democratic congressmen to block or slice down Kennedy legislation.

It is now setting up a committee of experts to make a study of so-called structural unemployment—the joblessness resulting from automated processes that permanently erase jobs. What federal action Republicans might support to meet the problems still remains to be proved.

The GOP professionals in the party's National Committee have become belatedly aware that last November they lost strength heavily in suburban areas as well as in the big cities. They are talking about improving their organization—but improved organization does not win urban votes unless a program that meets the needs of cities goes with it.

With the spread of industry to the suburbs and a shift of middle-income voters there, problems of traffic congestion, water pollution and housing are also spreading beyond city limits. A vital political party must have a program to meet them.

National leaders will probably pour into New Jersey to speak during the Mitchell-Hughes race. One of the interesting elements will be the nature and tone of Mitchell's campaign, the kind of program he feels able to advance.

Jaycees Told Union Story By AFL-CIO Spokesman

Labor's story — told by labor — has been brought to an influential business-oriented audience, by invitation.

Future, the monthly publication of the U.S. Junior Chamber of Commerce, asked AFL-CIO Public Relations Dir. Albert J. Zack to describe to the organization's members the goals and accomplishments of the trade union movement. The result was a featured article in the current issue of the magazine entitled "Labor States Its Case."

The article, describing how unions have benefited all segments of the economy, expressed the hope that as the business leaders of tomorrow acquire a better understanding of unions "future years may see a reversal of the recent deterioration in labor-management relations that has troubled many thoughtful citizens and ought to trouble a great many more."

How to Buy:

Seller vs. Consumer Cold War Warms When Business Is Slack

By Sidney Margolius

WHEN BUSINESS IS SLACK, as now, the usual cold war of the sellers against the consumers heats up tremendously. You ought to know about some of the tricks of the trade. You're the intended victim. Moreover, some of these selling ruses will get even more elaborate as the Mother's Day gift-buying season approaches.

Much of the high-pressure selling that plagues consumers, results from the system of paying dealers and salesmen bonuses for pushing particular products. This is the real payola, far more widespread than the recently-exposed payola paid by record manufacturers to disc jockeys, the general counsel of the Federal Trade Commission has said.

It's difficult to blame the salesmen. They did not invent the system of "push money," "spiffs," etc. But the result is they often are influenced to push higher-priced goods.

The most notorious recent example of payola at the retail counter was Procter & Gamble's payments to demonstrators and dealers for recommending Tide and Dash for automatic washers. But the payola extends much further. It's often found in the home furnishings and appliance departments of the store, and even in cosmetics and low-priced goods like nylons.

There are really two kinds of retail payola. One is the push money or "PMs" paid by manufacturers to store personnel to push a particular brand. The other is the system used by many retailers of paying salespeople higher commissions on the costlier models.

The effect upon us consumers is that it's hard to know when a salesman is giving us good advice or simply trying to "sell us up."

This is not to say you never can believe a salesman's advice. Many salespeople have long experience, and their knowledge can be valuable if you can separate the "selling up" from the actual advice. In fact, one of the ways to know how to pick good value is to ask the salespeople in different stores a lot of questions.

IF THE ADVERTISED special obviously is "nailed to the floor," as they say in trade, you know you are the target for "selling-up."

If you shop for a television set, you're likely to be the object of some hard selling-up these days. If you planned to buy a 17-inch set you're likely to be urged to get the 19-inch size; if the 19, the 23-inch size. If you want only a portable, the drive will be to sell you a console.

Often a costlier model represents little actual extra value and actually is made up especially for the purpose of selling up. A leading mattress manufacturer has just brought out a new mattress line. Its standard mattress listing at $79.50 is basically the same mattress with the same innerspring unit as the deluxe model at $99.50.

Outside salesmen or "canvassers" are especially notorious for using "selling up" tactics combined with easy credit to unload expensive goods. A few weeks ago a delegation of over 100 consumers from Detroit picketed the State Capital in Lansing protesting they were being forced by a Detroit bank to pay for inferior carpeting bought from canvassers.

Some of the group, which calls itself "The Suckers Organization," paid as much as $30 a square yard for the carpeting.

The sellers then turned their installment accounts over to the bank. The bank is demanding payment. The people who bought the carpeting have agreed among themselves not to pay.

Now a bill has been introduced in Michigan to allow customers to make the same defense against the subsequent holder of a note as might be used against the original seller. If this legislation, which would be desirable for all states, is enacted, then a bank couldn't say that defective merchandise is none of its affair, and that you have to pay up. The bank or finance company would be just as responsible for fraudulent selling as the dealer.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Travel Ads and Phrasebooks Talk About Different Countries

By Jane Goodsell

I'VE READ PLENTY of horrifying books, but for sheer stark tragedy, few can compare with a little volume titled Spanish for the Tourist.

It is an instruction manual consisting of Spanish translations of phrases the tourist is likely to need in Mexico. After reading it I'm ready to stay at home. That book raised more goose pimples per page than anything Edgar Allan Poe ever wrote.

I was in such a state of anxiety over the plot complications that I skipped the Spanish translations completely. As a result, I didn't increase my Spanish vocabulary by a single word, but I don't think it matters. If I find myself in a mere fraction of the predicaments the author has prepared me for, I'll have hysterics in my native tongue.

The book opens pleasantly enough with a list of General Useful Phrases: "Good morning." "A thousand thanks." "Did you sleep well?" "Pardon my lateness."

But even here, sprinkled among the courtesies, are a few hints of the disasters soon to befall. "There is no hope." "What is wrong?" "What is happening?" "I am not afraid." "Look out!"

This is simply mood music, setting the tone for tragedy. The real crises begin the chapter titled Travel.

On the train: "There is no dining car." "This seat is dirty." "Can you give me another blanket?" 'I am sorry, Madam, there are none left."

By airplane: "How is the weather?" "It is hailing."

By boat: "I am seasick. Call the doctor, the steward."

Luggage problems beset our tourist at every step of the way: "Where is the baggage checked?" "I cannot find my bags."

But these are minor irritations compared to the tragedy of a chapter headed Auto Travel: "I am on the wrong road." "My car is broken down." "Can you help me?" "Push me." "Pull me." "My car is stuck in the sand."

Hard on the heels of this scene comes a section titled Fines: "I am a stranger here." "I don't know the regulations." "He ran into me." "It was not my fault."

But these plaintive excuses are to no avail, and our harried tourist must wire home for extra funds: "I wish to send an urgent night letter." "Can I send this wire collect?" "I am expecting money." "Has anything come for me?"

A relief from disaster is clearly indicated at this point, and it is provided in the chapter titled Flirting and Terms of Endearment. A charming scene it is, too: "I like you." "I love you very much." "Tell me if you love me." "I am dying for you." "Don't take so long to say yes." "How adorable you are."

Imagine my shock when, at the end of the chapter—after the lovemaking—comes the question, "Are you married?"

Maybe I'm old fashioned, but I feel that this question should have been settled earlier, before things got so involved.

Biography of a Union:

Book Tells Story of Glass Bottle Blowers

Automation came to the glass bottle industry 65 years ago in the form of a ponderous bottle-blowing machine, and before long pessimists were predicting that The Machine would swallow the ancient craft of Glass Bottle Blowers. But today the union, strong and diversified, has survived panics, recessions, strikebreaking, cheap foreign imports, court injunctions and national prohibition.

How the organization did it is told in a new book, Flame and Heart, a history of the GBBA. Author Lee W. Minton, union president, dedicated his book to the memory of James Maloney, president from 1924 to 1946, for his "remarkable contributions to the success of the union."

Noting that Maloney was one of an outstanding procession of great leaders, Minton takes his theme from this quotation: "As long as there is flame in the furnace and heart in the membership, tomorrow holds no fear for the Glass Bottle Blowers."

When The Machine was introduced to its first glass works in Washington, Pa., the union's 2,400 members were highly paid artisans making up to $7.50 a day and $45 a week. By 1924, the last of the old "handblowers" had vanished from the scene and The Machine was king.

Union Survived Change

The union survived the transformation of the industry by supporting a decision of Pres. Denis Hayes in the 1890s. That decision was not to fight the introduction of labor-saving machinery, but to get employers to agree that only union members could operate it.

National prohibition flattened the industry for 15 years and reduced union membership to less than 2,000. But by 1945 GBBA had bounced back with 35,000 members and reserves of almost $1 million. The latest count, Minton says, showed 56,000 members making glass containers and working in the growing fiber glass industry and plastics.

The book gives these significant dates in union history: 1739, the first U.S. glass factory at the Wistar Works in Alloway, N. J.; 1842, Wistar workers formed the first glass union; 1846, the union and employers reached the first American industry-wide agreement; 1886, the union voted to accept no new apprentices; 1897, the union encouraged a few staunch members to take jobs in non-union plants to act as volunteer organizers; 1907, employers agreed to a uniform Saturday quitting time of 4 p. m.; 1919, employers agreed to this clause: "Eight hours actual working time shall constitute a day's work."

GBBA had its continuing crises through prohibition and the Great Depression of the 1930s, but Repeal in 1933 and the New Deal brought a new prosperity which still persists as the industry expands.

Bigger Shots May Be Called:

Days of Price-Fixing Past, Executives Say

A parade of lower-echelon Westinghouse and General Electric executives has fervently assured the Kefauver Senate Anti-Trust subcommittee that their price-fixing days are gone forever.

"If I see a competitor on one side of the street, I'll go on the other side," John Peters, a GE marketing specialist, pledged.

Another witness, Westinghouse sales executive D. R. Jenkins, told the subcommittee that he had doubts about effectiveness of bid-rigging meetings among leading electrical equipment manufacturers even before the government broke up the conspiracy.

'Didn't Work Very Good'

The system just "didn't work very good," he said. It was the effectiveness of the meetings—not ethical questions—he had in mind, the witness indicated to Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.)

A second GE official, L. B. Gezon, said he had taken part in price-fixing meetings with competitors beginning in 1953. In 1956, he said, he stopped going to the meetings on the advice of a new superior, Frank E. Stehlik. But, he added, in 1958 Stehlik ordered him to resume the meetings. He told the subcommittee he assumed that Stehlik, who pleaded guilty in the criminal anti-trust case, acted on orders from higher up.

To question the company officials at public hearings, Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) had to beat down a demand by GOP members of the subcommittee that all witnesses be heard behind closed doors, and preferably not at all. Sen. Alexander Wiley (R-Wis.) argued that the testimony might make it more difficult for the electrical companies, which have been fined for criminal anti-trust violations, to defend themselves against civil anti-trust damage suits.

The GOP picked up a conservative Democratic ally, Sen. William Blakley (Tex.), but the attempt to close the hearings to the press and public was defeated on a 4-4 tie vote.

After two days of questioning lower-level officials, most of whom claimed to have been following patterns of business ethics set by their superiors, Kefauver said he is considering summoning the presidents and board chairmen of the big electrical companies before the subcommittee.

Top-level officials of the biggest companies in the conspiracy were not indicted and have expressed surprise that many of their subordinates were engaged in illegal price-fixing without their knowledge.

Kefauver, at the start of the hearings, reminded the subcommittee that GE Board Chairman Ralph J. Cordiner had appeared before the subcommittee two years ago and assured the senators that GE educates its employes with "undiminished vigor" to obey all anti-trust laws.

Meetings Described

While none of the witnesses had attended a price-fixing meeting at "Dirty Helen's," which Kefauver said at the start of the hearings was one of the more out-of-the-way places where conspirators met, they did describe meetings in hotel rooms, usually in connection with trade association meetings.

Other meetings, the subcommittee was told, were called by a manufacturer who was seeking to get an agreement that he would not be underbid on a specific job.

Kefauver asked one witness if such sessions were usually convened by a manufacturer who argued, "I haven't had a contract for a long time; how about letting me have this one?"

"You sound like you've been there, Senator," the witness agreed.

A $30,000 a year Westinghouse department manager, Alva A. Johnson, said he was aware that both his superior and a subordinate were involved in meetings with competitors that he "assumed" were illegal. But he said he didn't protest because "I was in the middle" and "it is not customary for me to tell my superior what to do."

He said he has since told his subordinate, who pleaded guilty in the anti-trust case, not to break the law.

MSGR. GEORGE G. HIGGINS, left, receives the Washington Newspaper Guild's Arthur D. Riordan Memorial Award for 1960 from Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg at the local's Front Page Ball. The award, named for a deceased WNG past president, went to the National Catholic Welfare Conference's social action director for his 20-year campaign to prevent exploitation of migratory workers.

Aid Revision Urged On Briefing Session

The greatest shortcoming of America's foreign aid programs in the past, and one which the Kennedy Administration is trying to correct, has been the mistaken idea that dollars alone can modernize an underdeveloped nation.

This was the central theme of "Aid to 100 Nations," latest unit in the public affairs television series, "Briefing Session," presented jointly by the AFL-CIO and the National Educational Television & Radio Center.

Guest panelists Robert R. Bowie, director of Harvard University's center of international affairs, and Michael A. Heilperin, associate editor of Fortune magazine, both praised the new Administration's foreign aid proposals.

"The problem of economic aid is much more than economic," Bowie said. "It is social, it is political, and it involves a whole range of things which I would prefer to call the modernizing process. It is the whole job of re-educating people to make them able to play a part in a dynamic economy rather than a static or traditional society."

Heilperin described Kennedy's message as a "long-needed rejuvenation of the entire program and the entire approach." He hailed its emphasis on self-help within the countries receiving aid, and its recognition that "economic growth is essentially a homespun process."

Edward P. Morgan, host and moderator of the series, noted that some of the most-needed assistance, in such fields as education, health and agriculture, did not require large capital expenditures; yet the new governments of new nations might prefer a spectacular dam or highway.

The panelists agreed that attempting to influence the decisions of another government is "pretty delicate stuff." Bowie suggested a greater role for such agencies as the Int. Bank and the United Nations Special Fund, whose proposals would escape the suspicion of national motivation.

Among the other points of agreement were:

- Aid programs should be planned on a long-range basis, rather than year to year.
- It is a great mistake to treat the new nations as though they had "full-fledged bureaucracies able to make decisions and carry them out;" the very development of effective government must be a part of our assistance.
- While there has been "waste" in the foreign aid program, most of it has stemmed from "errors of judgment" no greater than those that occur in other areas of national life.
- Private capital will ultimately have a role to play in underdeveloped nations, but not in the immediate future.
- There is no need to "choose" between foreign aid and domestic redevelopment; we can do both without undermining the dollar.

In the preliminary briefing, John MacVane, the program's news analyst, pointed out that in 1956-59, Japan and 16 western nations provided underdeveloped areas with almost $7 billion a year in non-military aid, or nearly twice what the United States spent in the same period.

Frank Grillo Dies; Ex-URW Officer

San Juan, P. R.—Frank Grillo, director of the Puerto Rico office of the Rubber Workers, and a former AFL-CIO organizer, died in Rodriguez Army Hospital at Fort Brooke after suffering a heart attack. He was 59.

Grillo, one of the founders of the URW, belonged to a federal union of rubber workers in Los Angeles, became an organizer for the former AFL in 1934 and the following year joined the URW when it was being organized. He was elected international secretary-treasurer the same year and served until 1942, when he resigned to go into the Army.

After leaving the service he worked for the Furniture Workers for about a year and in 1951 was appointed an organizer by the former CIO, serving through the merger and with the AFL-CIO until May 1956. He came here for the URW in 1957.

He is survived by his wife, Lillian. Burial was in Hato Tejas National Cemetery here.

ACWA Cancels Ban on Jap Cloth

Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky has advised Pres. John F. Kennedy that the ACWA's proposed boycott of Japanese cloth used in making men's suits has been cancelled.

The action came after the Administration had appealed to the ACWA to call off its potential May 1 ban on handling any suits made with Japanese cloth shipped into the country after that date. The union, in discussing the boycott, had pointed to a heavy loss of jobs in the American men's suit industry.

A White House spokesman described Kennedy as "extremely gratified" when he was informed by Potofsky of the ACWA's action.

Brown Takes Labor Dept. Bureau Post

The appointment of George T. Brown, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, as deputy director of the government's Bureau of Labor Standards has been announced by Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg.

Brown in resigning his AFL-CIO post returned to the department where he served eight years ago as executive assistant to then Labor Sec. Martin P. Durkin.

An expert in the field of occupational safety, Brown had been a Meany assistant from 1953.

He has been executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Occupational Safety and Health and chairman of a subcommittee which helped draft the first safety code for ship repair yards under the Longshore & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Born in Baltimore, he attended Baltimore City College and Johns Hopkins University, where he received a doctor's degree in political economy in 1934. From 1934 to 1942 he taught at Seton Hall College and Catholic University.

George T. Brown Named to Labor Standards Post

During World War II he served in the office of the War Labor Board. From 1946 to 1951, Brown was director of research for the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, and in 1951-1952 executive assistant to the labor members of the Wage Stabilization Board.

Brown and his wife have five children. They live in Garrett Park, Md.

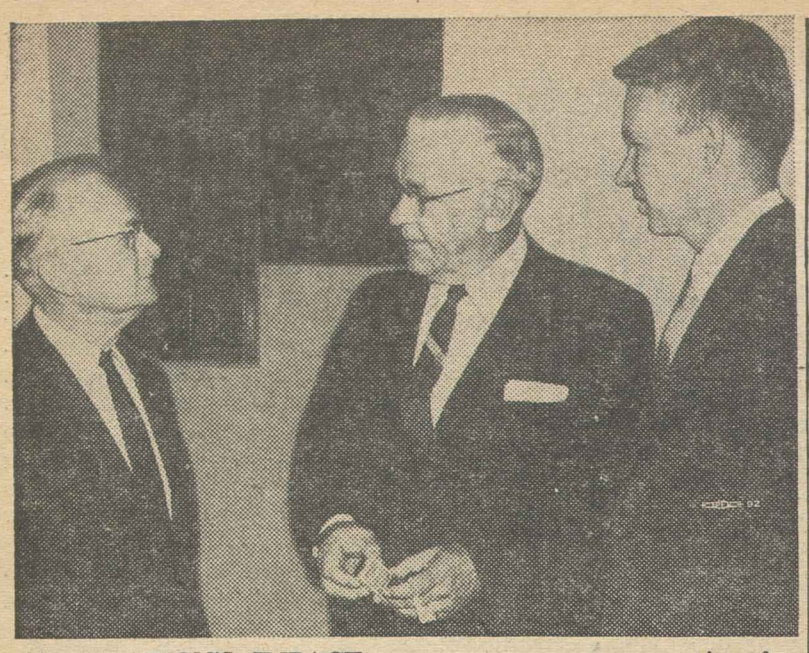
Briefing Panel To Explore 'Image' of U.S.

What is the "Image of America" in the minds of peoples overseas? This question will be explored in the next "Briefing Session" program by two authorities, one academic and the other journalistic.

Kenneth W. Thompson, a political scientist who has taught at the University of Chicago and Northwestern University, is active in the Council on Foreign Relations, the American Political Science Association, the Institute of Current World Affairs and similar bodies. He has written and lectured widely on foreign relations.

Kenneth G. Crawford, manager of the Washington bureau of Newsweek magazine, was a war correspondent in North Africa and Europe during World War II.

He is the author of several books and numerous articles on political affairs, both domestic and foreign. In 1939 he became the second president of the American Newspaper Guild, serving out the term of the late Heywood Broun.



AUTOMATION'S IMPACT on an economy not growing fast enough is discussed by, left to right, Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), chairman of a House Labor subcommittee on Unemployment & Automation; Machinists Pres. A. J. Hayes, who testified at hearings, and Dr. Walter Buckingham, staff director of the subcommittee.

Shorter Workweek Proposed:

Hayes Says Chronic Job Lack Poses Threat to Democracy

Machinists Pres. A. J. Hayes has warned that a "do-nothing" policy towards the growing threat of chronic unemployment would "endanger our democratic institutions" by creating "a large mass of rootless, jobless, frustrated and disillusioned workers."

Testifying before a House Subcommittee on Unemployment & Automation. Hayes called for a "massive all-out effort" to meet the challenge of providing "every worker with an opportunity to engage in useful and productive employment."

He told the subcommittee, headed by Rep. Elmer J. Holland (D-Pa.), that a reduction in the workweek is "imperative in the years ahead" to provide jobs for the millions displaced by automation and additional millions who are entering the labor force.

"'The 40-hour week which was established by the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938 is no more sacrosanct than the 44-hour week was then—or the 60-hour week was in 1890's," Hayes declared. "After almost a quarter of a century it has become necessary, once again, to adjust the workweek to the realities of the economic and technological situation."

The IAM president warned that unless the federal government "supplements the now inadequate growth provided by the private sector of the economy, our standard of living and our national strength will inevitably sink under the weight of a horde of job seekers competing at lower wages for fewer and fewer jobs."

Hayes charged that "because of fear of so-called government spending, we have allowed our cities to decay into slums, our rivers to degenerate into open sewers, and our resources to lie wasting."

Cites Fear of Inflation

It is "unrealistic," he said, "to allow a morbid fear of inflation to focus the country's attention on the federal budget deficit when the important deficit is the critical underemployment of the nation's resources."

Hayes emphasized that labor "welcomes automation" and considers that technological progress "is absolutely essential to meet both the internal needs of an expanding population and the external threat posed by communism." But he warned:

"If we go on developing ever greater production capacity without also developing an equal capacity for consumption, we may well achieve a superabundance of productivity—but little actual production. For production cannot exist in a vacuum. . . . It must be sustained by purchasing power.

"This is an economic axiom that seems to have escaped those who view higher productivity as an end in itself. . . . We are already capable of producing much more than our people can absorb with the purchasing power they now have."

Hayes asked coordinated public and private industry efforts in the area of training and retraining of workers in the skills which are and will be in demand. He was sharply critical of the failure of the government to do anything to cushion the impact on hundreds of thousands of workers of the shift in defense procurement from planes to missiles.

Training Not Enough

He warned, however, that "training alone . . . may well be a wasteful, frustrating and even cruel experience unless accompanied by adequate subsistence allowances, relocation allowances, testing and counseling programs and the elimination of job discrimination against the aged and against minority groups."

One method of attaining these objectives, he said, is to strengthen the role of the U.S. Employment Service.

"A really comprehensive employment service with an adequate research and counseling staff can do much to put the right workers in the right jobs at the right time," he said.

Declaring that "the remedies" for chronic unemployment "must go much deeper than many people are willing to admit," Hayes added that "although the President has publicly stated his disapproval of a shorter workweek, I think that he—and industry—must begin to reexamine the causes that will make a shorter workweek imperative in the years ahead."

In other testimony before the subcommittee, a Ford Motor Co. executive agreed with union witnesses that "the major remedy for unemployment is faster economic growth."

But the witness, Malcolm L. Denise, vice president for labor relations, disagreed as to the best means for bringing this about. The solution, he said, is a tax cut to provide greater incentives for capital investment and business research and development.

Drug Price 'Monopoly' Attacked in Twin Bills

Sen. Estes Kefauver (D-Tenn.) and Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) have introduced identical bills aimed at lowering "excessive and unreasonable prices" of prescription drugs by encouraging competition and breaking up "patent controls and cartel agreements."

The need for the legislation, they said, was demonstrated at hearings held last year by the Senate Anti-trust & Monopoly subcommittee, headed by Kefauver. Celler is chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and of its Anti-trust subcommittee.

To "promote competition and protect the public interest," the Kefauver-Celler bill would:

- Make it unlawful under the anti-trust laws for drug companies to agree upon which company will obtain a patent, to agree which companies shall be awarded licenses in the event a patent is issued and to make similar restrictive agreements.
- Require licensing of all qualified applicants, after three years, under patents issued for prescription drugs.
- Require the Food & Drug Administration to pass on the effectiveness as well as the safety of drugs, and require that physicians be provided with more information on potentially harmful as well as beneficial effects of drugs.
- Give the FDA authority to establish simplified "generic" names for drugs as a substitute for the often "long, complex and unpronounceable" scientific names.
- Provide for the licensing of drug manufacturing companies and for broader federal inspection of drug manufacturing plants, "thereby giving to physicians greater confidence in prescribing on the basis of generic rather than trade names."

In a joint statement Kefauver and Celler declared that "the time has arrived for action by Congress to reduce the excessive and unwarranted charges levied by the big drug companies upon those who are least able to afford them — the nation's ill and afflicted."

Agency Shop Contract Held Invalid in Texas

Austin, Tex. — An opinion holding that agency-shop contracts are invalid in Texas has been issued by State Atty. Gen. Will Wilson.

Wilson held that the agency shop, under which employes who do not join the union which bargains for them can be required to pay a service fee, violates Texas' so-called "right-to-work" law and the state Union Regulation Act.

His opinion, which has not been tested in court, was issued in reply to a question from the chairman of the state Senate's Labor & Management Relations Committee.

The chairman, Sen. David W. Ratliff, said some national agreements covering firms with plants in Texas provide for the agency shop and some Texas companies have been asked to sign agency-shop agreements. He sought the ruling, he said, to determine whether "corrective legislation" — presumably a law specifically outlawing the agency shop—was needed.

Wilson's opinion holding that the agency shop violates the "right-to-work" law by making a non-member "in effect a disenfranchised union member against his will" has been hailed by the Texas Manufacturers Association.

The business group also cited a recent National Labor Relations Board ruling that an employer cannot be required to bargain on the issue of an agency shop in a "right-to-work" state. The NLRB, whose membership has changed since the ruling was issued, has been asked to rehear the case.

Court tests of the agency shop in states with "right-to-work" laws which do not specifically mention this type of union security agreement have brought conflicting interpretations.

In Indiana and Florida, state courts have held agency shop contracts to be lawful. In Arizona and Kansas, court decisions have gone against the agency shop.

Opinions by state legal officers have also differed, with a Nevada advisory opinion similar to the one issued in Texas while attorneys general of North Dakota and Nebraska have indicated that agency-shop contracts can be negotiated but can't be enforced.

Papers Push Review of Henderson Convictions

Raleigh, N. C. — Two leading North Carolina newspapers are continuing to press top state officials for a review of the convictions of eight officers and members of the Textile Workers Union of America for a dynamiting conspiracy.

The renewed drive to focus public attention on the case, which stemmed from a long strike at the Harriet-Henderson Cotton Mills, is being carried on by the Raleigh News and Observer and the Charlotte Observer.

Latest statements in the two newspapers came in the wake of the arrest in Martinsville, Va. of the state's star witness during the Henderson trial. Harold E. Aaron, whose testimony sent the TWUA members to prison, was charged in the new case with the malicious wounding of a man in a motel room.

Much of the newspaper campaign to have Gov. Terry Sanford (D) reopen the Henderson case stems from the fact that at the time of his arrest in the Virginia shooting, Aaron allegedly identified himself as an "undercover agent" for the North Carolina State Bureau of Investigation.

Atty. Gen. Wade Bruton, under whose office the SBI operates, denied Aaron's claim. Subsequently, SBI Dir. Walter Anderson disclosed that Aaron had received $1,100 for his role in the Henderson case, but his listing of the payments, the Raleigh News and Observer declared editorially, was "inexcusably vague."

Anderson's answers on the payments, the newspaper said, "will serve only to trouble the conscience of North Carolina more about the entrapment and imprisonment" of the unionists.

"Vagueness on the part of the SBI," the editorial continued, "does not make the State of North Carolina's skirts look any cleaner in the trial and conviction of these union men who, unlike informer Aaron, had no criminal records prior to the cotton mill strike.

"Indeed it is another reason for all fair-minded North Carolinians to be disturbed about the entire matter."

The question of Aaron's criminal record prior to the Henderson trial, in which the prosecutor hailed the witness as "the bravest man I know," was raised by the Charlotte Observer in an article by columnist Kays Gary.

He pointed out that Aaron previously had been convicted of "assault with a deadly weapon, drunkenness, reckless driving, theft, larceny of an auto, impersonation of an officer, etc."

Labor Safety Group Begins 3-Way Drive

The Labor Conference of the National Safety Council has voted to launch an intensified drive for three principal objectives—persuading union members to install automobile seat belts; cooperating in the third annual Labor Day safety campaign; increasing membership of unions in the council.

Meeting in Washington, delegates from government agencies and 60 unions also approved a campaign to "lock out" all unsafe equipment in shops, plants and offices by having it removed from use instead of "tagging" it with warning notices.

Vice Pres. Elwood Swisher of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers presided for two days of sessions. New officers, whose terms start in October, are George T. Brown, chairman, and Hunter P. Wharton, secretary-treasurer of the Operating Engineers, as vice chairman for 1961. Brown, a former assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, has just been named deputy director of the U.S. Bureau of Labor Standards.

Vice Pres. Roy Siemiller of the Machinists, labor repesentative on the President's Committee for Traffic Safety, told the conference that packets of material on safety belts are now available and have been sent to unions requesting them.

Lloyd Utter of the Auto Workers, vice president for labor of the National Safety Council, presented the group's Public Interest Awards to labor papers—the Aero Mechanic, of Machinists District 751 in Seattle, Wash.; the Air Line Pilot, Intl. Operating Engineer, Intl. Woodworker, the Lampmaker, of UAW Local 663, Elwood, Ind., the Machinist, NMU Pilot, Oregon Teamster, Railway Clerk, Sentinel, of Steelworkers' Local 1397, Munhall, Pa.; Trainman News, Union Register of the Carpenters Council, Portland, Ore.; United Mine Workers Journal, United Rubber Worker, Voice of the Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers; and the Waco, Tex., Farm & Labor Journal.

Message to Congress:

Kennedy Asks Broad Tax Program Shifts

Pres. Kennedy has sent Congress proposals for sweeping tax changes including new tax incentives to business to modernize plants and proposing to offset the revenue losses to the Treasury by a series of reforms, including reforms long urged by labor, to eliminate existing "preferential treatment" of some classes of taxpayers.

Emphasizing that his recommendations involve a "set," which he asked Congress to consider as a unit, Kennedy also promised even more comprehensive tax proposals next year after a study by the Treasury Dept.

Special provisions written into the revenue laws, he said, had disturbed the "uniform distribution of the tax burden" and it would be a "major aim to reverse this process" and bring a system "more equitable, more efficient and more conducive to economic growth."

A major proposal is for repeal of the dividend tax credit and other preferred treatment of income from dividends written into the law in 1954 under former Pres. Eisenhower's Administration.

Kennedy also asked that the tax-withholding principle now applied to wages and salaries be extended to the payment of dividends and interest income. He said that in the absence of such a withholding system, an estimated $3 billion in dividends and interest now "improperly escapes taxation."

Credit for 'Incentives'

For "incentives" to business to invest in new plant and equipment, the President recommended a tax-credit system allowing business firms to offset expenditures in this field by subtracting part of the cost from its tax bill.

Under various formulas, this would allow a firm to subtract either 6 percent or 15 percent of extra investment expenditures up to a maximum of 30 percent of its tax bill.

This would be in addition to normal depreciation allowances.

Kennedy said that the plan, designed to stimulate business investment that would not otherwise be made, would be particularly useful to small firms and new and growing ones, without "raising the profitability of old investment."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has expressed strong opposition to any "tinkering with depreciation rates or other tax incentives" as "unsound and as providing special unnecessary benefits for business at the expense of other members of the taxpaying public."

In its February 1961 meeting the council said "we most seriously disagree" that tax incentives are needed to spur modernization of production facilities.

"The economy is in the throes of recession not for lack of adequate business investment, but for lack of adequate purchasing power and consumer markets," the council declared.

Liberalized tax allowances will not stimulate economic growth, the council continued, "because experience has demonstrated that funds are adequate and stimulus sufficient to induce high rates of investment."

Would Close "Tax Havens"

Among other proposals, Kennedy asked Congress to eliminate the "tax haven" of deferred liability for taxes earned by investment abroad, particularly in countries that are economically highly developed and where no national policy makes American business investment desirable.

More and more companies organized abroad by American firms, the President said, have arranged their corporate structures "so as to exploit the multiplicity of foreign tax systems to reduce sharply or eliminate completely their tax liabilities both at home and abroad."

He also urged:

- Reform of the laws to reduce abuses of expense-account living by business executives engaging in "luxury spending." The cost of "such business entertainment" as yachts and hunting lodges should be disallowed and restrictions imposed on other business spending claimed as expense-account items, he said.
- Withdrawal of present privileges allowing a capital gains tax rate to apply to income from the sale of business property.
- Clarification of the present laws on taxation of income of co-operatives so that either the co-ops or their patrons must pay taxes on all earnings distributed either as cash or patronage dividends.

The President also urged reform of tax administration through an increase in the number of Internal Revenue Service agents to audit returns and check compliance, and authorization of account numbers for taxpayers.

He said he had directed special attention to inventory manipulation by some business firms for the purpose of avoiding taxation.

UNION MEMBERSHIP DRIVE, conducted by Labor Dept. local of the Government Employes, brought in 153 new members in a single day. AFGE shop stewards, who had the key role in the drive, turn in membership applications and dues at the close of the union's "Sign-Up Day." The campaign was part of an intensive AFGE organizing program in the Washington, D. C., area carried on in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

Schnitzler Asks Labor, HEW Funds to Speed U.S. Recovery

Many of the nation's vital programs to meet the recession will be "severely limited" unless Congress authorizes adequate funds and manpower for the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the AFL-CIO has declared.

Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler pointed out that the departments play key roles in administering unemployment insurance, the employment service and social security, and deal with such "dynamic social and economic problems" as automation and the growing proportion of the elderly in the population.

These and other activities can "influence directly the speed of our economic recovery," Schnitzler told a House Appropriations subcommittee headed by Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R. I.), and therefore Congress should go beyond Administration requests, in some instances, in appropriating funds for the two departments for fiscal 1962.

$1.56 Million Higher

The AFL-CIO official pointed out that the Labor Dept. requests for the coming fiscal year are only $1.56 million higher than those which the former Eisenhower Administration had asked for the new fiscal year.

"In our testimony last year," Schnitzler said, "we emphasized that the former Administration had curtailed its request for funds for the Labor Dept. so severely as to hamstring some very important functions. We have no doubt that the former Administration drew up its request for fiscal 1962 according to the same parsimonious principles as in the past."

Although the Kennedy Administration has expanded on some of Eisenhower's figures, Schnitzler said, the budget requests remain "extremely conservative" in some areas, particularly in view of the fact that Kennedy has assigned the Labor Dept. a key role in dealing with the problems of recession and unemployment.

The AFL-CIO urged these changes in Kennedy's budget requests:

- An additional $900,000 for the Wage-Hour & Public Contracts Division to permit hiring 100 additional investigators, because "literally hundreds of thousands of low-paid workers are being denied even the pitifully low minimum wage by employers who violate the law with impunity because of lack of adequate enforcement."
- Appropriation of funds to permit the Bureau of Labor Statistics to expand its work of collecting and publishing information on the conditions of workers abroad, particularly in the newly independent countries of Africa and in the countries of the Sino-Soviet bloc.
- An additional $750,000 for the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training to hire 100 additional field workers.
- A "substantial increase," instead of a $20,000 cutback, for more adequate policing of the Mexican farm labor program.
- Added funds to permit the Bureau of Labor-Management Reports to expand its technical assistance activities to supply unions with information on requirements under the Landrum-Griffin Act.
- More funds for the Social Security Administration to assure speedy disposition of claims, for training of public assistance personnel and for more staff to develop new social security programs.
- A sharp increase in grants for construction of hospital and health facilities to achieve the maximum levels authorized under the Hill-Burton Act.

Schnitzler asked the subcommittee to take a close look at the Administration's requests for a $2 million increase in appropriations for community health activities and $1 million for the Public Health Service to purchase polio vaccine for use in epidemics. He questioned whether the funds asked are "sufficient" to do the job.

Other Requests Endorsed

The AFL-CIO endorsed Kennedy's requests for a $290,000 hike for the office of the Labor Dept. solicitor for implementing and enforcing standards; $235,000 more for an increased staff to strengthen administration of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Worker's Compensation Act; $300,000 more for testing cargo gear used in loading ships; and $105,000 additional for the Child Labor and Youth Employment program.

The federation also supported the Administration's request for $23.5 million for the Food & Drug Administration, which Schnitzler called "the citizen's chief bulwark against the dangers that inevitably accompany the benefits of rapidly advancing technology in the field of foods, drugs and cosmetics."

On requests for the National Institute of Health, where, during the Eisenhower years, Congress annually went beyond White House requests, Schnitzler urged the committee to continue to exercise "inspired and responsible leadership."

Labor, he said, has consistently taken the position that "the only legitimate limitation on appropriations for medical research should be the availability of professional resources to use such funds productively."

Supreme Court Kills NLRB Brown-Olds Doctrine

union members only or to compel workers to join unions.

The general theme of the Supreme Court rulings was that actual proof of discrimination against non-union members or compulsion to join a union must be available—that in effect the board cannot go beyond Taft-Hartley in decisions aimed at prevention of compulsion.

This is how the court acted:

Hiring halls: In a 6-to-2 decision it nullified standards set by the NLRB in the Mountain Pacific case and overturned a lower court decision upholding these standards.

In the Mountain Pacific case the board set forth a model hiring-hall provision, and declared that any different provision was invalid and an unfair labor practice.

Justice William O. Douglas, for the majority, wrote that "there being no express ban of hiring halls in any provisions of the (T-H) Act, those who add one, whether it be the board or the courts, engage in a legislative act."

The case involved the Los Angeles-Seattle Motor Express, Inc., and Teamsters Local 357 and contract provisions that casual employes be hired on the basis of seniority regardless of union membership through a union-operated hiring hall.

It may not be inferred, the court said, that discrimination between union and non-union members follows from an exclusive hiring agreement, particularly one which states that union membership will not determine seniority standing for referral purposes.

Brown-Olds: The court reversed a lower court ruling that the Carpenters, its Indianapolis and Central Indiana District Council and Local 60 reimburse all employes of Mechanical Handling Systems, Inc., for the full amount of money "illegally exacted" under a hiring contract found to be illegal.

The remedy, the court said in a 7-to-1 decision, is "punitive and beyond the powers" of the board where there is no showing that any union member was coerced or compelled to become or remain a member of the union.

Douglas said that while the board has broad discretion to adapt its remedies to the needs of particular situations, the power to command affirmative action is remedial, not punitive, and is to be exercised in aiding the board to restrain violations.

Union foremen and general laws: The court upheld a lower court ruling sustaining the legality of a Typographical Union contract providing that mail room foremen must be union members and must do the hiring and that the union's general laws are permitted in the contract.

Douglas for the 6-to-2 majority said the foreman remained the employer's agent despite his union membership and that the court could not assume that a union foreman would discriminate in favor of union members in the absence of actual proof of discrimination. The case involved the ITU and the News Syndicate Co. and Dow Jones & Co.

Douglas wrote on the general laws that the contract provided that any conflict between the general laws and the T-H closed shop ban makes the laws inoperable.

Another ITU case involving the ITU locals and the Worcester Telegram and Haverhill Gazette in Massachusetts grew out of a strike to enforce the general laws and the foreman clause. The NLRB and a lower court held the strike illegal.
